case as an illustration. It is admitted that there must be a reasonable cause to support the defendant's promise to make the first offer of his farm to the defendant, in case he should wish to sell. What, then, is the causa, or oorzaak, for his promise? If the test is the physical and moral possibility of his fulfilling his promise, there can be no doubt that there was a causa; but what becomes of the requisite that the causa must be reasonable? The Dutch writers must have attached some meaning to the word "reasonable," apart from the possibility, physical or moral, of performance, of the obligation. But by what test is any judge or jury to decide whether it was not only physically and morally possible for the defendant, to offer the farm to the plaintiff, but also reasonable that he should have made the promise at all? From the strictly moral point of view, it was reasonable for the defendant to make the promise, although the plaintiff was not to give or do anything in return, but the ordinary jurymen would consider that there ought to have been a quid pro quo. Assuming, on the other hand, that the term causa means either motive or reason for the contract, I can find no motive or reason in the present case, except the defendant's wish to escape the plaintiff's importunity without any apparent rudeness to him. Like a true native, he was so intent upon getting rid of a present inconvenience, that he quite forgot that he might afterwards be called upon to make good his deliberate promise. But the motive which influenced him was not a reasonable one, and the strange result would follow that because his motive was not reasonable he escapes liability. It is admitted, however, that if the plaintiff, on his part, had paid a substantial sum for the right of pre-emption, or had promised to buy the farm for the price at which another purchaser should be willing to buy, or had given a right of pre-emption on his own farm to the defendant, there would have been a reasonableness of the defendant's motive and the want of any further consideration would not have prevented the Court from holding him bound by his undertaking. It always, therefore, comes round to this, that, in the case of all contracts except donation, the only practical test of the existence of a reasonable cause is the giving of a quid pro quo. This is a test which the simplest mind can understand and appreciate, and which in practice is found to solve every difficulty. The learned Chief Justice, however, is apparently of a different opinion, for near the end of his judgment he says: "To pluck the English doctrine from its surroundings and from a system of which it forms a well-understood part, and to graft it upon our legal system, to which it is, in my opinion, foreign, to curtail its scope by excluding from its operation all contracts of donation; and to recognise in connection with it the inconsistent doctrine that contracts without consideration, are valid for all purposes of defence—to adopt such a course would not, I think, be expedient if it were possible." Surely this criticism does less than justice to the part actually taken by this Court in the development of the law relating to contracts in this colony. It found the doctrine of "redelyke oorzaak" well established, and, as its proceedings were in the English language, it had to find an English equivalent for the Dutch expression. The literal translation would have been "reasonable cause," but that expression, associated as it is with the law relating to injuries, would not have adequately conveyed the real meaning of the original. What then was more natural than for the Court to adopt the expression, "valuable consideration," approaching as it does more nearly than any other words in the English language to the true meaning of "redelyke oorzaak?" Without transplanting the whole of the English doctrine of consideration into our law, the Court has availed itself in this, as in so many other departments of law, of the practical aid afforded by the wisdom and good sense of great English judges in the elucidation of matters which are common to both systems of law. As to "donations," the anomaly of including them among contracts has repeatedly been pointed out by great writers on the Dutch law, but the Court, finding that it was so included, accepted the law as it stood without attempting to curtail the general doctrine of consideration. In regard to the inconsistency of that doctrine with the rule that contracts without consideration may be valid for purposes of defence, it is an inconsistency which, at all events, would in this Court prevent a decision such as that of the House of Lords in Fonkes v. Beer (9, Ap. Ca., 605), upon which the Chief Justice is so severe. The practice of allowing a defendant under certain circumstances to avail himself of certain facts as a defence, which, if he were plaintiff, he would not be allowed to rely on or prove, is known in the Dutch as well as English and American jurisprudence. It is quite consistent, at all events, with the Dutch practice for the Court to refuse its aid equally to the one party, who, as plaintiff, claims the benefit of an agreement for which he has given no quid pro quo, and to the other party should he, as plaintiff, seek to enforce a right which he has promised to forego. In other respects also the doctrine has always been so applied as to do no violence to any recognised principles of our own law. For instance, a contract by formal deed requires to be supported by a consideration as much as any simple contract. No inconvenience has ever resulted from the non-adoption of the English rule, which dispenses with the necessity of consideration in the case of contracts under seal, and I do not.

therefore, share in the fear expressed by the Transvaal Court that we might be driven to have recourse to the so-called "peppercorn considerations." A purely nominal consideration would certainly not be regarded in our courts as a reasonable cause.

It is not quite to the point to say, as was said by the Chief Justice, that the tribunals of Scotland, where the doctrine of consideration forms no part of the law, have coped successfully with the task of deciding whether parties intend to bind themselves to the performance of gratuitous promises. Those tribunals have not, so far as I can judge, been hampered by a rule of practice that no contracts should be enforced unless they are supported by a reasonable cause. "The Romans," says Lord Stair, "that they might have clear proof of pactions and agreements, would second none with their civil authority, but such as had a solemnity of words by way of stipulation, whereby the one party going before, by an interrogation, the other party closed by an answer conform, which was both clear to the parties and witnesses; or otherwise, unless there were the intervention of some deed, or thing, beside the consent, or that it were a contract allowed of the law, or such other paction as it specially confirmeth; without all which, it was called nudum pactum inefficax ad agendum. We shall not insist in these, because the common custom of nations has resiled therefrom, following rather the canon law, by which every paction produceth action et omne verbum de ore fidei cadit in delictum. And so observeth Gudelinus de Jure (Nov., L. 3. C. 5. sec., ult.) and Corvinus de Pactis. We have a special Statute of session, November 27, 1592, acknowledging all pactions and promises as effectual, and so it hath been ever decided (January 14, 1631, Sharp contra Sharp.)" On reference to the work of Gudelinus, who was a professor at Louvain University, I do not find that he quite supports Lord Stair, whose statement as to Scotch law is emphatic enough. Compare that statement with the qualified statements of the different Dutch writers I have quoted, and the difference between the two systems of law becomes apparent at once. The Dutch Courts, while rejecting the Roman law rule ex nudo pacto non datur actio in its proper sense, still retained that "intervention of something beside the consent," which the Scotch law seems to have swept away along with the subtleties of the Roman law, and they developed it into something more akin to the "valuable consideration" of the English law than even the causa præter conventionem ever was under the Roman law. As was to be expected, there is a corresponding difference in the manner in which donations are treated. The Dutch Courts, while on the one hand refusing to enforce orinary contracts not supported by valuable consideration, and, on the other hand, having to recognise donations, although not supported by valuable consideration, continued to enforce the restrictions to which donations were subjected even when there was no question of defrauding creditors. In the Scotch law, so far as I can judge, donations are not revocable by the donor, nor do they require registration, the only restriction being that they shall not be used as a means for defrauding creditors.

It is more to the point, in a colony where the Dutch law prevails, to inquire what has been the course of judicial decision in other colonies where the same system is in force. In his Institutes of the Laws of Ceylon, Thomson, J., a judge of the Supreme Court of that colony, cites with approval cases decided in the local courts as far back as 1837, in which the doctrine was fully recognised. In another passage (Vol. 2, p. 322), he says: "By the laws of Ceylon, all contracts whatsoever made in Ceylon (except perhaps recognisances) must have an adequate consideration, otherwise no obligation can be said to exist." In support of this statement of the law, he cites, not only a passage in Van der Linden, but also the collection of judgments by Chief Justice Sir Charles Marshall, of which I have, unfortunately, not been able to procure a copy. "This rule," adds Thomson, J., "applies even to deeds; but deeds have this advantage, that the consideration is in the first instance presumed, i.e., the deed itself is prima facie evidence that it was given for an adequate consideration, only to be rebutted by satisfactory evidence to the contrary." In support of this statement, he cites cases decided in the local courts in 1851 and 1859. Turning next to the practice in the neighbouring colony of Natal, where the Dutch law also prevails, I find that the Supreme Court, in Boshoff v. Lotter (Broome's Dig., 74), decided that "valuable consideration" is necessary to support an action on a contract. The facts of the case are somewhat peculiar. Differences between the plaintiff and defendant having been brought before a Church Council of the denomination to which both parties belonged, the Council suggested a compromise, under which the defendant was adjudged, under pain of ecclesiastical censure, to pay a sum of money, for which he gave his promissory note. The note being dishonoured, was sued upon, and the defence of want of consideration was set up. It was held by a majority of the Court that, there being a want of reciprocity or material benefit accruing to the defendant as consideration, no right of action surrendered by the plaintiff, and no legal obligation on the defendant to pay the amount adjudged, the payment should not be enforced. Chief Justice Harding dissented, and the report of the case is too brief to enable one to judge whether upon the facts he may not have been justified in holding that there was sufficient consideration, but the decision is important, as showing what strict proof of "valuable consideration" was required by a majority of the Court. Strangely enough, in Mr. Nathan's recently-published work on the "Common Law of South Africa" (vol. 2, p. 541), the learned author, while citing the judgment of Harding, C.J., as supporting the view that consideration is not required, omits to mention the more relevant fact that the Chief Justice was in a minority, and that the opposite view was adjudged to be the law of Natal. The decision was given as far back as 1858, and appears never since to have been questioned by the Court, although during the interval it was for a considerable time presided over by a Chief Justice (Connor), who was admitted by every lawyer, who has had the privilege, like myself, of practising before him, to have been one of the keenest students and clearest exponents of the Dutch law that have ever occupied a seat on the judicial bench of South Africa. Indeed, in the subsequent case of Waller v. Wo'der (9, Natal, S.C., c. 55), that learned Judge took for granted that consideration is required to support a contract. He correctly pointed out the difference between nudum pactum as understood in the Roman and in the English law, but held that in that particular case there was sufficient consideration to support an agreement to accept a composition. In support of this view he cited an English case, which he would certainly not have done if, in his opinion, the English doctrine of consideration were so foreign to the legal system of a colony where the Dutch law prevails, as it is held by the Transvaal Court to be. Until its recent decision the question had never been fully argued, and decided in the Transvaal, although the tendency seems to have been to assume that consideration was not required. On inquiry as to the course of judicial decision in the former Orange Free State, I have been informed that the question never arose for decision in the Supreme Court, but that in a case before the Circuit Court for Winburg, it was held that, giving an option for the purchase price of a farm was not binding without valuable consideration having been given for the right. I have not been able to ascertain what the decision on the point has been in the courts of British Guiana, the only other British colony where the Roman-Dutch law prevails, but it is significant that in his translation of Van der Linden's Institutes of the Law of Holland, Henry, who had made the law of that colony a subject of special study, and had himself held high judicial office there, translated "oorzaak" into "consideration" in the passage (B, 1, c. 14, sec. 2), where the learned author states that a contract without an "oorzaak" is not valid. In this colony, as I before had occasion to observe, the practice has not been uniform. In 1830, the Supreme Court held, in Louisa v. Van den Berg (1, Menzies, 471), that a gratuitous promise made to A for the benefit of B, accepted by A and B, is binding on the promisor, and that performance thereof, if refused, may be enforced by legal proceedings, if not in its nature illegal. The question does not seem to have been raised in that case whether the promise should be supported as a donation subject to the rules relating to that class of contracts. In the subsequent case of Jacobson v. Norton (2, Mez., 218), the declaration certainly discloses valuable consideration for the defendant's promise to pay, but the Court held that as no consideration was necessary to support that promise, it was unnecessary to decide, on exceptions to the declaration, whether the consideration was sufficiently set out. It has been stated in this court that Mr. Justice Menzies subsequently modified the strong views which he originally held under the influence of his Scotch training, but I have not been able to find any reported case to that effect. From 1841 to 1868 cases were not regularly reported, and it would therefore be difficult to verify the statement. Among the cases that were reported is that of Carwood v. Lane (5 Searle, 264), in which the plaintiff claimed damages for the defendant's breach of contract in opening a butcher's shop at Uitenhage in violation of his undertaking to refrain from carrying on such a business. To the summons there were three exceptions, the first of which was that the summons did not allege any contract containing consideration for refraining from carrying on the business of a butcher at Uitenhage. The brief judgment delivered by Hodges, C.J., was as follows: "The first exception must fail, because the stipulated rental of £65 must be regarded as consideration." This judgment treats it as an accepted doctrine, as, to my knowledge, it was in 1867, when the case was decided, that a contract requires a consideration to support it. In 1874 the point was definitely decided, and since that time the doctrine has been affirmed and reaffirmed, not only in this court, but also in the Eastern Districts Court and in the High Court of Griqualand. (See Midgley v. Tarrant (5 E.D.C., 35), and the recent case of Gous v. Van der Hoff (13, C.T.R., 397).)

But, assuming for a moment that this Court and other Colonial Courts administering the Dutch law have erred in their interpretation of the Dutch law, the question would still remain whether it would be right or proper for the Court to reverse its practice of so many years. Surely, if ever there were a matter in which the saying Communis error facit jus should apply, it is here. The error, if error it be, has not, to use the language of Lord Ellenborough (Islewood v. Oldknow, 3 M. and S., 386), consisted in "an opinion merely speculative and theoretical, floating in the minds of persons, but it has been made the groundwork and substratum of practice." So far from its being impossible to apply the doctrine of consideration, in the modified form in which it is here accepted, I do not see how it would be possible, in this Court at all events, to apply any other doctrine. Take the case of promissory notes, in regard to which it has been the invariable practice to refuse provisional sentence to the payee upon proof that the maker had not received valuable consideration for the note. Where the payee can prove in the principal case that the note was given to him with the undoubted intention of making an immediate gift, the Court would enforce it, but the donation would be subject to the fetters binding this class of contract. In the absence of proof of such an intention, no payee has, within my knowledge, ever succeeded in obtaining judgment on a note for which he has given no value. Since 1893 the law of England relating to promissory notes has been practically incorporated with the law of this Colony not by means of an Imperial Act applying to England and this Colony alike, but by our own local Act (19 of 1893). In that local Act, wherever a difference in practice or nomenclature previously existed, the provisions of the English Act have been so amended as to make it clear whether the local practice or nomenclature was to be superseded. For instance, the 12th section of the local Act declares that there are no days of grace in this colony, and the 20th section expressly provides that, to the validity of a bill accepted or endorsed by a woman, the renunciation of the benefits senatus consulti Velleiani and authentica si qua mulier shall not be requisite. As to consideration the English Act reads as follows: "Valuable consideration for a bill may be constituted by (a) any consideration sufficient to support a simple contract; (b) an antecedent debt or liability. Such a debt or liability is deemed valuable consideration, whether the bill is payable on demand or at a future time." The local Act has adopted the section verbatim, except that for sub-section (a) it substitutes the following: "(a) Any cause sufficient to support any action founded on contract or agreement." By our law, therefore, valuable consideration for a bill may be constituted by any cause sufficient to support an action founded on contract or agreement. The Transvaal Court, however, has held that any ground or reason which is not immoral or forbidden would be sufficient even if there was no quid pro quo for the promise, and no antecedent debt or liability. If this Court were now to accept that decision the strange result would follow that there might, in law, be valuable consideration for a promissory note for which, in fact, no valuable consideration whatever had been given by the payee. Rather than allow such a result to follow, the local legislature would, I should think, have adopted the section of the English Act without any alteration, for then the term "consideration" in sub-section (a) would have to be construed by the light of the English, and not the Dutch, law. Other illustrations of the inexpediency of following the Transvaal decision might be given, but my remarks are already longer than at the outset I intended them to be. Greatly as I desire to abide by the decisions of other South African Courts, and to assist in checking the tendency of the laws of the different South African colonies to drift apart by reason of contradictory decisions, I could not accept the views expressed by the Transvaal Court in Rood v. Wallack without running counter to the actual practice of the Dutch Courts, as I conceive it to have been, and, what is more important still, without completely, unsettling the law of this and most other colonies in which the Roman-Dutch law prevails.

In the present case donation is out of the question, and as no valuable consideration was given for the defendant's promise, the plaintiff is not entitled to the damages claimed by him. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, with costs in this court and in the court below, and judgment entered for the defendant.

TYAM V. KOTA. } 1901.
 } May 31st.

Mandate — Agent — Payment of damages.

The plaintiff, a native, who owned some cattle, left them during his absence from home in charge of his uncle M. During the plaintiff's absence, his brother seduced the defendant's daughter, whereupon M. gave one of the plaintiff's cows to the defendant as compensation for the seduction of his daughter.

Held in an action by the plaintiff to recover the cow or its value, that under the ordinary law M. had no mandate to give any of the plaintiff's cattle to others for the protection of his brother's honour, and that in the absence of any statement that by native custom in the Native Territory he had such authority, the Magistrate erred in giving judgment for the defendant.

This was an appeal from a decision of the A.R.M. of Middledrift. The plaintiff had sued to recover a certain cow, or its value, £18.

In the first instance action had been taken against Gololo Kota, and the Magistrate held that the wrong party had been sued. Action was then taken against Maclean Kota, and the parties agreed that the proceedings in the previous case should form part of the record. The evidence in the case showed that the plaintiff's younger brother had seduced the defendant's daughter, and that while the plaintiff was away his uncle, Mbela, gave the defendant a cow as damages for the seduction. The Magistrate dismissed the case, holding that the plaintiff's uncle was justified in paying damages out of the estate, in which all the children had property, and that if the plaintiff's father had been alive he would have paid damages for the misconduct of his son. Mr. Van Zyl (for appellant), contended that Mbela was merely the agent of the plaintiff, and that he had no authority to dispose of the property. The Magistrate did not decide the case on native custom, but on the law of mandate.

Respondent in default.

De Villiers, C. J.: The Magistrate has not decided this case, under native law, but under the ordinary law of the Colony. It appears that the plaintiff is to all intents and purposes the owner of the cow in question. He alone has control over it, and although he holds the cattle subject to certain conditions, yet he is the person in whom the property is vested, and he is entitled to sue for the value of the cow, of the possession of which he has improperly been deprived. He left his place, and left his cattle in the charge of his uncle, Mbela. During his absence a brother of the plaintiff seduced defendant's daughter, and upon a demand being made for damages, according to native custom, damages were given by way of a cow, and with the consent of Mbela a cow belonging to the plaintiff was taken for the purpose of paying damages to the defendant for the seduction of his daughter. The Magistrate held that Mbela had authority to do so, because he says there was a mandate. He proceeded upon the ground that there was no prohibition, and that inasmuch as there was no prohibition, Mbela was justified in giving one of the plaintiff's cattle to pay for the seduction of the defendant's daughter. I am of opinion if the doctrine of mandate is to be applied here, that the question is not was there prohibition, but was there permission. Mbela had no right to part with the plaintiff's cattle without his authority, and leaving Mbela in charge of the cattle did not give him authority to deal with the cattle just as he chose. In my opinion Mbela, as agent, had no right to deprive the plaintiff of the possession of the cow, for which no consideration whatever is given, but merely to pay damages for the misconduct of a brother for whom the plaintiff was not in any way responsible. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the Magistrate erred in finding that the plaintiff had no right to recover the cow or its value. The appeal will be allowed, with costs in this Court, and the Court below, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for the restitution of the cow, or its value, namely, £13.

TAYLOR AND GIBSON V. { 1904.
BEHR AND CO. { May 31st.

Conditions of sale—Auction sale
—Auctioneer's commission.

One of the conditions read at an auction sale of lots of land was that "the purchaser shall pay the auctioneer's commission." Certain lots were knocked down to the defendant, who afterwards refused to sign the conditions, on the ground that he had never bought the lots. It having been proved that the defendant had bid for the lots after hearing the conditions read.

Held on appeal, that the Magistrate was right in giving judgment for the plaintiff in an action brought by the auctioneer to recover his commission.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Wynberg in a case in which judgment was given against the appellants for £9 11s. 6d. for auctioneer's fees.

The action arose out of a sale of certain plots of land at Croydon. Twenty-two lots were sold to the appellants, but they denied the transaction, or that they ever saw any conditions of sale. The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said the case resolved itself largely into one of credibility, and he had no hesitation in believing the evidence of the defendants' clerks, who entered the transaction on the roll. It was possible that the defendant might raised entirely to pay debts contracted after the death of deponent's wife.

The replying affidavit of Thomas Henry Matthews, of Willowmore, a law and general agent, stated that he acted as the defendant's agent in the administration of his wife's estate, but he denied any collusion. He added that when the bond was raised, only £26 was in favour of deponent on account of disbursements he had made and commission. The affidavit of George Wm. Mugliston, auctioneer and general agent, Willowmore, stated, he considered £3,000 a reasonable value for the ground in question. The defendant had made considerable improvements to the land since his wife's death. Deponent had made advances to the defendant to enable him to carry out the improvements.

A further affidavit was put in (by consent), of the defendant, who repeated that he asked the deponent Matthews whether he could legally pass a bond on the property, and that Matthews told him that he had a perfect right to do so. As regarded the alleged improvements, he denied that he had spent any considerable sum upon the bore hole, dam, and furrow. The increase in the value of the farm was not due to any improvements described by Matthews and Mugliston, but owing to the general increase in the value of property in the district of Willowmore.

Mr. McGregor for defendant; Mr. Alexander for plaintiff.

Mr. McGregor said that the defendant primarily objected to the property being declared executable. The case was practically governed, save for the matter of knowledge, by that of Haupt v. van den Heever (6, Juta, 49). Under the will the right of alienating was taken out of the hands of the survivor. There was no power to mortgage the land in the survivor. Counsel quoted at some length from the judgment in the case of Williams v. Williams (Supreme Court Reports, p. 392). On the question of knowledge, he said that the agent Matthews must have had full knowledge of the position of things by reason of having been concerned in the administration of the defendant's wife's affairs at her death. If Matthews (the agent) had knowledge, then that knowledge must be imputed to his principal.

Mr. Alexander said that the mortgage had been publicly registered, and no objection had been taken before to the property being mortgaged in this way. He submitted that the debts for which the bond was raised, were such as would be bound to fall on the estate, and that the money was really laid out for the benefit of the joint estate.

Hopley, J.: The plaintiffs must have provisional sentence, but the serious point raised in the case is whether or no they can have the property specially mortgaged declared executable for the purpose of satisfying the judgment. On the cases quoted, and on the facts raised in the present affidavits, the Court would be wrong to declare the property executable. I cannot conceive how Matthews could have forgotten that there were special circumstances applicable to this property. I think that all the children having a vested interest in the estate have a right to be heard and to show cause why the property should not be sold to satisfy the debts contracted by their father. For these reasons I shall give provisional sentence for the amount claimed, with costs, but the property will not be declared executable until further action is taken by the creditors.

Mr. Pyemont moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £23 15s., being account for professional services rendered, with interest a tempore morae and costs.
Order granted.

ZEEDERBERG AND DUNCAN V. COHEN.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £15, defendant being the surety of the principal, who was an unrehabilitated insolvent, and also for interest a tempore morae and costs.
Order granted.

DE WET V. MANSCHETER.

Mr. Roux moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £75, being rent due for certain premises leased from the plaintiff; also £9 1s. 5d., costs incurred on the defendant's behalf, with interest a tempore morae, and costs.
Order granted.

DE WAAL AND CO. V. COLYN.

Mr. De Waal moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £16 3s. 7d., balance of account rendered for goods sold and delivered, with interest a tempore morae, and costs.
Order granted.

REHABILITATIONS. { 1904.
 { June 1st.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the rehabilitation of Petrus Jacobus Pienaar.
Granted.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan renewed the application for the rehabilitation of George Hadley Walden.
Granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

REYNOLDS V. GOODMANSON.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for a rule nisi, granted February 18, for leave to sell certain property, to be made final.
Rule made absolute accordingly.

VAN NIEKERK V. WILL AND OTHERS.

Mr. Graham, K.C., moved for a rule nisi to be made absolute, restraining the sale of the certain land known as Lentslands Pan, in the district of Gordonia, pending an action to be brought by the applicant, Susannah Magdalena Niekirk, to have her rights in the farm declared.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for the first respondent, Will; Mr. W. P. Buchanan appeared for the second and third respondents, Rosenblaut and Wessels.

The affidavit of the applicant stated that she purchased the farm, which comprised 15,000 morgen, from the rightful owner, Piet Boch, and that she was farming it with small stock. Boch was now deceased, and there was no representative of his estate. She understood that the farm was in danger of being sold by the sheriff in execution of a judgment obtained against the first respondent, Will, by the other respondents. Will claimed the farm, but any titles which he put in were forgeries.

The affidavit of J. Herbert N. Will said that he was an attorney, that the applicant had never previously claimed the property, and that the applicant must have known that he was the registered owner. Other affidavits were put in on behalf of the respondent Will.

Mr. Graham submitted that the applicant had clearly made out a case for the rule to be made absolute. It was quite evident that the point of the ownership could not be determined on motion. The plaintiff would bring her action as early as possible, but it was apparent that, owing to the remote place of abode of the parties, some time must elapse.

Mr. Gardiner said that he hoped that the action would not be left over indefinitely.

Mr. Buchanan said that whichever party succeeded, his clients must be held harmless.

Rule made absolute, the present motion to stand instead of summons, the declaration to be filed by the first day of next term, costs to be costs in the cause.

LEFEVRE AND OTHERS V. BORDIGONI.

Mr. McGregor moved in this matter to have a rule nisi granted against the respondent, Bordigoni, discharged. Counsel said that it had been arranged between the parties to allow the matter to stand over pending a decision of the Attorney-General, as to whether the two sanitary systems were similar, and now that the decision had been arrived at, counsel asked that the matter should be dealt with according to the letters patent. (See 13 C.T.R., 1140.)

Mr. W. P. Buchanan, for the respondents, pointed out that the applicant was really the inventor of the system in which the present respondents had joined in partnership, and now he thought he could leave them in the lurch, and exploit a rival system in opposition to that of the applicants.

Hopley, J.: Under the deed of partnership between the parties, Bordigoni, was in no way bound down not to invent a better system, and to exploit it for his own benefit. The Attorney-General has since decided that the two systems of sanitation are entirely different, and his decision has not been set aside or questioned, so that the Court must assume that the two systems are distinct. The interdict must therefore be discharged. In regard to the costs, the then applicants were wrong in interdicting the respondent, and the costs standing over must be paid by them, as well as the costs of the present application.

SUPREME COURT

CRIMINAL SESSIONS.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and a Jury.]

REX V. MARAIS. { 1904.
June 1st.

Minor—Criminal responsibility.

A certain woman and her daughter were jointly charged with assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm. The age of the girl was about 16 to 17 years, and at the instigation of her mother (as the mother admitted) had thrown into the face of a certain complainant a quantity of corrosive fluid, thereby inflicting serious injuries. When charging the jury,

Buchanan, J., said that though one person committed a crime, yet, if two or more combined to carry out the crime they are equally guilty. In this case, the actual assault was committed by the younger prisoner, but there was the connection between the two, and the fact that the vitrol was purchased by the elder prisoner. When the case came into court the senior prisoner had come forward and said, "I take the whole responsibility for this upon my shoulders. My child did it, but she did it at my instigation, and did it for love of me." Therefore, the elder accused admitted complicity, and the jury could not acquit her because she did not herself inflict the injury. In fact, there had been no defence set up as to the guilt of the elder prisoners. The whole defence, as I gather, from the eloquent address of learned counsel for the defence, is in mitigation of punishment, or rather with the intention of getting the jury to return some recommendation. When they returned their verdict he (the learned Judge) was bound to tell them that, though the mother took the whole responsibility upon herself, in law there was no such protection given to a child of the age of the junior prisoner, as to justify them in saying that she was not answerable for the act which she had committed. Children of tender years could not be convicted of a crime, but children of maturer years, children old enough to know the consequences of their acts, were in a different position. The only relation in which the law recognised the principle of coercion was as between husband and wife, in certain misdemeanours. That presumption of coercion did not apply to parent and child, and, therefore, in law, no defence could be set up on the ground that the elder prisoner took the whole responsibility. It was for the jury to say with what intent the act was committed. It was said that the child did not know what she was doing. Well, the jury must take a child of that age and determine for themselves whether she could have committed the act without any volition, without any knowledge that she was doing anything wrong. Did the jury consider that when she threw this vitrol in Mr. Marais' face, she did not think she was doing him an injury? Were the words spoken by her at the time consistent with such an idea? As to what recommendation should be made and what punishment should be passed, the recommendation was for the jury, the punishment for the Judge to determine.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved under Rule 329d, for £130 5s. 4d., and interest on £200 at the rate of 8 per cent., being an amount guaranteed by the defendant in a debt contracted by another party.

Order granted.

STOFFBERG V. MEYER.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved, under Rule 329d, for £103 1s., being the balance of an amount due in a transaction concerning the sale and purchase of mules, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

BOTHA V. DE BRUIN.

Mr. De Waal moved for the appointment of two curators bonis in the estate of Jacobus de Bruin, who had been examined at the request of the Chief Justice by the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Maraisburg, and declared incapable of managing his own affairs.

Order granted; Martinus Marais and Nicholas de Bruin appointed as curators.

DE VILLIERS V. LOUW.

Mr. Close moved to have the respondent declared of unsound mind, and to have the Secretary of the Paarl Board of Executors appointed as curator bonis.

Mr. Russell, as curator ad litem, said that he could not oppose the application to have the respondent declared of unsound mind, but he thought the appointment of the Secretary of the Paarl Board of Executors as curator bonis was inconsistent with his position.

Order granted.

TELFER V. CAPE TOWN GAS CO.

Mr. Uppington moved to have judgment signed against the plaintiff for not proceeding with his action, according to the Rules of Court.

Order granted.

FRIBERG V. LLOYD AND TEARMAN.

Mr. Gardiner moved for judgment for £26 10s. against Lloyd, with costs.

Order granted.

Rule made absolute.

Ex parte WARRINGTON.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved to have a rule nisi granted under the Derelict Lands Act made absolute.
Rule made absolute.

SMITH V. SMITH.

Mr. De Waal moved for leave to sue the respondent by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce, with forfeiture of the benefits arising out of community of property. The parties were married in December, 1900, at Wynberg, and a year later the respondent deserted his wife. He was presumed to be in Johannesburg.

Leave granted to sue by edictal citation, personal service to be effected, if possible, failing which, one publication in the "Cape Times" and in two Johannesburg papers at least three weeks before the 14th July.

Ex parte COLSON.

Mr. Alexander moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to amend an ante-nuptial contract by the substitution of the petitioner's name, viz., Hubert Louis Arnold Colson, instead of Louis Hubertus Arnold Colson, as it at present stands.

Order granted.

Ex parte STRAUSS.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the Master to pay out to the applicant the sum of £1,040, in respect of money, being the proceeds of a sale of a farm in which he had an interest, and in which certain minors were also interested, and for interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from January, 1901.

The Master did not oppose the application.

An order was made in terms of the Master's report.

TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD V. MARX.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for an order on Marx to pay the costs of an action brought by him against the Table Bay Harbour Board, the action having been withdrawn.

Granted.

ASKEW AND CO. V. BRAY AND WRIGHT.

Mr. Van Zyl, who appeared for the applicants, said that the matter came before the Chief Justice on the 17th May, on an application for leave to sue by edictal citation, and his lordship then directed that it should stand over for further information as to the date on which the debt was incurred, when Wright left the Colony, whether he had changed his domicile, and where he was last heard of. An affidavit made by applicant was now read, stating that the debt was for forage sold to Wright in August, 1901. Wright left the Colony in the latter portion of the same year, and went to England, to the best of deponent's knowledge, his present whereabouts being unknown. Certain goods were left in applicant's possession as security, and applicant was taking the present action with a view of levying execution upon these.

Leave was granted to sue Wright by edictal citation, returnable on the 16th August, service to be made by publication in the "Daily Telegraph" and in the "Cape Times."

SUTHERLAND V. SUTHERLAND.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved on behalf of the wife for leave to sue by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which for divorce, on the ground of desertion. Petitioner believed her husband was at present in Bulawayo.

Leave granted as prayed, personal service to be effected. The return day was fixed for the 4th July.

Ex parte VAN DER WESTHUYSEN.

Mr. Rainsford moved for the appointment of a curator to assist a minor in the sub-division of certain property, in which the minor was interested.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte VAN DE VENTER AND OTHERS.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for an order authorising the Registrar to pass transfer of certain property, and authorising the Master to pay costs of survey, and partition of certain property out of the funds held by him in trust for minors. The Master reported favourably to the application.

Granted.

LEVY V. LAZARUS.

Arbitration—Order of Court.

This was an application upon notice of motion calling upon respondents to show cause why the award of the executive committee of the Grand Order of Israel, Lord Milner Lodge, No. 21, who were appointed by the parties to settle certain disputes between them, should not be made an order of Court. The parties sued each other for damages for slander, but agreed to refer the disputes to the executive committee of the lodge, who adjudged that, in the case of Lazarus against Levy, the plaintiff (Lazarus) should receive judgment, with costs; and that in the case of Levy v. Lazarus, the latter should pay all costs, pay £5 5s. towards a fund connected with the lodge, and insert an apology in two local papers. Applicant now asked that the award be made a rule of Court, and respondent opposed, on the ground that the arbitration should have been made by a board consisting of honorary members of the Lodge, as provided by rule of the Order, and not by the executive committee. He alleged that he was not given an opportunity to produce his witnesses.

Mr. Alexander for applicant; Mr. Burton for respondent.

Mr. Burton said that written notice was sent to the respondent to bring his witnesses on the 3rd April, and counsel contended that even if a verbal notice was given, it was before his letter was considered—a course which he was led to believe would be taken.

Mr. Alexander submitted that if the arbitrators gave a clear award in a case, that the Court would not interfere with it. The respondent in this case was not really entitled to consideration, for the serious charges he had made against an attorney of this Court. Anything in the nature of an apology would be sufficient to satisfy the award, and counsel submitted that the Court could give such an order.

Hopley, J.: In this case the parties prior to the 23rd March, had certain disagreements, and each party had instituted an action against the other for defamation of character. Lazarus against Levy in the Magistrate's Court for £20 damages and costs. On the 23rd March, Lazarus in the Supreme Court for £250 damages and costs. On the 23rd March, 1904, they signed the following document: "We, the undersigned brethren of the Grand Order of Israel, Lord Milner Lodge, No. 21, do hereby agree and bind ourselves to abide by the decision of the Executive Committee, and the same decision to be made an order of the Court."

There were two other signatures to this document, but they do not take any part in the present application, which is one by Levy to have the award of the Executive Committee made an order of this Court.

The document is not a formal or well drawn deed, but it is clearly intended to be a submission to arbitration by the Executive Committee of the said lodge, which, after enquiry into the case or cases made the following award:

"I. A. Lazarus v. A. Levy.

"In this case the plaintiff received judgment with costs.

"II. A. Levy v. A. Lazarus.

"In this case the defendant was found guilty, and that he pays all costs with an additional five pounds five shillings sterling, which sum is to go towards the Distress Fund of the Grand Order of Israel, Lord Milner Lodge, No. 21, and that the said A. Lazarus make a public apology in two local papers."

Before the award was issued the respondent Lazarus, who had attended the first meeting of the Arbitrators, had withdrawn, and asked that the arbitration should be carried out by an arbitration board to be constituted according to the rules of the order, but the Executive, after warning him to attend a further meeting, proceeded with the investigation with the result above stated.

Now it seems to me that the submission having been to the arbitrament of the Executive Committee, it was not competent for the respondent during the progress of the investigations to attempt to change the terms of the submission, and he must be held to be bound by the award, which was carried out in so far as it did not go beyond the terms of the submission.

The awards, however, do seem to me to go beyond the powers of the Arbitrators, at all events with regard to the second award. The Arbitrators had no power to award any sum to any charity, nor, I think, will this Court enforce their finding compelling the respondent to make public apology in the newspapers. This Court never makes such an order, and will not make such an award a rule of Court. And I think such parts of the award must be treated as surplusage and struck out. With regard to the first order of the Arbitrators, I think it merely means that the plaintiff (now respondent) should be awarded his costs without any damages, and this Court will now order that the awards should be made a rule of the Court to the extent indicated, viz., that in each case the plaintiff receive a judgment for his costs only. The respondent in this motion, who has opposed the making of any order by the Court, and has made no tender of any consent, must pay the costs in this Court.

[Applicant's Attorneys: J. Buirski; Defendant's Attorney: Michau and De Villiers.]

Ex parte LAWRENCE AND CO. AND WISNER AND CO.

Mr. Rainsford moved to have a provisional trustee appointed in the estate of Ah Young in the interest of the creditors. The estate had been sequestered on the 25th May, and it was desirable now that certain assets should be taken charge of.

Hopley, J., said that it was unusual to appoint a provisional trustee before the second meeting, and the application could not be granted.

CLARKE AND CRESSWELL V. GORDON
AND OTHERS.

This was an application to stay an action in the Magistrate's Court on Monday next. Gordon, who had been the agent of the applicants, obtained from the respondents, Parry and Joachim, a promissory note for £185 1s. 8d., but during the currency of the note the applicants had cancelled his power of attorney.

Mr. Gardiner was for the applicants and Mr. Graham, K.C., was for the respondent Gordon.

Mr. Parry appeared, and said he was prepared to pay the money into the hands of the Registrar at once.

Hopley, J., said that there was no necessity to proceed with the action in the Magistrate's Court. The money would be waiting for respondents if they established their claim.

Mr. Graham said that if the matter were adjourned in order to allow respondents to peruse the affidavits on the other side, there might be no further litigation.

The Court, by consent, ordered the respondents Parry and Joachim to pay the amount of the promissory note on the 8th inst. It was further ordered that the action in the Magistrate's Court be stayed and that the Registrar hold the money pending further order of Court, costs being reserved. Leave was granted the applicants to sue Gordon by edictal citation, personal service to be effected, service being made returnable on the 30th June.

ROSS V. ESTATE OF SCHWAB AND ROSS.

Mr. Burton appeared for the applicant to move to set aside certain insolvency proceedings.

Mr. McGregor appeared for the trustee of the insolvent estate.

Ross stated, on affidavit, that he was not a partner in the alleged firm of Schwab and Ross, and had not been served with notice of the insolvency proceedings. They were joint owners of a certain property, but further than that, they had no connection. He (Ross) was shown in the schedules as a creditor of the supposed firm for £14.

A replying affidavit was made by Mr. Hazell, the trustee in the insolvent estate, in which he stated that Schwab came to him, and said he was a member of the firm of Ross and Schwab, and that the firm wished to surrender. Notice was published in the "Gazette" of the intention of the firm to surrender, and subsequently the estate was sequestered by order of the Supreme Court. Notice of this proceeding was duly published. When witness sent notice to one Ross as a creditor, he was not aware that this person was the plaintiff. Deponent stated that transfer of a certain property had been taken by Ross and Schwab in undivided shares, and that Ross and Schwab had given powers to pass certain bonds.

The matter was ordered to stand over for a week for further information.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

Act 36 of 1902—Application to compel Magistrate to take preliminary examination instead of proceeding with trial.

In an application to restrain a Resident Magistrate from proceeding with a trial for a contravention of one of the provisions of Act 36 of 1902, on the ground of the extreme gravity of the offence.

Held, that as the Legislature has conferred the enlarged jurisdiction on the Magistrate's Court, the Supreme Court should not interfere to restrain the exercise of such enlarged jurisdiction.

This was an application as a matter of urgency, for an order for the summary trial now proceeding against one Max Harris in the Court of the R.M. at Cape Town, to be converted into a preparatory examination, and authorising the A.R.M. (Mr. Broers) to admit the petitioner to bail.

The petition set out that on the 14th May the prisoner was charged with having, between the 1st January, 1903, and the 12th May, 1904, contravened section 33, sub-section (a) of Act 36 of 1902, to which he pleaded not guilty. The case was postponed until the 26th May, whereupon plaintiff applied to be admitted to bail, which application was refused. On the 26th May the case was postponed until the 30th May, and a further application for bail was refused. On the 26th May a preparatory examination was commenced of the petitioner on a charge of conspiracy with intent to defeat the ends of justice, which preparatory examination had not yet been concluded. On the 30th May the petitioner was further remanded until the 6th June. Petitioner objected to the jurisdiction of the Magistrate's Court to proceed by way of the summary trial on the ground that there was a preparatory examination proceeding on another charge, both charges having arisen out of practically the same set of circumstances. Petitioner believed that he would be prejudiced unless both cases were tried at the same time and before the same tribunal.

The replying affidavit of Mr. C. W. Broers, A.R.M., stated that the case was remanded to the 30th May for the purposes of the defence, but on that date the defendant's agent said he was not prepared to call witnesses for the defence, and applied for a further remand, and objected to the jurisdiction of the Court from proceeding with the case as a summary trial. Under section 28, Ordinance 40 of 1828, it was left to the discretion of the Magistrate, and not to the accused, to decide whether a trial should stop and whether a preparatory examination should commence. The case was remanded until the 6th June, which day was being kept open for the hearing of the case.

Mr. Van Zyl for the applicant; Mr. Nightingale for the Crown.

Mr. Van Zyl said that the applicant contended that, as both cases arose out of the same circumstances, he would be considerably prejudiced if both matters were not tried together. The ends of justice could not be defeated if both cases were brought before the Supreme Court at the same time. If the defendant were convicted in the first case, then there would be a strong presumption of guilt in the second case, and the defendant would therefore be seriously prejudiced if the cases were separated.

[De Villiers, C. J.: What is he charged with in the first case?]

With living upon the earning of prostitutes. Counsel asked that the prisoner should be admitted to bail.

Mr. Nightingale strongly opposed the application for bail on the ground of danger that the prisoner would probably abscond.

[De Villiers, C. J.: That statement should be fortified by affidavit.]

Mr. Nightingale said that he could easily secure affidavits. He went on to say that the cases were really distinct, and that the matter was one of great importance. In the event of bail being granted, he hoped the Court would fix the bail in a very substantial amount—say two landed proprietors of £1,000 each, and personal recognisance of £2,000.

De Villiers, C. J.: There are two distinct charges against the accused. The first is "knowingly living wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitutes." The second charge is one of conspiracy with intent to defeat the ends of justice. The two charges are perfectly distinct. It is quite possible that some of the evidence that may be given in the one case may be evidence in the other; but the charges still remain perfectly distinct, and they will be so treated no doubt in the Courts which have to try the prisoner. The Act 36 of 1902 specially directs that all offences against this Act shall be cognisable before the R.M. or A.R.M. within whose jurisdiction such offences shall have been committed, and such Magistrate shall impose the penalties respectively by this Act provided. Now, the present application is brought under the 28th section of Ordinance 40 of 1828 (section read). I am not prepared to say that there may not be cases in which the Court would restrain a Magistrate from proceeding with a trial, if the case is of such a nature that it could more be properly tried before a higher Court. I express no opinion on that point; but I do say this, that, considering that the Legislature has expressly conferred this enlarged jurisdiction upon the Magistrate, by the Act of 1902 the Court should not interfere so long as the Magistrate does not exceed the limits of that jurisdiction. It is suggested that the reason why the Court should now interfere is because a conviction of the one offence might prejudice the accused if he is tried for the other offence. In some degree that may occur, even if the accused were to be indicted in two different Courts. But that possible prejudice cannot affect the question which the Court has now to decide. The Court has no doubt that the Magistrate who has to try the case will do justice in the matter, and that he will do perfect justice between the prosecutor and the accused. I am of opinion, therefore, that there is no ground whatever for the application to restrain the Magistrate from proceeding with the summary trial. In regard to the application for bail, that seems somewhat premature until the trial has taken place, because, in reference to the summary trial before the Magistrate, I understand that within a few days the trial will take place, and there is therefore no necessity for granting bail immediately. After the trial the Magistrate would be quite justified in requiring substantial bail, and the bail suggested on behalf of the Crown seems to me perfectly fair, viz., the accused in the sum of £2,000 and two landed proprietors in the sum of £1,000 each. I consider, if that were obtainable, it would be the duty of the Magistrate after the first trial is completed, to allow the accused on bail, pending the trial for conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice. Upon the question whether the two offences can be tried separately or whether the accused can be found guilty of both offences, that is a question that can be raised afterwards upon the trial for conspiracy. If it is a good defence that it cannot be done, then that defence can be raised before the Court which tries the prisoner upon the charge of conspiracy. But there is no ground for the application, which must be refused.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Michau and D. Villiers.]

ASTON V. ASTON.

{ June 3rd.

This was an action brought by Albert Aston, of Observatory-road, against his wife, Emily Aston, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce. Mr. Rowson appeared for the plaintiff; the defendant, who was believed to be residing in the County of Radnor, England, was in default. The suit was brought by edictal citation.

The plaintiff, Albert Aston, said that he came out to the Cape in August, 1900, in order to better his position. He was now in the employ of the C.G.R. He had asked his wife to join him, but she would not come out. He wrote to her in 1902, asking her to come out in October of that year, promising to provide a home for her, and praying her not to put her parents before her husband. In her reply, she said she had told the defendant she would never come, and that she would rather die to-morrow than come out. She advised him to get a divorce, and marry someone out here in the Cape, and be happy and comfortable. He had, she added, killed the love she had had for him. Continuing his evidence, witness said they lived happily together at Home for a few years until a difference arose in regard to another man. It was with her full consent that he left England. He asked for custody of the child of the marriage.

By the Court: He was prepared to pay the passage of his wife if she would come out to the Colony.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th August, failing which, rule to issue calling on defendant to show cause on the 31st August why a decree of divorce should not be granted to the plaintiff, with custody of the child, with costs, rule to be served personally, together with an offer on the plaintiff's part to pay the passage money of the defendant and the child to South Africa.

Postea (December 12th). The rule was made absolute.

FOULDS V. FOULDS.

This was an action brought by Mary Foulds, of Cape Town, against her husband, Arthur Foulds, a carpenter, also of Cape Town, for divorce on the ground of his adultery in Selkirk-street, and elsewhere, with divers women of ill-repute. The petitioner also prayed for custody of the child of the marriage. Mr. W. P. Buchanan appeared for the plaintiff; the defendant was in default.

The plaintiff, Mary Foulds, said that she was married to the defendant on the 14th February, 1898, while she was living at Clayton-le-Moors, Lancashire. She produced a certificate of the marriage. There was one child of the marriage, born in 1899. After the marriage, they stayed for some time at Clayton-le-Moors, and in March or April, 1902, her husband came out to the Cape for the purpose of settling here. Witness came to the Cape, at his request, in September, 1902. They lived together at Woodstock and Observatory-road. Defendant was a carpenter, but he was not successful in his business. She had had to support him in a large measure by keeping a boarding-house and by sewing. The defendant had been away several times to Port Elizabeth, Stellenbosch, and elsewhere, but he had returned on each occasion. He went away to Bloemfontein, but had since returned. When he had left for Bloemfontein she heard certain allegations against the defendant's moral character from the boarders.

James Foster, of Sir Lowry-road, Cape Town, said that he formerly lodged with the parties at Observatory-road. On the 27th September last he went out with the defendant; they proceeded to a house of ill-fame in Reform-street, where the defendant misconducted himself.

Wm. Turner, who was formerly a boarder at the defendant's house, also spoke to another visit paid by the defendant to a house of ill-fame.

Decree of divorce granted as prayed, plaintiff to have custody of the child of the marriage.

JACOBS V. JACOBS.

This was an action brought by Edith Mabel Jacobs, of Cape Town, against John Jacobs, whose whereabouts are unknown, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, on the ground of his malicious desertion.

Mr. Alexander was for the plaintiff; the defendant was in default.

Wm. Thomas Birch, clerk in charge of the Marriage Register, produced copy of the register of marriage.

Edith Mabel Jacobs said she was married to the defendant in Cape Town in March, 1897. They lived here together for a short time. Her husband had certain business interests in the Transvaal to settle, and they went up there; afterwards, when the war broke out, they proceeded to Durban, and subsequently went on a holiday to London. It was arranged that they should return to the Cape, but they were waiting for money. She afterwards came out to the Cape, thinking that defendant had come, but she had not ascertained that he had come out, and, in fact, had lost all trace of him. She had no idea where the defendant was. She was now in business as a dressmaker. There was one child of the marriage, aged about 5 years; the last that she heard was that the child was with the defendant.

Mr. Alexander said that exhaustive inquiries had been made with regard to the whereabouts of the defendant, but all to no purpose.

Decree of restitution granted, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th August, failing which rule to issue calling upon him on the 31st August to show cause why a decree of divorce should not be granted, with costs, with leave to the plaintiff for substituted service, as directed in regard to citation.

Postea (October 15th). The rule was made absolute.

REVIEW CASE.

REX V. LOUW. { 1904.
{ June 3rd.

Sale and purchase—Theft.

Hopley, J.: A case came before me on review from the Resident Magistrate's Court of Calvinia, which I have submitted for the consideration of my brother judges, and we are all of opinion that the conviction cannot be confirmed. The circumstances were somewhat peculiar. The accused was a white European farmer called Stephanus Louw, and he was charged with having stolen a couple of goats from some coloured people. He went on to the farm of these people and took away two goats under the following circumstances: It would appear that the day before he took away the goats he had a talk with the husband of the owner of these goats, and proposed purchasing, and he swears that the husband agreed that he should have the goats for 10s. each. On the day on which he took the goats he went into the veld and spoke to the herd, and gave him £1, and took away the goats, saying that he was not going to wait for the master any longer. The boy gave the £1 to the husband, but his wife was apparently not anxious to part with the goats, and possibly the husband then said he never agreed to sell them. The accused was a well-known man, and it was unlikely, if he intended stealing the goats, he would have taken them away in the manner in which he did, and, again, a sovereign was not alleged to have been an unfair price. The accused might have committed some civil wrong, but, in his opinion, he had no intention of stealing the goats, and the Magistrate was wrong in finding him guilty. The conviction must, therefore, be quashed.

TRIAL CAUSES.

ROBERTSON V. ROBERTSON.

Mr. Close, for the plaintiff, moved for leave to sue the defendant (his wife) by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, for a decree of divorce. The defendant was barred from pleading.

The declaration set out that the parties were married in Durban in July, 1889, and in 1898 the defendant deserted her husband, who had repeatedly written to her asking her to return.

Evidence was then called for the plaintiff.

John Alexander Robertson stated that he was married to the defendant in July, 1889. They lived at Durban for some time, and in 1894 a post-nuptial contract was entered into. Subsequently he went to Johannesburg, where he was joined by his wife. In 1898 there was a little trouble over a friend of his, although he made no charge against his wife. At the end of 1898 his wife went on a visit to some friends in Natal, but never returned. He joined the irregular forces, and fought through the war. He had written to her innumerable times asking her to return, but she never sent him a reply.

The defendant was ordered to restore conjugal rights to the plaintiff by the 3rd July, failing which, to show cause on the 14th July why a decree of divorce should not be granted, and why she should not pay the costs of the suit, personal service to be effected forthwith.

Postea (July 14th). The rule was made absolute.

CROMBLEHOLME V. MARKS, HIGHMAN AND COMPANY.

Building contract—Extras.

This was an action brought by Albert Crombleholme to recover from the defendants the sum of £102 10s., being commission and salary for work done.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was a building contractor, residing at Stellenbosch, and the defendants, hotel proprietors, residing at the same place. On the 3rd January, 1903, it was agreed upon that the plaintiff was to complete certain alterations at the Masonic Hotel, Stellenbosch, and in consideration thereof he was to receive a monthly salary of £20. He was wrongfully and unlawfully dismissed in December last, when the work was not completed, and for the breach of contract he claimed a month's salary, £20. £75 being 2½ per cent. commission of the estimated sum of £3,000 to complete the work, and a bonus of £100, all of which were embodied in the contract, with interest and costs.

The plea admitted the formal allegations, but set out that the plaintiff was not diligent in his work, and was, therefore, not entitled to the bonus. The actual cost of the alterations was £6,704, and under the terms of the agreement the plaintiff was to pay 5 per cent. on the amount over and above his estimate of £3,000. In reconvention they claimed £185, from which they were willing to deduct £167 12s., being 2½ per cent. on £6,704, and £300 damages for the defendants' neglect in the execution of the contract.

The replication denied that the work cost £6,704, and the plaintiff put the defendants to the proof thereof. He also denied that he was guilty of any misconduct. Should the plaintiff in reconvention be entitled to 5 per cent. on any sum in excess of £3,000, the defendants were entitled to set off against that 2½ per cent. on the excess.

Mr. Close (with him Mr. M. Bisset) was for the plaintiff, and Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Gutsche) was for the defendant.

Mr. Close called the plaintiff, Albert Crombleholme, who stated that he was a building contractor, residing at Stellenbosch. In November last year the defendants saw him about the reconstruction of the Masonic Hotel. The work was pointed out to him by Mr. Highman.

It was agreed that he was to do the work in accordance with the plans and specifications, but he had never seen any specifications. During the course of the work, he had no control over the expenditure, and could merely give his opinion as to sub-contracts. The only specifications that existed were verbal specifications between witness and Highman. The old floors that had to be removed were a departure from the original scheme. He protested against the additional alterations, but they said it would not affect his commission. After the work was commenced several new alterations were ordered and carried out. He brought up an estimate of £2,400 over and above the £3,000 agreed upon. As the work was outlined to him on the first occasion, it ought not to have cost more than £4,000. There was never any complaint made about the way in which he did the work. He considered when he left on December 21 the work was practically done, and that a month would complete it. On December 21 he received a letter from Marks, thanking him for his work, and stating that his services would no longer be required. There was no discussion about what he was entitled to when it was agreed that he could devote a few hours to other work. He told Highman he was really entitled to a month's notice if the work was not actually finished. Witness never heard of the allegations that he was guilty of misconduct and neglect until these proceedings were commenced. He had diligently performed his part of the contract all through.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Witness had to do work on the ground floor and above. He did not ask the defendants to insert the conditions in the contract that if the work were done for less than £3,000 he should receive 5 per cent. on the difference between the actual cost and £3,000. The original plan provided for a dancing hall, but in lieu of that, stables were put up. In his statement witness allowed £500 for the hall not built, and charged £750 for the stable. Witness engaged and controlled the labour, and received the money every week to pay for the labour. He gave orders for material as he wanted it. He had protested against the alterations. He was approached by Dr. McPherson, and asked to do some work for him. He told Dr. McPherson he could not do the work, as he was under contract with defendants, but that he might find some men who would do it. Witness did some work for Dr. McPherson, such as writing orders out, which he did at night. He did not supervise this work; he went there occasionally in the evenings or on Saturday afternoons. Witness never went away from the Masonic in order to look after Dr. McPherson's work. To witness's recollection, he was not, in November or December, during working hours, at Dr. McPherson's property superintending the work there. He might have been there; there might have been many circumstances which would take him there. Witness did not take a contract from Abdol Fabier in October; his brother did. Witness did not attend to Fabier's work during the daytime. The arrangement with Fabier was not that witness should supervise his work. Witness had refused to let defendants have the working plans, after they told him they no longer required his services. Witness wanted to leave the service of the defendants in November, and offered to give certain hours of the day to supervising their work, so that he could be able to undertake other work which was offered him. Witness thought the building could have been completed in a month. He may have taken away some of the carpenters from this work to do a trifling job for him; he had no recollection that defendants paid the time of these men while they were doing his (witness's) work. If witness charged the wages to the defendant, he did so unintentionally. Marks complained of the slow progress of the work, and an arrangement was made that certain of the work should be done on piecework. Witness did not obstruct the men who were doing the piecework on contract; he gave them every facility. Witness had pulled down a portion of the work these men had done, because they had not done it correctly.

Jacobus Bloemestein, foreman carpenter on the work, said that the plaintiff seemed to him to work all right. He was surprised when he heard that plaintiff was dismissed.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He did not know why two men were put on piecework. He did not remember football playing during working hours. There were not enough carpenters on the job. Three men were dismissed before Cohn and Goldnicht came on the job.

Wm. Somerville, plumber, gave similar evidence. There was a difficulty about getting material, as a result of which work was delayed.

This concluded the evidence for the plaintiff.

By consent of the parties, His Lordship ordered that the matter be referred to Mr. A. T. Babbs, quantity surveyor, for report as to the difference between the work provided for in the plans and the work actually done, and that the case stand over until the 17th inst.

Postea (June 20th).

The report of Mr. Babbs was put in. In it he stated: In accordance with a consent paper dated June 7th, 1904, signed by the attorneys of the above parties in pursuance of an order granted by the Hon. Mr. Justice Hopley, on June 3, 1904, whereby certain questions in the case were referred to me, I now have the honour to send you my report. The consent paper above referred to directed me to ascertain and report upon: (1) The cost of re-building and reconstructing the premises known as the Masonic Hotel and Tap, Stellenbosch, according to the original plan and design furnished by the defendants to the plaintiff; (2) the additional cost incurred owing to the alterations made from the original plan and design. I have accordingly visited the Masonic Hotel at Stellenbosch, and inspected the premises in the presence of Mr. Marks and the plaintiff, and have taken all necessary notes, measurements, etc., and heard the explanations of the parties as to the various works carried out. I have also been furnished with the drawings of the work, and a copy of the specification originally deposited with the Municipality. In the light of the information and particulars thus obtained, I have taken off the quantities, and have prepared a careful independent estimate of the cost of the several works. With reference to question No. 1, I find the cost of the work necessary to rebuild and re-construct the premises according to the original plan to be £5,740. With reference to No. 2, I find the cost of the additional work actually carried out to be £1,554, from which there is to be deducted the sum of £1,009 for works omitted or executed at a less cost, making the net extra of £545. My estimate of the total cost, is therefore, £6,285. These estimates are framed as nearly as possible on a prime cost basis, and do not provide for any profit or commission, and are in accordance with the rates of labour and material prevailing at the time the works were carried out. I am confidently of opinion that it would be impossible to execute the works at a less cost than the amount I have stated."

Mr. Upington said the report left two questions to be decided, the amount of damages sustained by reason of wrongful dismissal, if there has been wrongful dismissal, and the question of the bonus, which the contract stipulated should be given for diligent and trustworthy services at the completion of the work.

Evidence was then led for the defence.

Teduschi Marks said that before purchasing materials Crombleholme went over the building with witness. Crombleholme had specifications, and estimated the price of the alterations. Witness wrote the letter of December 31, by which he dismissed the plaintiff. In the course of that letter he said, "As it is now considered the building is completed, we hereby beg to notify you that your kind services are no longer required after today. . . . Of course, we hope that in the event we may require you any day for a hour or so, you will be good enough to do so." Before that he had made complaints to Crombleholme. About three months previously he noticed that plaintiff was frequently away from the job, and he had had to leave his own work to superintend Crombleholme's work. Sometimes Crombleholme was away for two or three days. The men were idle because there was no one to look after them, and though the expense continued to be as great the rate of progress diminished. Witness got Cohen and Golding to finish work, which plaintiff ought to have done, and agreed to pay them £50. Cohen and Golding had complained to witness, and he had told plaintiff that they had represented to him that they could not get material. When he left the work plaintiff took with him the plans upon which Cohen and Golding had tendered, and without which the latter could not go on with their work. Witness had sent to plaintiff for these plans on three occasions, but could not get them. These were plans which plaintiff had prepared, and which were attached to Cohen and Golding's contract.

Mr. Uppington: I submit they had, my lord. He must give the workmen the details so as to enable them to do the work properly. The workmen could not possibly proceed with the building without having the working plans. These were the basis of the contract between these carpenters and the defendants.

Witness (continuing) said that in many respects the work was done diligently, particularly in the early stages, but during the last three months the work was disgracefully carried out. On one occasion the skylight was left open, and the rain came in, while on another occasion there was a leak in the roof, through which the water percolated very badly. The roof had been defectively constructed under plaintiff's supervision. It was not true that witness would not supply glass for this skylight. Before the dismissal, witness spoke to Crombleholme about his working at other places. Plaintiff told them that he had the Rhenish School contract, and that he wished to give up the hotel work. There were a number of things used in the work which defendants paid for, but which plaintiff retained possession of. On the 14th January, witness's solicitor wrote, demanding return of these, the articles being specified in the letter. The work was hindered in consequence of the men not having these things.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: Witness had not seen plaintiff remove any articles from the building, but he had admitted to witness that he had taken things. If plaintiff stayed away he would know witness would be aware of his absence. Plaintiff told witness, when he complained, that he did not care whether or not he got his bonus. He told witness he supposed he would not get it, as he had gone over his price, and witness replied that that was no reason why he should be less diligent. Crombleholme ordered the materials. Witness's chief complaint was that plaintiff was not at the work to superintend the men. The letter of the 31st December was meant to be sarcastic.

By the Court: He did not mean what he said in the letter of December 31. He wished to get rid of the plaintiff amicably, and so wrote in these terms.

Pierre Francois Haupt, auctioneer and broker, Stellenbosch, said he had had opportunities of seeing the progress of the work. At first he thought the work was carried on with due diligence. Later on he saw that the men were doing practically nothing. Everybody seemed to "boos" himself. The plaintiff was absent on a good many occasions during working hours. The rate of working was much slower when the plaintiff was absent. Mr. Marks called his attention later on to the billiard table at the hotel. He found that the water had come through the skylight on to the table. The frame of the skylight had been fixed, but no glazing had been done. On another occasion his attention was called to a leakage in the roof. He also noticed that the drainage was unsatisfactory. There was a bad smell in the billiard-room.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: He had acted as agent of the defendants. He thought he could have inspected the building himself very much better than Mr. Crombleholme did.

Joseph Cowin, carpenter, said that he had been in business with one Goldnek. They tendered for a certain work at the end of last year at defendant's premises. Their tender was accepted. He remembered certain skirting being broken. He spoke to Mr. Crombleholme about it, but the plaintiff made no reply. Whilst witness was there the work was going on very slowly. He was delayed about a fortnight because he could not get a plan from the plaintiff. He had to go to the Municipality for the plan. He was also hindered owing to want of material, but he had never spoken to Crombleholme about this. He had spoken to another man, who said he did not know where the material was, but he could never find Crombleholme.

Lars Larsen, carpenter, said he was working on the property, and always had enough work to do. If there were not material for one piece for work there was for another.

Sergeant-Major Pritchard, resident at the Masonic Hotel, said that on one day in April he had to put on an overcoat to get out of his bedroom into the passage owing to the water, which came through the roof. There had been leakages previously on the occasion of every rainfall.

Dr. McPherson, of Stellenbosch, deposed that in November last he entered into an arrangement with Crombleholme respecting stables, which witness wanted built. Crombleholme said he was very busy, but would try to get someone to come and do the work. Crombleholme made out quantities and so on, and men came and did the work. Sometimes witnesses paid the men, and sometimes Crombleholme did so. Crombleholme charged witness 7 per cent. He told witness he would see that the work was done properly.

Mr. Uppington closed his case, and counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

Hoppley, J.: The report of Mr. Babbs seems to have been very carefully compiled, and having regard to that report, it seems to me that the amount of the commissions in terms of the contract would work out something like this: The total cost of the building, as originally planned, would have been £5,740, and the amount of the extras, as they had actually been put up on the ground, was £1,554. But then there have been omissions from the original plans, which were estimated at £1,090, leaving a balance of extras of £545, which would not have been contemplated at the time this contract was entered into. Adding £545 to the original amount, it brought up the whole total of what the building actually cost to £6,285. Now, as to this £6,285, the plaintiff was entitled under the contract to 2½ per cent. commission, and that worked out at £157 10s. as to this sum, it must be diminished by £62 10s., which it was admitted had been paid to the plaintiff on account. Therefore, there would be due to him, if there were nothing to be set off against it, an amount of £95. But upon the contract, the cost seems to have been grossly underestimated. They seem both to have been equally negligent in this respect, for it seemed to me that by calling in a capable man who was able to survey, and take out quantities and so on, they could have arrived at a proper result; but they chose to make a wild shot at an estimate of what the work would cost. I think the plaintiff must be held to his bargain, and as he has undertaken to pay back 5 per cent. a sort of penalty on any excess above his estimate, that five per cent. on the real excess, namely, £2,740, would amount to £137. The case does not, however, stop there. There have also to be considered the further claims for damages. On the claim in reconvention, I think the plaintiff's (defendant in reconvention) view of his position is the correct one, and that he was entitled to keep the plans which he had himself prepared. It seems to me that the defendants have failed to prove any of their claims in reconvention. In regard to the claim for damages for wrongful dismissal I am not satisfied that in the month in respect of which wages were claimed, plaintiff had not earned that amount, or was not in a position to have earned it. Then comes the question of the bonus, and in regard to this, when I consider the terms of the handsome letter of the 31st December, in which the defendants thanked the plaintiff practically for his diligence, I cannot find that there was any want of diligence and trustworthiness which would disentitle the plaintiff from recovering the bonus. The letter almost estops the defendants from coming into Court, and I cannot on the face of that letter do anything but award the plaintiff his bonus. On the whole, therefore, I find the defendants entitled to the 5 per cent. on the excess cost, viz., £137. As against that amount, plaintiff is entitled to the £157 10s., as his 2½ per cent. on the total cost. The sum of £62 10s. has been paid to plaintiff, and this will leave a sum due to defendants of £42. Plaintiff has further succeeded in establishing his claim for the £100 as bonus, and deducting the £42, it will leave an amount due to him of £58, for which judgment will be given, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

BECKER V. HAZELL. { 1904.
{ June 6th.

Mr. Burton, for the applicant, moved for an order restraining the respondent from parting with or dealing with any assets of the assigned estate pending the decision of two actions in the estate of one Cohen.

Mr. D. Buchanan, for the respondent, said that he appeared merely to oppose the costs of the summons. The respondent did not oppose the application.

Mr. Burton said it seemed hard that the applicant should have to pay the costs, because it must be clear he incurred this expense at the special request of the creditors in the estate of Cohen, who asked him, as their servant, to carry on the business. The creditors declined to pay him, and now he was forced to come down on the respondent, who merely held the money without being a trustee in the estate, the order for sequestration of which had been discharged.

[De Villiers, C. J.: I cannot make any order as to costs against Hazell personally. Why not make it a claim in the action against the creditor Atmore.]

The summons is out already in that action. The costs of this application might be made to stand over pending the hearing of the action.

Mr. Buchanan said that the summons was against the respondent, who had no official capacity in the estate. It was necessary, counsel submitted, for the respondent to come to court.

De Villiers, C.J., said it appeared to him that if the respondent had properly incurred any costs in respect of the money he would be entitled afterwards in his account to the principals to charge any necessary expense. The Court would grant the order applied for, but there would be no order as to costs.

Ex parte BREYTENBACH.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the appointment of a curator in the estate of Hendrik Breytenbach and Anna Breytenbach in the interest of four minor children.

Order granted.

Ex parte BURNS.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers, for the applicant, Martin J. Burns, moved for leave to pass transfer of certain property in the estate of the late Patrick Burns and his deceased spouse.

Leave granted.

Ex parte KIEFT.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers, for the executor in the estate, moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to cancel a mortgage bond, which had been paid off in the estate of Apollós Korolos, and which after a diligent search could not be found.

A rule was granted calling on all concerned by the last day of the term to show cause why an order should not be made as prayed, one publication in "Ons Land" and a copy of the rule to be sent by registered letter to the mortgagee's son.

Postea (July 14th). The rule was made absolute.

AURET V. SMITH AND ANOTHER.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved to have made absolute a rule granted on the 7th June interdicting the respondent from drawing on the manager of the Standard Bank, at Muizenberg, any of the money in the name of the partnership. There had been due publication in the "Cape Times" and the "Government Gazette," and there had also been personal service on the bank manager at Muizenberg, the other respondent.

Rule made absolute, with costs only against the respondent Smith.

Ex parte MORUM.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for leave to execute and register a certain antenuptial contract which by an oversight had not been executed before marriage. Leave granted.

WILLIAMS V. THE MASTER.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers applied for an order discharging the attachment of the applicant's property, the Civil Service Club, Middelburg. Counsel said that the provisional order of sequestration was granted by the Eastern Districts Court against one Adams on the grounds that the property did not belong to the applicant. The affidavit of the applicant set out that he knew that the estate of H. Adams was placed under the provisional sequestration. He acquired the club from Adams prior to the sequestration for £715, of which £215 was paid in cash, and the balance four months from the date of sale. He was under the impression that Adams was disposing of the premises to pay off the debt he owed the petitioning creditors, Messrs. Haydorn and Co.

The Master said that according to the 13th section of the Insolvent Ordinance the Messenger of the Court should be accompanied by the petitioning creditor, who pointed out what goods should be attached.

De Villiers, C.J., said it was very important to know whether the sale to the applicant was the cause of the act of insolvency on the part of Adams, and ordered the matter to stand over for further information, and in the meantime the Master might be able to suggest the name of someone to act as provisional trustee.

Postea (June 16th).

Order and attachment set aside on condition that the applicant gives security to the satisfaction of the R.M. of Middelburg in the sum of £500 for the restoration to the insolvent estate of H. Adams of the property mentioned; in case it should be decided in an action that the property belongs to the estate, and not to the applicant, the costs of the application to stand over.

Ex parte THE PAARLSOME LAND-AANKOOP MAATSCHAPPY.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order confirming the final report of the arbitrators in the estate of the Paarlische Landaankoop Maatschappij. The assets amounted to £1,674 6s. 9d., and the liabilities £87 17s. 3d., leaving a balance of £1,586 9s. 6d., which they proposed to distribute by payment of the claim of £1,471, leaving a balance of £114 19s. 6d., and they prayed that they might be granted £100 for their fees, and that the £14 19s. 6d. be applied to advertisements, stamps, etc.

Order granted.

VAN HEERDEN V. ESTATE { 1904.
VAN HEERDEN. { June 6th.
" 7th.

Executor—Payment of debts—
Compromise or transaction—
Exception to plea.

The plaintiff claimed from the estate of a deceased person the sum of £2,500, alleged to have been a debt owing by the deceased to the plaintiff. The defendant, as executrix, disputed the debt, but afterwards compromised the claim by undertaking to pay a certain sum in annual instalments. In an action brought for payment of one of the instalments, the defendant pleaded that no debt was ever owing by the deceased, and that consequently nothing was owing under the compromise.

Held on exceptions to the plea, that an executor should pay only such debts as were actually owing by the estate, and the exceptions were consequently not allowed, but leave was reserved to the plaintiff to raise the question at the trial whether the compromise was for the benefit of the estate.

This was an argument on exceptions arising out of an action instituted by Johanna van Heerden against the first defendant, Martha van Heerden, in her capacity as the executrix testamentary in the estate of the late Izaak van Heerden. The declaration set out that the plaintiff was the widow of Jacobus van Heerden, son of the late Izaak van Heerden. The second defendant was appointed as curator ad litem to the children of the plaintiff. The late Izaak van Heerden was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £2,500, by virtue of a promissory note. The first defendant, as executor testamentary to the estate, disputed the said promissory note. On the 11th July, 1898, the plaintiff and the first defendant entered into an agreement whereby the latter agreed to pay to the plaintiff as long as she remained unmarried £135 per annum, and, further, on the expiration of the lease on certain farms, that the plaintiff was to have possession on payment of £500, the balance of a mortgage bond. The defendant agreed to give an extension of time from June, 1903, to the 31st January, 1904, to the plaintiff to consider whether she should pay the £500. Plaintiff tendered the £500 before the time, but the defendant now refused to deliver up possession of the farms. Plaintiff claimed judgment in her action for £67 10s., with interest from the 31st December, 1903, an order compelling the defendant, upon payment of the sum of £500, to deliver up possession of the farms, an order compelling the defendant to account for and pay over to the plaintiff all rent received in respect to the said farms, since 1st July, 1903; or, in the alternative, judgment for £2,500, the amount of the promissory note, less what instalment had been paid to the plaintiff, with costs of suit.

The defendant, in her plea, denied that the said Izaak van Heerden was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £2,500; and, further, that she had entered into the agreement without the knowledge or consent of the other heirs, and that, by doing so, she exceeded her capacity as executrix testamentary. She refused to be bound by the agreement, which could have no force or effect in law. In reconvention, she claimed £675, which was the amount of certain annual payments to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff excepted to this plea on the ground that the same disclosed no defence in the action, the first defendant, as executrix testamentary in the estate of Izaak van Heerden, having full power in law to enter into the agreement. The plaintiff also excepted to the claim in reconvention, as it disclosed no ground to return the sums of money referred to.

Mr. W. P. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. D. Buchanan) was for the plaintiff; Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Close) was for the first defendant; and Mr. McGregor was for the curator ad litem, the second defendant.

Counsel having been heard in argument.

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea (June 7th).

De Villiers, C.J.: There can be no doubt that a compromise was entered into by the executrix, but the defence raised is that there was really no debt owing by the estate, and that consequently the executrix had no right in law to enter into any compromise. The plea expressly states that there was no debt owing, and consequently it denies the right of the executrix to enter into this compromise. To the plea an exception was taken, that it was really no defence in law, inasmuch as the compromise was perfectly binding on both parties. I quite accept the general statements of the law by Mr. Schreiner in regard to the effects of the compromise, but it is just because the compromise has such far-reaching effects that the Court should scrutinise whether the persons had full power to effect it.

It was the duty of the defendant, as executrix, to pay the debts of the estate, and if the plea is correct in stating that there was no debt whatever owing, then the executrix had no authority whatever to compromise. It is impossible, therefore, to hold that the plea is bad, but as the plaintiff may be able to prove at the trial that it was for the benefit of the estate that the compromise should be entered into, no final order will now be made on the exceptions. The costs of this argument will abide the result.

TRIAL CAUSES.

SOYERS V. SOYERS. { 1904.
June 6th.

This was an action brought by Mrs. Soyers, of Prince Albert, against her husband, James Edward Soyers, late of Prince Albert, for divorce, on the ground of his malicious desertion and adultery. Plaintiff also prayed for custody of the child and for a declaration that the defendant had forfeited the benefits of the marriage in community. Mr. Struben appeared for the petitioner; the defendant was in default.

Mr. Thomas Birch, clerk in charge of the marriage register, Colonial Office, produced the marriage register, showing that the marriage took place at Prince Albert on the 19th September, 1887.

The plaintiff said they lived together for twelve years. Her husband left her in September, 1899, while she was living at Prince Albert; he went and lived in a house near by with a woman named Drich Meyer. He went away some time afterwards, and witness discovered that he was subsequently living at Kalk Bay with a woman. She had not seen the defendant since he left Prince Albert.

Rose Lawott, of Prince Albert, gave corroborative evidence.

Mr. Struben said that he had subpoenaed Constable Molloy, of the Simon's Town section, to give evidence as to the adultery of the defendant near Kalk Bay, but the witness had not put in an appearance.

The plaintiff was recalled, and gave further evidence with reference to the relationships of the defendant with the woman Meyer.

Hopley, J., said he thought there was sufficient evidence of the adultery, and he would grant a decree of divorce, with custody of the child and costs of suit.

PEEK BROS. V. AUSTRALIAN
BRICKFIELDS LTD. { 1904.
June 6th.

Contract — Bricks — Custom of trade.

No alleged trade custom can be pleaded against the express terms of a written contract.

This was an action brought by James and Wm. Peek, brickmakers and burners, of Observatory-road, against the Australian Brickfields, Ltd., of Cape Town, for £183 3s. 3d., for making certain bricks under contract, £44 1s. 6d. for work in connection with the packing and running of bricks, and £119 3s. 6d. damages for breach of contract, with interest a tempore morae and costs.

The declaration set out that on or about the 2nd July, 1903, the defendants entered into a written contract to employ the plaintiffs to make, burn, and deliver on the defendants' property one million bricks at 25s. per 1,000, defendants to supply clay, buy mills, moulds, etc. Plaintiffs thereupon went to work, and at the end of November had made and burned and delivered to the defendants 523,373 bricks, for which the price was £654 2s. 7d. The defendants paid £470 19s. 4d., leaving a balance due to the plaintiffs of £183 3s. 3d. Then, in December last, the plaintiffs packed and burned on behalf of the defendants 176,300 bricks, not part of the aforementioned contract, for which they were to receive 5s. per 1,000. Plaintiffs said that a reasonable price for this work was £44 1s. 6d. Plaintiffs had demanded from the defendants payment of the said sums, but the defendants had refused, and still refused to pay these sums, or any part thereof. In November, 1903, the defendants, in breach of the said contract, refused to pay for any more bricks, and took away the moulds and necessary tools. By reason of the said defendants' breach of contract, the plaintiffs had been deprived of the profits which would have been made on the said contract, and had sustained damages in the sum of £119 3s. 2d.

The defendants, in their plea, said that the plaintiffs undertook to make, burn, and deliver to the defendants for 25s. per 1,000 one million thoroughly good, sound, well-burnt bricks, including not less than 75 per cent. of bricks which conformed in quality and colour to a certain sample known as blue hard. It was further provided that only properly-burnt bricks would be paid over. Plaintiffs delivered to the defendants 523,000 odd bricks, whereof by far the greater number did not conform in quality or colour to the said sample. Plaintiffs were ready and willing to accept 411,000 and to pay for the same, but the remaining quantity were wholly useless and valueless. They had paid the plaintiffs the sum of £470 19s. 4d., and now tendered £43 0s. 8d., being the price of 411,119 bricks, viz., £514, less £470 paid on account. The defendants admitted that one of the plaintiffs, James Peek, did run, stack, and burn certain bricks, part of the contract, with one Stallard, for 176,000, of which 20,000 had been run and stacked, and that there was due to the said James Peek, in respect of the bricks so packed £43 1s. 9d., whereof £3 10s. had been paid to the said Stallard and £33 11s. to the plaintiff, leaving a balance due to the plaintiffs of £6 0s. 9d. Defendants did not admit that the said sum could be lawfully claimed in this action, but, for the final ending of disputes, they had tendered and now tender £6 0s. 9d. The plaintiffs had sustained no damages for which the defendants were liable, and, subject to the above tender, they prayed that the claim be dismissed, with costs.

James Peek, one of the plaintiffs, said that, before they entered into the contract, he went to the defendants' works at Stellenbosch. He was shown a hole which contained very good clay, and, in fact, he saw no other hole. When they came to work, they did not receive any clay from this particular hole.

Hopley, J., said that this was not the time to raise such a point, but it ought to have been raised, if at all, when the contract was in course of execution.

Mr. Wilkinson said he was only leading this evidence formally.

Mr. Upington said that he wished to enter an objection against evidence being led outside the pleadings.

Witness (continuing his evidence) said that very poor clay was supplied to them with which to work, and a large quantity of the stuff had to be thrown out. There was a good deal of bottom soil in the stuff. He entered a protest with Mr. Downes, the manager, who said that he would take the consequences. He had turned out 523,000 bricks according to sample. The contract specified 75 per cent. of the quality and colour of the sample; he should say that 80 to 90 per cent. were according to quality and colour of the sample. He could not be responsible for breakages that were due to rotten clay having been supplied to him. The defendants supplied him with two double pug mills, with one horse each. The mills should have had two or three horses each to be properly worked. He had to alter the mills. He was constantly asked for more horses for the mills. No complaints were made about the quality of the bricks until late in October or the beginning of November, when Mr. Downes took away one of the horses, saying that he was overworking the animal. Downes also stopped two of the men. Witness lodged a complaint with the secretary. Mr. Downes frequently interfered during the last few weeks of the contract, and said that the bricks were too small and poor in quality. Witness told him to throw out the unsatisfactory bricks, but Downes threw away some good bricks. Downes was not a practical brickmaker. The bricks were made from moulds supplied by the defendants. In November none of the bricks he had burned had been sold; at the present time all the bricks had gone, except for about 160,000. A week ago he saw about 90,000 bricks he had made in a clamp on the defendants' property; 85 per cent. of those were of the quality and colour of the sample. He formed his estimate from what he had seen of the stripping of the clamp, which had been carried out about 3 or 4 yards deep all round.

Mr. Wilkinson: You are a practical brickmaker? How long have you been in the trade?

Witness: I was brought up with a brick in my mouth, as they say. My father was a brickmaker, and is so in England to-day. Continuing his evidence, witness said he had seen all the kilns of the bricks he had made broken into. The first kiln was the worst lot, and contained about 50 per cent. of bricks equal to sample. In the other kilns all the bricks were first-rate and equal to sample. The waste would not average above 2½ to 3 per cent. A good deal of the waste was occasioned by the way in which the defendants had pulled the kilns about. A lot of the waste described by the defendants was not waste at all; half bricks and three-quarter bricks were not waste. Two half bricks made a whole brick; they were recognised as such on brick-fields and among builders. From 8 to 10 per cent. had been put to one side by the defendants as waste; fully one half of the quantity were not waste. There were half bricks and whole bricks amongst the heap. The bricks had been carelessly sorted. He was afterwards asked by the company to pack some of the clamps of the defendants. A good deal of the waste was due to the faulty unpacking of the clamps by defendants' servants, probably 3 to 5 per cent. of the waste being attributable to this cause. A further 2 to 3 per cent. of waste was occasioned by the removal of the bricks on the line. Finally, Downes stopped the workmen at the end of November, and removed the horses, tools, and so on, and witness could not proceed with the work. Witness saw the secretary of the company, but was told that he could not do anything until a meeting of the directors had been held. He called several times afterwards, and got no answer. After the meeting he saw Mr. Firth, one of the directors. In January, he sent a statement of account to the company, but the directors told him that they could not see that they owed him anything, and that as far as they could see, he had not been stopped, but had stopped himself. A little after he had given up work, the defendants ceased to make bricks at that place. About this time, too, the demand for bricks had fallen off a good deal, and sales were difficult to effect. He had repeatedly applied to be allowed to complete his contract, but had been refused facilities. The defendants ultimately sent him a letter, in which they claimed to have a balance against him of £41 1s. 10d. for loss sustained. They said that there was waste to the extent of 112,181 bricks, which, at 15s. per 1,000, amounted to £84 2s. 6d. With regard to the packing and burning of the machine-made bricks, this was a transaction not between himself and the defendants, but witness and his brother and the defendants. With regard to the claim for damages, he had sustained 5s. per 1,000 damages upon the balance of the million bricks which he should have made. Witness went with other gentlemen to look at the only remaining kiln that he made on the 31st May.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: The brick (produced) was not the one that he signed for as sample. The brick he signed for was not as good as the one produced, and was not of the same colour. The sample that he signed for was equal to the broken brick now produced. He did not know that large quantities of bricks which he had made had been rejected. He objected to clause (e) of the contract, that only entire and blue hard bricks were to be paid for. The total number of bricks that came out of his kiln was 523,000 odd. He had not counted the number of thoroughly good, hard, well-burnt bricks. The spot from which he had to take the clay was pointed out to him before he entered into the contract. This was the old pit. The pug mill was removed from the old pit to a point about 200 yards away, but this was for the defendants' convenience, and left them room to lay down the green bricks. The usual price for bricks was 22s. 6d. to 25s. a thousand.

Mr. Upington: This was a very good price that you were getting from the defendants?

Witness: Not under the conditions that I had to work under. I had to pay more for my labour than anybody else did. It was three miles from the village.

Cross-examination continued: Witness received 30s. per 1,000 at the Paarl. The only difference between the two contracts was that he had to dig the clay at the Paarl. His brother received a letter from the company complaining that he (witness) had treated disrespectfully Mr. Downes, the manager, and that he was not complying with the terms of clause (e) of the contract. He admitted that in the correspondence with regard to the proposal to submit the matter to arbitration, no mention was made of damages for breach of contract, and that it was not until he had given instructions to his present attorney that such a claim was mentioned. The only explanation he had as to the reason of being stopped was that the company could not get a market for their bricks.

Re-examined: It was not until witness had sent in his account that the suggestion was made that he had given up the work voluntarily. He challenged the manager to a comparison between the bricks that he (witness) was producing, and those produced at Salt River and Woodstock.

Wm. Peek, brother of the last witness, gave corroborative evidence upon several points. He said that he did not think Mr. Downes was a practical brick-maker, because the latter asked him about the plant, and the various classes of bricks, etc. He saw Mr. Downes interfere with the work on several occasions. The horse at the pug mill was worked ten hours a day; he thought that that was too long, and they applied to the defendants for more horses. He considered that 5 to 10 per cent. waste should be allowed for the removal of bricks. He should think about 15 per cent. of waste went on in this brickfield, owing to faulty supervision; under ordinary circumstances, he thought the waste should not be more than 8 per cent.

Cross-examined: They thought they would get clay out of the old clay pit. The clay with which they were supplied was largely black clay, the company having taken away most of the best parts. There was work for two horses on each of the mills. He thought it was quite right to take the horses five times round the pug mill without a stop. In England the horses went round with the mill without any stop except for meals. He was confident that the brick (produced) was not the sample brick on which the contract was taken. The sample brick bore his own and his brother's initials, and also the initials of two directors. The sample brick was of about the same quality as the broken brick (produced).

Walter Peek, brother of the plaintiffs, said that he was a brickmaker. The clay supplied to the plaintiffs with which to carry out the contract was of very inferior quality. In regard to the clamps of bricks made by the plaintiffs, Nos. 2 and 3 were blue hard bricks, but No. 1 clamp was not so good, and consisted mainly of red hards and seconds. No. 1 clamp contained from 8 to 10 per cent. of waste; in the other kilns, from 80 to 90 per cent. were good blue hards. As to the latter, if the bricks were moved by good practical men, the waste would be from 2 to 3 per cent., while, if moved in the way the defendants moved them, the waste would be from 8 to 10 per cent. There were some half bricks; the defendants threw these out. They should have used the half bricks. If people ordered a thousand bricks, they expected to get a number of half bricks.

[Hopley, J.: Not if your contract says whole bricks, and that is what this contract says, as far as I can see.]

Witness, continuing his evidence, said that the general working at the brickfields was unskilful. He thought the unpacking of the kilns was carried out in a negligent manner. The bricks made by the plaintiffs were equal to the first sample produced by the defendants. In regard to the pug mills, supplied by the defendants, the machines were of extraordinary size; witness had not seen such pug mills before, either in England or anywhere else. Two or three horses were really required to work them properly. The manager (Mr. Downes) stopped both mills, and took away each of the horses.

Cross-examined by Mr. Alexander: Witness formed his estimate as to the quality of the bricks in the kiln from those that he saw at the top. If the top bricks were good, those underneath were certain to be good.

Re-examined: The brick produced was machine made by the defendant company. It was a very inferior brick, and seemed to have been both boiled and baked. The brick had certainly been steamed.

[Hopley, J. (to Mr. Wilkinson): Surely we are not trying the class of work that the defendant company do?]

No, my lord, but this just goes to show the general carelessness which is displayed by their whole staff.

Titus Amos, brick moulder, formerly in the plaintiffs' employ, gave evidence as to the pug mills having been interfered with by the defendants' manager, Mr. Downes.

Harry Hendricks, another brick-moulder, formerly in the plaintiffs' employ, gave similar evidence.

Johannes Petrus Jacobus de Villiers, carting contractor, Stellenbosch, said that he had been in the defendants' service and that he was discharged in November last by Mr. Downes, who said that the brickfield was stopped. He had always thought that the pug-mills should be worked by two horses each and had complained to Mr. Downes about only one horse being inspanned to each machine. Mr. Downes told him when he terminated his engagement that they could not get a price for the bricks.

Solomon Henecker, brick-moulder, Stellenbosch, formerly in the plaintiffs' employ, also gave evidence.

John Edgar Pearson, manager of the Fernwood Brick and Tile Co., Newlands, said that he was a practical brick and pottery manufacturer and had gained Colonial and International medals. He visited in May the clamps pointed out to him as having been made by Peeks. The bricks were blue hards of very good quality. In the kiln he saw the bricks had been carefully packed, but had been unpacked badly and a good many bricks had been broken. In the kiln pointed out to him about 90 per cent. of the bricks were blue hards in colour. There was a great amount of waste lying about through the unpacking, which was unskilled, but he thought the chief amount of waste was due to the quality of the clay from which the bricks were made. There had been a "slump" in the brick trade during the last year and a half. It became acute about twelve months ago. There was a slight ascendancy about six months ago, and there was a slight ascendancy yet. In the clamps he saw about 75 per cent. would be equal to the samples produced by the defendants.

Mr. Wilkinson: Did you see the pug mills?

Witness: I saw something that imitated a pug mill.

Mr. Wilkinson: Would you have such mills on your premises?

Witness: No. Continuing his evidence, witness said that the machine was a two-horse or steam-mill.

Cross-examined by Mr. Alexander: His company had been in existence one and a half to two years. Their output had been one and a half million bricks. His output at present was nothing; he has stocked his yard owing to the weather. His ancestors went back about 300 years in this particular trade. About 80 per cent. of the bricks conformed in quality to the samples produced by the defendants.

Alfred Charlton Reid, brickmaker, Rochester Works, George Sargent, manager of the Government Brickworks at Maitland, and Henry John Reid, foreman setter, Rochester Brick Works, gave further evidence to the effect that they made an inspection of a kiln at the defendants' brickfields, Stellenbosch, on May 31st, and that the bricks, which had been made by the defendant, were about 80 or 90 per cent. blue hards.

They all agreed that a good deal of waste had been occasioned by unskilful unpacking. The witness Sargent declared that he thought the defendants must have caused a considerable portion of the waste for the purposes of this case. He admitted that he did not count the bricks.

Mr. Wilkinson: How long would it take to count the 300,000 bricks that the defendants allege were there?—Witness: About twelve months.

The witness H. J. Reid, described the pug mills as "curiosities," they were huge tube with a large blade to grind dirt.

Roland John Wilkinson, articled clerk to the plaintiffs' attorney, having given evidence, Wm. Brown, master brickmaker, Cape Town, said that he went to the field at Stellenbosch on Saturday and saw a kiln of bricks pointed out to him as having been made by the plaintiffs. He judged that the bricks were 90 per cent. of them equal to the sample produced by the defendants. He considered that a good part of the waste had been brought about by careless unpacking.

Mr. Wilkinson closed his case.

George Septimus Firth, C.E., managing director of the defendant company, said he went to the works at Stellenbosch on the 2nd January and saw James Peek stacking bricks on the ground. He saw three kilns. No. 1 was very bad in regard to waste; No. 2 was better, and No. 3 was still better. He should say that No. 1 was 75 to 80 per cent. bad, and No. 2 was "patchy," with bars of seconds running right across the kiln. No. 3 was undoubtedly the best. Later in the month James Peek called at the office for his money, and witness told him that he did not think anything was due to the plaintiffs. Peek said that they had been knocked off at the works by the manager. Mr. Downes (the manager) contradicted Peek, and Mr. Hudson was asked about this and he also denied that the Peeks had been knocked off the work. Witness counted the bricks on the 21st April by calculations made on the basis of the contents. In kiln No. 3 he found standing 116,384 bricks; he deducted 5 per cent. for waste, leaving 110,565 bricks, of which two-thirds were blue hard and one-third red hard. He took the bottom of the kiln separately where there were 4,560 seconds in the fire-holes. The kiln had been opened up since and he found that his allowance for waste had been too small. He also found 10,748 seconds stacked round the kiln. There were 13 heaps removed from No. 1 and No. 2 kilns, holding 27,888 blues, 68,170 reds, and 150,337 seconds. The No. 1 and No. 2 kilns had been dispensed with by this date. Up to that time they had sold 15,100 to Jenkinson, 11,000 to the Stellenbosch Council, and 6,000 to Pieter Louw. The number of whole bricks thus made by the plaintiffs was: blue hard, 118,598; red hard, 105,025; seconds, 180,745; total, 404,368. The defendants tendered payment for 411,000. The figures showed a waste of 119,005 as compared with the total claimed by the plaintiffs, viz., 523,373. The company took a contract at Newlands and supplied 15,100 bricks made by the plaintiffs, which were rejected. As far as he could see, the large proportion of waste was due to using too much ash in the production of the bricks, making them brittle. The plaintiffs knew perfectly well that they could not get their clay from the old clay-pit, and that they would have to be supplied from the new clay-pit. He did not think there was a great deal of difference between the two clays, except that the new pit yielded more black stuff.

Cross-examined: He admitted that there were flaws in the sample brick produced by the defendants in connection with the contract. He was sure that if half the proportion of ash had been used the bricks would have been much better. He could not suggest any reason why the Peeks should have used a good deal of ash unless they thought they would get the bricks harder.

Geo. S. Firth, managing director of the defendant company, in further cross-examination, said that, practically speaking, none of the bricks conformed to samples. He considered that the evidence given by expert witnesses on the other side to the effect that 80 or 90 per cent. were equal to sample was absolutely false. He was not a brickmaker, but he had had control of eight yards at one time, and had had experience of managing a brickfield for four years. He thought the evidence given by Messrs. Sargent, Pearson, Reid, and Brown was absolutely false. The bulk of the bricks of No. 1 and No. 2 kilns were still on the ground, but the kilns had been dismantled, so that the bricks could be counted. He did not think it was unfair not to have informed the plaintiffs that they were dismantling the kilns in order to count them. He did not know why they did not communicate with the plaintiffs. The company had a farm, on which they had used bricks made by the plaintiffs. These bricks were used by the company subsequently to the 21st April, and had been included in the returns he gave as bricks lying on the ground on that date. On the 14th May, 1,500 bricks went to the farm, on the 15th 1,600, and on the 17th 2,000. He had accounted for all the hand-made bricks that had been sold by the company. Only machine-made bricks were sold to the Cape Town Municipality; 50,000 were sold under contract to the City Council. None of these had been made by Peeks. He was not aware that a number of Peeks' bricks had been sold through an agent named Grey to Howard and Scott. The witnesses on the other side were utterly wrong when they said that the company had thrown whole bricks away among the waste. The two bricks (produced) had run together, not through the excessive use of ash, but because of heat, and they must have been taken from close to the fire holes.

By the Court: Work was temporarily suspended at the brickfields owing to the slackness of trade. The brickfields had not been abandoned by the company, and the company had still a large quantity of bricks there.

Thomas Henry Downes, late overseer of the defendants' brickfields at Stellenbosch, said that Wm. Peek continued at the yard until the 27th November, but James Peek remained there some time longer, stacking the bricks. The two bricks he now produced illustrated the cause of the trouble. The trouble arose when the bricks were in the green state. He complained to the Peeks about the moulds not being properly filled. He had had to complain about the way the horses were being worked. He saw the boys' whipping and trotting the animals, and he took the horses away on two occasions. The plaintiffs paid no notice to his complaints for a while. They did not pay very much attention to the work, but seemed intent simply on getting the number of bricks completed. He restored the horses to the pug mills again on both occasions. The treatment of the horses by the plaintiffs improved. Hudson (one of the directors) came out to Stellenbosch, and told the Peeks that the bricks they were making were not bricks at all, and that they would have to make a better brick, and have to satisfy witness. The Peeks then said that if the company proposed to be so strict that they would knock off on Saturday. James Peek told the boys they need not continue later than the Saturday. Peeks told him on the 27th November that they were knocking off that day. He denied having taken away the tools from the plaintiffs. He did not give the Peeks any notice to stop off work. In connection with Stallard's contract, the total bricks burned and stacked was 176,370, but of these 4,000 were burnovers, leaving 172,370. Stallard paid £3 10s. for running and stacking 20,000 bricks, and the company also allowed Peek £1 10s. for burning these bricks. That left 152,370, run stacked, and burned by James Peek, which, at 5s. per 1,000, amounted to £38 1s. 9d. The company had paid to James Peek £33 11s., thus showing a balance of £5 0s. 9d. in favour of the plaintiffs. This sum the defendants tendered. Witness denied that there had been any carelessness in unpacking, or that waste had been occasioned through this cause. They used men for unpacking whom Peeks themselves had employed. He took an exact calculation of the bricks on the 20th May, and he found there were 405,396 bricks on the ground. Even these were not all entire bricks, but he made a liberal allowance. The fault of the plaintiffs' bricks was that too much ash had been used; the company used about half the proportion that the plaintiffs used. Both the plaintiffs and the company used clay from the same pit, only, if anything, the company used more of the black stuff.

Cross-examined: He had not made any bricks himself, but he had been in the building trade many years, and he was a good judge of bricks. He denied having stood by the pug-mills timing the horses. He did not discharge one of the boys because he had laughed at him. He could tell within half a dozen bricks how many bricks there were in a stack by measuring. He did not think that a mere look at a kiln enabled even a practical brickmaker to say with accuracy the number of bricks in a kiln. He did not believe in rule of thumb. The brick (produced) appeared to have been steamed, owing to the wet weather. He had never heard the term "boiled brick." There had been no waste of bricks by the defendants such as had been described by the plaintiffs and their witnesses; they were also wrong in regard to the percentage of good blue hards. None of the bricks had come to Cape Town.

Frank B. Cliffe, secretary of the defendant company, said that, in consequence of a complaint by Downes, he wrote to the plaintiffs, pointing out that they were not making proper bricks, and that they were ill-using the horses, and also drawing their attention to clause (e) of the contract, in which the kind of brick was specified. The company had allowed the plaintiffs for 411,000 bricks, which was more than they had shown of entire bricks. Of the bricks made by Peeks, the company had sold 57,700.

Cross-examined: When they closed their works at Stellenbosch, trade was not "too good." They stopped making bricks by machinery. He did not know that people generally preferred machine-made bricks. He did not know that the market generally was better for machine-made than hand-made bricks.

By the Court: Hand-made bricks were rather cheaper.

Cross-examination continued: He had been in this trade ever since the company started in July or August, 1902. He did not remember James Peek coming to Cape Town soon after the contract had stopped, and speaking to him about payments. Peek might have called, but witness did not recollect any distinct occasion.

Wm. Lindley, manager of the Caporn Brickmaking Co., said that he had counted the bricks lying on the field at Stellenbosch. He found 313,000 bricks there, made up thus: blues, 77,000 odd; reds, 85,000 odd; seconds, 140,000 odd. Of the blues, 15 per cent. were equal to the sample. The reds and seconds did not comply with the terms of the contract either in colour or quantity.

Cross-examined: He had not made a brick himself. He had had fifteen years' experience of supervising and governing. Generally speaking, one could draw an inference as to the contents of a kiln after seeing the outside stripped and looking down from the top. He did not say it was always a safe inference.

Mr. Wilkinson (in further examination) asked witness if he were in Court yesterday.

Witness: Yes; and the day before. He thought that the estimate of 90 per cent. blue hards put in for the plaintiffs was absolutely incorrect.

The witness Sargent was recalled by his lordship in order to explain the meaning of the term "bolt" applied to a stack of bricks.

The witness Lindley (in further examination) said that he had not heard the term until yesterday, and he thought it would be a provincialism.

Mr. Wilkinson: Yes, apparently because you are not acquainted with it.

Witness said that he thought too much ash had been used in the making of the bricks.

Archibald Dichmont, builder, Cape Town, a director of the Central Brick and Tile Co., said he agreed with the witness Lindley as to the number of bricks on the ground and the proportion of blues, reds, and seconds, and percentage of bricks equal to sample.

Romeo Bisalati, in the employment of the Australian Brickfield Co., stated that sometime in November he stopped bringing clay, on the instructions of the plaintiff.

Mr. Upington closed his case.

Mr. Wilkinson said that the question arose on the contract between the parties whether whole bricks only were to be paid for, or whether, in accordance with the custom of the trade, a fair percentage of portions of bricks should also be paid for. This contract bore on its face marks of having been prepared by a person not skilled in the trade, otherwise it would not have borne the word "entire." He submitted that the real meaning of the contract was that the terms referred to in Peek's letter in reply to the defendants were substituted for clause (E) in the contract. On the question as to who had broken the contract, he urged that all the direct evidence, except that of Mr. Downes (defendants' manager at Stellenbosch) supported the view that the contract was put an end to by Mr. Downes and not by the plaintiffs. On the point of advantage, he contended that it was all to Peek's advantage that the contract should not be broken. Considering the state of trade, it was very much to the defendants' interest to get rid of the contract. Not only was the overwhelming mass of evidence in favour of the view that, not the plaintiffs, but Downes himself, broke the contract, but that evidence was also confirmed by the probabilities of the case. He also submitted that the absence of any correspondence was more telling against the defendants—a proper business house—really than the plaintiffs, who were masters of the working-class type. The defendants in their plea admitted that the number of bricks claimed for by the plaintiffs were delivered, but they said that the great proportion did "not conform in colour or quality to the sample which was the basis of the contract." He contended that the weight of evidence was overwhelmingly in favour of the plaintiffs' version as to the character of the bricks. Counsel commented on the limited amount of technical knowledge as to brickmaking on the part of the defendants' witnesses, and asked whether these men were really competent to decide the quality of the bricks?

Hopley, J., put it to counsel whether, after all, the question was not so much the quality of the bricks as the quantity, and whether the half-bricks and three-quarter bricks should be regarded as embraced by the contract.

Mr. Wilkinson said he thanked his lordship for the question. Everything, he contended, went to show the superior "skill" of the witnesses called by the plaintiffs, and they all confirmed the evidence of the Peeks. These things should be taken into account when weighing the evidence as to the counting of the bricks. The very method adopted by the defendants in counting revealed their unskillfulness, their ignorance of the trade. Counsel submitted that there was clear evidence of a good deal of unnecessary waste in the bricks made by the plaintiffs, having been occasioned by the negligent and careless work of the company's servants.

Mr. Upington was not called upon.

Hopley, J., said he did not think it was necessary to call upon counsel for the defendants to argue their view of the situation. He thought he was in a position without further elucidation from their side to give judgment in this case to the best of his ability. He admitted he felt some sympathy for the plaintiffs in this matter, but that sympathy was to a large extent limited to this point, that he thought it was a great pity that it was not possible for them to get this matter arbitrated upon and settled in a very much less expensive way than had eventually become necessary. He thought it was a pity, and he was sorry that the plaintiffs had been advised—he did not say by their legal advisers, but by their friends possibly—that they had such a claim in this contract paid on proof that the machine could fulfil the conditions specified, and the balance within 30 days. About the middle of October the defendant notified to the plaintiff that he would not accept the plant, as it had not been shipped.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers), was for the plaintiff; and Mr. W. P. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. W. P. Buchanan), was for the defendant.

Frank Cook, plaintiff, stated he represented Fawcett's, of England. Mr. Alex. Murray, of Murray and Co., introduced the defendant to him. Witness guaranteed the portable machine would make from 6,000 to 8,000 bricks daily, and that he would have it within three months' time. A week later an agreement was entered into, and the defendant agreed to buy the machine for £275. Witness did not undertake that the plant should arrive within a month. Within a couple of hours of the contract he cabled to hurry the machine on. On the 27th November he wrote to the defendant stating when his plant would arrive, and asking him if he could book him an order for coke and coal which was coming by the same steamer. The defendant did not say in October that he would not accept it; if he had done so, witness would have stopped the machine leaving England. The goods arrived about the 8th January, and a few days later he saw the defendant, who refused to accept the plant, stating that it was on order six months. On the 21st January the defendant's attorneys wrote stating that the reason their client refused the machine was because it was not delivered within "reasonable time." From October last year the brickmaking trade commenced to fall, until January, when it was difficult to sell bricks.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: About the 14th of September he first saw the defendant, but that was not the occasion on which the arrangement was entered into. The defendant asked to have the machine hurried up. Witness did not say that the machine was coming forward. He could not say if there were any negotiations with regard to a machine for East London. The cable was sent at the defendant's suggestion. The defendant called, and sometimes missed witness at the office. He knew that the brickmaking business was half way through in January. The defendant did not say in October that he would not accept the machine.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: If they had repudiated in October, or November, he could have cabled and stopped the machine.

Harry Davis, secretary of the Croydon Brick Company, corroborated what Mr. Cook had said about the brickmaking trade from September last.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: A man wanting to build for himself would naturally benefit by the hurrying out of the machine.

The evidence of Alex. Murray, taken on commission, showed that the bargain was struck on the 21st September. The defendant was told that the machine was being made, and would be delivered in about three months, which meant more or less.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Wm. John Schrieber, defendant, stated that he and his brother undertook to build 25 houses upon certain ground, and they arranged to take a brickmaking property last year. Witness saw Mr. Murray about the beginning of September about getting a brickmaking plant. Mr. Murray sent for Mr. Cook, and as the result of one interview in which the plaintiff showed him a drawing of a portable machine that was coming out, the contract was arranged. He knew nothing of the cable. He called several times, but could not see the plaintiff. Ultimately, he and his brother saw Mr. Cook, and declared the contract off on account of the delay. Plaintiff then said it did not matter, as he had another customer in East London.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: He had known Mr. Murray for some years, and his business transactions with him had been satisfactory. The time of delivery arranged was "one month," and that was what his attorney meant by a "reasonable time."

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: If the machine had come out in a reasonable time beyond a month, he would have accepted it.

Mr. R. Schreiber, brother of the last witness, corroborated the defendant as to what took place at the interview with the plaintiff.

The plaintiff (recalled) stated that he never sold a machine in East London, and there was not the slightest truth in the statement that he said that it did not matter, as he had a customer in East London.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: It is admitted that the price for the plant was to be £275, but there is a conflict of evidence as to the exact terms of the contract. The plaintiff states that the terms were half cash on receipt of the plant, and the balance in thirty days. The cost of erection was to be charged extra, and paid for by defendant, the plaintiff represented that his firm were shipping to him from England as a sample a new pugmill, including engine and boiler, of the latest invention, and represented that it could make 6,000 to 8,000 bricks daily, and the plaintiff undertook that the said plant would arrive within a month, and, after discussion, the plaintiff offered to sell to the defendant the said plant for £275, payable in two instalments, the first amount being due upon proof that the machine would perform its duty satisfactorily. According to the plea, therefore, there was a double guarantee, the first as to the capacity of the plant to do certain work, and, secondly, that it would arrive at a certain time. As to the question of capacity, it must be taken that the machine had the capacity it was stated to have. The second question to decide is as to the statement that the machine would arrive in one month. In the ordinary course, such a statement seems most unlikely to be made. The plaintiff was not a manufacturer, he was an agent trying to dispose of articles in this country. He knew that it would be a considerable time before a machine of this kind would be delivered. If the plaintiff knew that the machine was not on the water, the Court cannot understand why plaintiff should make statements that were absolutely false for the purpose of selling this machine to the defendant. Taking the evidence given, I find that the plaintiff's evidence is supported by Murray, who appears to be a respectable gentleman in a good position. Murray supports the plaintiff in every point, and he says the conversation was to the effect that it would take three months before the machine could be delivered. He heard nothing about the machine being on the water. It was suggested that Murray gave this evidence, because he was to get commission, but he would probably have got the commission independently of this cause, and, therefore, it could not be assumed that for the sake of the paltry commission that he was to get that he would state matters that were absolutely false. The Court does not believe that Murray gave his evidence from interest on either side, but if he had had any interest it was rather in favour of the defendant, in order to retain his custom. The tendency would be that way, but quite independently of these matters, there is the absolute statement made by Mr. Murray confirming the statement made by plaintiff. Unfortunately the defendant is not similarly supported. All the letters show the perfect bona fides of the plaintiff. Everything appeared to be done in the ordinary course of business. The plaintiff is completely supported by the cablegram. If he had stated to the defendant that the machine was on the water, the Court can not imagine why the plaintiff should have had all this correspondence with Fawcett, or that he should cable to Fawcett if the machine was on the water. Then it is admitted that on October 14 a letter was written by plaintiff, and received by the defendant, in which the plaintiff said, "Sorry, I missed you each time you called. I have a letter from Fawcett saying the plant is being completed, and will be despatched with all possible speed. I will let you know again later." If the plaintiff had said within a month that it was on the water, it would be very barefaced to write and say it was now being completed, and the right thing for the defendant to have done would have been to write and say: "In concluding the sale, you said the machine was on the water; now you say it is being completed." Defendant did not however, write, but went over with his brother to see the plaintiff; but the reported conversation was denied by the plaintiff. Then we have the extraordinary statements made by these persons that the whole transaction was cancelled. If this cancellation had taken place, the defendant would have taken some opportunity in the subsequent correspondence to refer to it; but on April 21, the defendant's attorneys, in writing that their client disclaimed all responsibility in respect of the cancelled contract, said nothing as to plaintiff having consented to the cancellation. Taking all the circumstances into consideration, the Court is of opinion that the plaintiff has proved his case upon every point, and is entitled to judgment as prayed.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

SMILES V. FREEDBERG, { 1904.
COHEN AND CO. { June 8th.

Lease—Eviction—Security.

The plaintiff sold his chemist's business to the defendants, one of the conditions being that the plaintiff would execute a lease of the premises in favour of the defendants for a period of five years, with a right of renewal for another five years. The defendants took possession of the business and occupation of the premises, but refused to join in the execution of the lease, on the ground that the plaintiff was himself lessee, and that under the terms of his lease he might at any time be erected. The contingency was that the original lessor might die before the end of ten years, but she was proved to be of middle age and in good health.

Held, that there was no ground for the defendants' refusal, but on the suggestion of the Court, the plaintiff offered security against erection, and the defendants were accordingly ordered to join in the execution of the lease subject to such security.

This was an action to compel the defendants to execute a certain bond and a certain lease and for payment of £300, with interest on a sum of £1,528 8s. 3d. Or in the alternative for an order for the cancellation of a certain sale and payment of £600 as and for damages for breach of contract; together with certain small sums as rent for the use of a telephone and for goods sold and delivered.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is a chemist, residing and trading at Mowbray, in the Cape Division; the defendants trade under the style or firm of Freedberg, Cohen and Co., and carry on the business known as the Peninsula Aerated and Mineral Water Factory, at Church-street, Mowbray, and the Aerated and Mineral Water Factory there, which said business and factory was formerly carried on by the plaintiff.

2. On or about February 16, 1903, the plaintiff sold to defendants, who purchased from him, all stock-in-trade, machinery, plant, buildings, goodwill, etc., of the aforesaid business, then carried on by the plaintiff, under certain terms and conditions, set forth in the agreement, copy whereof is hereto annexed, marked A.

3. It was agreed that the price to be paid for the said business should be the value of the stock, plant, buildings, apparatus, etc., taken over, to be determined as in the said agreement provided, together with the sum of £250 for the goodwill.

4. It was further agreed that £600 should be paid by defendants in cash on taking possession of the business, and the balance in half-yearly instalments of not less than £150 each, payable half-yearly, with interest at 6 per cent., to be secured by a notarial bond over the stock, plant, etc.

5. It was further agreed that the stock-in-trade should be valued at Cape Town prices, less 20 per cent.; buildings at £175; horses, carts, and all other assets, not otherwise provided for, at a price to be fixed by a competent valuator, to be mutually agreed upon; machinery, plant, fittings, etc., at the English cost price, plus cost of importing and erecting, and less a fair amount for depreciation, to be fixed upon by a competent valuator to be mutually agreed upon.

6. The plaintiff further agreed to give defendants a lease of the ground in Church-street, whereon the factory stands, for a period of five years, at a rental of £4 per month, payable monthly, with the option of renewal for another five years.

7. The defendants paid the sum of £600, and on or about February 16, 1903, took possession of the said buildings, but they have failed and neglected to pass the said bond.

8. The plaintiff at the date of signing the said agreement, in the presence and with the assistance of the defendants, took stock of the assets and drew up stock-sheets thereof; and thereafter, the defendants having failed and neglected to agree with plaintiff upon any valuator, the plaintiff affixed values upon the said stock-in-trade, taking as the basis of the said valuations the provisions of the aforesaid agreement in that behalf; the total value of the whole stock-in-trade, machinery, buildings, goodwill, etc., arrived at as aforesaid, amounted to the sum of £2,128 8s. 3d.; the said valuation is fair and reasonable, and the defendants have not raised objection thereto.

9. By agreement between the parties certain citric acid was excluded from the said stock lists, but thereafter the defendants took over 98 lb. thereof, whereof the value, according to the basis laid down in the said agreement, is the sum of £8 16s. 5d., but the defendants have failed and neglected to pay the said sum.

10. Thereafter, in or about the month of December, 1903, the plaintiff tendered to defendants the lease and bond referred to in the agreement, and called upon them to execute and complete the same; and further, to pay the rent provided for in the said lease of the ground, and also the sum of £5 5s. for the rent or use of a telephone in the aforesaid buildings.

11. Thereupon, in January, 1904, the defendants paid two months' rent for the lease of the said ground, but failed and neglected to pay the other sums or to execute the said bond or lease.

12. The £5 5s. due by defendants for use of the telephone is due under an agreement arrived at between plaintiff and defendants that each should pay half of the amount due to the Post-office authorities for the use of a certain telephone and an extension thereof from February 16, 1903, to September 24, 1903.

13. There is further due by defendants to plaintiff the sum of £300, being the amount of the two half-yearly instalments of not less than £150 each, due on August 15, 1903, and February 15, 1904, in respect of the purchase price of the aforesaid business, as provided in the said agreement A, with interest.

14. All things have happened, all times have elapsed, and all conditions have been fulfilled necessary to entitle the plaintiff to call upon the defendants to sign and execute the said bond and lease, and to pay the said sum of £300, together with interest at 6 per cent. per annum on the sum of £1,528 8s. 3d. from February 16, 1903, and the sums of £5 5s. and of £8 16s. 5d., but the defendants neglect and refuse to sign the said documents or to pay the said sums.

15. In the alternative to the order on defendants to sign the said documents and pay the sum of £300, and the interest as aforesaid, the plaintiff submits that he is entitled to claim a cancellation of the said sale, and an order that the defendants pay him the sum of £600 as damages, he retaining in addition the £600 paid as aforesaid by the defendants.

The plaintiff claims: (a) An order on the defendants to execute the aforesaid bond and lease, which the plaintiff has tendered, and hereby again tenders for their signature; (b) payment of the sum of £300, with interest on the sum of £1,528 8s. 3d. from February 16, 1903, or in the alternative to (a) and (b), an order for the cancellation of the said sale and payment by the defendants of the sum of £600 as damages for breach of contract, plaintiff retaining the said sum of £600; (c) payment of the sum of £5 5s., half-share of the rent or expense of the telephone; (d) payment of the sum of £8 16s. 5d., the price or value of the citric acid purchased or taken over by the defendants; (e) interest a tempore morae; (f) alternative relief; (g) costs of suit.

The defendants' plea was as follows:

1. They admit paragraph 1.

2. As to paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, they admit entering into the agreement annexed to the declaration, and crave leave to refer to it for the terms thereof.

3. As to paragraph 7 they admit that they paid the sum of £600, and that on or about the 16th February, 1903, they took possession of the said buildings, and that they have not passed the said bond, but say that they have not passed the said bond for the reasons hereinafter set forth.

4. As to paragraph 8 they admit that the plaintiff at the said date, in their presence, and with their assistance, took stock, and drew up stock sheets, but they deny that they failed and neglected to agree upon a valuator. They say that they are ready and willing to have the stock valued by a competent valuator as provided in the said agreement, but that the plaintiff has never suggested or asked them to suggest any valuator. They are ready and willing, and hereby tender to have the said stock valued by such valuator as this Honourable Court may appoint, failing any agreement between the parties as to such valuator, and to pay such sum as he may value the stock at in terms of the agreement. They admit that the plaintiff has valued the stock, etc., at £2,128 8s. 3d., but deny that the said valuation is fair and reasonable, and say that they have always objected thereto.

5. They admit paragraph 9, and hereby tender the plaintiff the sum of £8 16s. 5d.

6. As to paragraphs 10 and 11 they admit that the plaintiff in or about the month of December, 1903, tendered to them a lease of the said premises, and also the bond referred to in the agreement, and called upon them to execute and complete the same, and that they did not execute the said bond and lease. They say that the lease tendered to them by the plaintiff set forth that the plaintiff holds the said property on lease from the owner thereof, and that they refused to execute the said lease and bond until the plaintiff furnished them with the consent of the owner of the property to be leased to them or adduced proof that he, the plaintiff, was entitled to grant the defendants the said lease. They are ready and willing, and hereby tender to execute the said lease and bond on production of such consent or proof, save as above they admit paragraphs 10 and 11.

7. As to paragraph 12 they deny the agreement therein alleged, but are ready and willing, and hereby tender to pay the said sum of £5 5s.

8. As to paragraphs 13, they say that they are ready and willing, and hereby tender to pay to the plaintiff the said two instalments of £150 each on the said lease and bond being executed after the production of the consent or proof set forth in paragraph 6 hereof, but say that until such production the plaintiff is not entitled to claim the said instalments.

9. Save as above pleaded, they deny the allegations in paragraphs 14 and 15.

Wherefore, subject to the above tenders and to payment of costs to date, which they hereby tender, they pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Graham, K.C. (with him Mr. Pittman), for plaintiff; Mr. Gardiner for defendants.

De Villiers, C. J., said that the matter between the parties seemed a very small difference, and he thought it would be better if both sides could come to some agreement without incurring further expense.

Mr. Graham said he would suggest that the Court might adjourn for half an hour, and perhaps they might arrive at some conclusion.

The Court adjourned at 11 o'clock, and on resuming at 11.30, Mr. Graham said he regretted that the parties were unable to come to terms.

Evidence was then called for the plaintiff.

Robert Smiles, chemist, of Mowbray, stated he had a mineral water business, which he carried on for about four years. In December, 1902, the defendants came out to see him, and after many interviews a deed of sale was entered into in February, 1903. The defendants were informed that the plaintiff was not the owner of the ground. The price of the building was fixed at £175. Witness obtained a lease from a Mrs. Robertson. He was prepared to drop £250 for goodwill, and allow defendants to retain possession of the amount for ten years as security for his carrying on the lease. Defendants took possession of the business on the 16th February, and some of his employees remained on in the business. Stock was taken on the 15th or 16th February by witness, and the three defendants. On the second day witness's brother-in-law, Van Niekerk, assisted. Defendants said they did not want some of the things, but they had since taken them. He had repeatedly asked defendants to appoint a valuator, but they had refused on the score of expense. Witness marked the prices on the stock lists according to the market value. The stock lists were drawn up accurately in terms of the agreement. Goods which subsequently arrived from England were added to the stock lists in accordance with arrangement. Witness had asked the defendants if they had any objection to the stock lists, and they only excepted to one item, which witness explained to them. Witness's profits in the business amounted to £450 a year, during the time he had it. He had had the books audited, and the auditors computed the profits to be at the rate of 27½ per cent. The capital of the business was about £3,000. He made a profit of £225 a year from the sale of cordials.

Cross-examined: Before the lease witness told all the defendants that Mrs. Robertson only had a life interest in the property. Witness did not return the stock lists, priced, to defendants until August. It was not true that they objected to a number of items. The stock lists had been open, and were still open to the defendants for correction, but they had never taken advantage of it.

In reply to the Court, witness said he was prepared to reduce the claim from £2,128 to £2,000.

De Villiers, C. J., said he would like to hear the defendants on the question of the value.

Mr. Gardiner called

Morris Maskew, one of the defendants, who said that the additions to the stock list were incorrect. One of the additions was for bottles in circulation, which defendants did not agree to collect; nor did they agree to take over the syphons in the possession of customers. Nine hundred show-cards were charged for, but there were only 600. Defendants had only used 60 cases of cordial boxwood at 50s. per case. They were also charged for 52 carbonic gas tubes, while there were only 50. There were only 242 dozen bottles, while 1,250 dozen appeared on the stock list. Besides, the 242 dozen bottles, defendants had only collected about 100 or 200 dozen bottles. Witness had told Smiles that defendants would take over any bottles which he (Smiles) would collect, but that they would not be responsible for the bottles in circulation. Witness considered the machinery was overcharged. Witness had been after Smiles for six months before he got the stock lists, in order to get a valuator. Witness objected to a number of items on the stock list. If the lease were cancelled, it would involve considerable loss to defendants.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: Bottles came in every day from customers, but the same customers took them out again. There were a dozen customers from whom they had collected no bottles.

Counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

De Villiers, C. J.: It appears to me upon the evidence, that the defendants are bound now to execute the bond and the lease in accordance with the agreement arrived at. The defendants are in actual possession of the premises, which have been let, but they object now to execute a lease, because there is a contingent possibility that the lessor to the plaintiff might die, and that the plaintiff may be evicted. This is a contingency that may possibly happen, but from all the evidence it does not appear to me to be an event which will probably happen. But if the defendants had asked for some security from the plaintiff to provide against such a possible contingency, I am satisfied that the plaintiff would have given that security. The case never hinged upon the point as to whether the plaintiff ought to give security or not, and as soon as the matter of security was suggested by the Court the plaintiff expressed his willingness to give security; but the defendants are now bound to fulfil their part of the contract. They must execute what they promised to execute, but the Court will make an addition to the lease, which I think the plaintiff will be willing to have added to it. Therefore, in giving the order in terms of the first prayer of the declaration, the Court will order that the following addition be made to the lease, as the tenth paragraph of the lease: "As security for the performance by the said lessor of all his obligations under this lease he hereby consents to the detention by the defendants of the sum of £300, being part of the price of the purchase of the lessor's business and goodwill until the expiry of this lease, or, in case of renewal, for five years thereafter." In regard to the prayer "B," the sum of £300 is already payable, and the only other question is as to the amount which should be held to be the purchase price of the property. The full value of the property is said to be £2,128 8s. 3d., but the plaintiff was willing to forego £128 1s. 3d., and therefore the amount in prayer "B" must be reduced. The Court will order the payment of the sum of £300, with interest on the sum of £1,400 from the 16th February, 1903.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

ADMISSION.

{ 1904.
{ June 9th.

Mr. De Waal moved for the admission of Johannes Albertus Erasmus Euvrand as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, oath to be taken before the R.M. of Steynsburg.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

ATMORE V. TWINE.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £75, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

COWLING V. STABLEFORD AND CO.

This was an application for provisional sentence upon a mortgage bond for £750, with interest from the 1st July, 1903. The bond, was passed by the defendant in favour of one Wm. Lambert Kidney, and was ceded by him on the 29th October, 1903, to the plaintiff. It had now become due by reason of the non-payment of interest on due date.

The affidavit of Mr. J. E. P. Close, liquidator of the defendant company, entered into a detailed statement of the circumstances, which led up to the bond being passed. He stated that Wm. Stableford purchased certain properties in Maxwell-lane, and Strand-street, the former for £2,500, and the latter for £4,500. Mr. Stableford expended £460 in improvements to the Maxwell-lane property, and afterwards sold the properties to the defendant company for £6,500 each. Kidney had been secretary and accountant of the company. The bond in favour of Kidney was raised by the company to pay expenses of transfer, and balance of purchase price, etc. The deponent stated that Kidney had received £700 profits on the re-sale of the properties. He stated that the liquidators' contention was that the said properties purchased by Wm. Stableford on his own behalf were in effect purchased for the company, in which case the bond for £750, had been obtained from the company without consideration having been given, and that there had been fraudulent collusion between the said Stableford and the company. The books of the company had been kept by the secretary, Kidney, in such a fashion that only during the last few weeks had the liquidator been able to unravel the accounts.

The replying affidavit of plaintiff, John Frederic Cowling, stated that he was unable to admit or deny the allegations as to the relations between Wm. Stableford and Co. and Wm. Lambert Kidney. He was applied to in October last by Kidney for financial assistance, and he received the bond in return for valuable consideration.

Mr. Upington for plaintiff; Mr. McGregor for defendant.

Mr. McGregor said his submission was that this was not a case for provisional sentence at all.

[Buchanan, J.: But what are the rights of the plaintiff in this matter?]

Mr. McGregor said that his position was that in the first place the cedent had no right to sue upon this bond, and in the second place the cessionary could not claim greater rights than the cedent. Counsel was proceeding to argue further, when Buchanan, J., pointed out that the argument seemed to him beside the point. Counsel appeared to want him to decide that the transactions between Wm. Stableford and Kidney and Wm. Stableford and Co. were fraudulent and illegal.

Mr. McGregor said that his contention was that the Court should not give judgment on such a bond, having such a serious set of facts before it until the whole of the facts were before it. Counsel added that he was instructed that the cession was not registered, although the bond was. Kidney transferred his right, title, and interest to the plaintiff, and if the transaction was one that was vitiated by improper dealing with the company's money, then the whole transaction was bad. As to the facts he submitted that it was a fair presumption that these properties were bought for the company by Stableford, that it was intended that they should be re-sold to the company at a profit. There was the significant fact that the first bond was paid out of money raised for the company. He urged that on the facts shown, the transaction was one which required close scrutiny. Counsel went on to quote authorities in regard to the position of a director or official of a company.

Without calling upon Mr. Upington, the Court granted provisional sentence.

Buchanan, J.: It is an elementary principle of law that improper conduct on the part of a person in a fiduciary position should not be allowed to go to the profit of that individual. But that is not the question that I have to decide. The question I have to decide is the application for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond. The mortgage bond has been put in. It was passed eighteen months ago, and was duly registered, and the consideration is stated to be for money lent for the part payment of the purchase price of the ground mortgaged. The bond was ceded to the plaintiff for value on the 29th October, 1903. The holder for value of such a bond duly registered, has prima facie, a good cause of action. From his affidavit, which it is not denied, it appears that he took his bond without any notice of anything which vitiated it in equity, and gave good consideration for it. He is clearly entitled to provisional sentence. In the liquidator's affidavit, which deals with the transactions between Stableford and Kidney and the company, it is not alleged that the sale by Stableford to the company was fraudulent, illegal, or improper, or that he had committed an abuse of his position; but simply because when he bought the property for himself some months afterwards he sold it to the company. It was argued that, therefore, the present holder of the bond cannot recover. What the position of Stableford and Kidney may be will have to be determined when the liquidators bring actions against them if they think fit to do so. It is not a matter which can properly be discussed now. It seems to me to be outside the present case. Provisional sentence will be given as prayed, with costs, and the property declared executable.

I. AND J. HERMANN V. VIVIERS.

Mr. Pitman moved for provisional sentence on two promissory notes each for £100.

Mr. Buchanan, who appeared for the defendant read an affidavit of the defendant, in which he stated that the promissory notes were given in respect of the purchase of 30 bicycles. The arrangement between him and the plaintiffs was that £100 was to be paid on the delivery at Beaufort West of the bicycles, and that two promissory notes each for £100 were to be given. The bicycles had not been delivered, and he had written cancelling the order.

Mr. Pitman read affidavits to the effect that the bicycles were to be forwarded on receipt of the £100, and that defendant had neglected to pay that amount. The promissory notes were now due, and the bicycles were stored in readiness to be sent to the defendant when he fulfilled his part of the contract.

Buchanan, J., asked why the £100 was not sued for.

Mr. Pitman said that the only course open to plaintiffs to make the defendant pay was by suing on the promissory notes.

Buchanan, J., said that the matter of the payment of the £100 and of the promissory notes was one transaction between the parties. Plaintiff should not have split up his claims in this way. The issue was the same in both cases, and the Court would order the parties to go into the principal case, costs to abide the result.

WIGGETT V. MORTIMER.

Dr. Greer moved for provisional sentence on a bond for £600, and for property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Granted.

SMIT V. WESSELS BROS.

Mr. Molteno moved for provisional sentence on two promissory notes for £4,987 17s. 9d. and £2,204, less £500 paid on account.

Granted.

SILBERBAUER, WAHL AND FULLER V. STEPHAN.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final sequestration of the defendant's estate.

Granted.

VAN DER WESTHUYSEN V. KRUFCHIEFT

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £700, and for property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Granted.

CILLIERS V. DU TOIT.

Mr. Rainsford applied for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £500.

Mr. Van Zyl appeared for the defendant, and applied for a stay of execution. He read an affidavit stating that defendant was unable to pay at present, and was endeavouring to raise a loan. If a forced sale of the mortgaged property were ordered, he would suffer great loss.

Mr. Rainsford pointed out that it was not asked that the property should be declared executable.

Buchanan, J., said that, under these circumstances, it was not necessary to stay execution. Provisional sentence would be granted, with costs.

EQUITABLE FIRE INSURANCE TRUST CO. V. LA GRANGE.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £45, interest on a mortgage bond.

Granted.

SEIFONTEIN V. FOURIE.

Mr. Rainsford moved for provisional sentence on a "good for" for £42 12s. 6d.

Provisional sentence was granted, subject to the "good for" being stamped.

PHILLIPS AND CO. V. LOUW.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for a decree of civil imprisonment on an unsatisfied judgment for £82 18s. 8d. and £16 19s. 11d. costs.

The defendant gave evidence on oath. He admitted that he owed the money, but had no means of paying. He was not doing anything at present. His estate was sequestrated in the Transvaal in 1899, and he had not been rehabilitated. Judgment was obtained in the Transvaal for this debt in 1898, before he became insolvent.

By Mr. Buchanan: Witness's wife kept a boarding-house at Somerset West, but was in arrear with the rent.

No order was made, leave being granted to plaintiff to apply again.

CUNNINGHAM AND ANOTHER V. BETHEL.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £1,221 16s. on certain conditions of sale.

Granted.

BLIGNAUT V. WEINTROB.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on two mortgage bonds, each for the sum of £4,000, and that specially hypothecated property be declared executable. The principal had become due by reason of the non-payment of interest.

Weintrob asked for an extension of time for two months.

Buchanan, J., said defendant must make terms with the plaintiff.

Provisional sentence was granted as prayed.

REHABILITATIONS. { 1904.
{ June 9th.

Mr. Gutsche applied for the rehabilitation of Solomon Esias Marais. The application had the consent of the creditors.

Granted.

Mr. Roux applied for the rehabilitation of Tobias Mostert de Villiers. The estate was voluntarily surrendered in October, 1899, and the trustee's report was favourable.

Granted.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan applied for the rehabilitation of Thomas King. The estate was compulsorily sequestrated in July, 1894, the preferential creditors had been paid in full, and the concurrent creditors had received 7s. 9d. in the £. The trustee attributed the failure of the insolvent to too much freedom in giving credit.

Order granted, Mr. Harry Hands to act as trustee.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

SHANNON V. BRODIE. { 1904.
 { June 10th.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a certain acknowledgment of debt for £750, and to make absolute a rule nisi restraining respondent from selling a certain hotel. A rule nisi had been obtained by the applicant, interdicting the respondent from disposing of the Shakespeare Hotel, Cape Town, in respect of the balance of the purchase price, of which the acknowledgment of debt was given. It was agreed that the debt was to be reduced at the rate of £50 per month, for the first twelve months, and £100 per month thereafter, interest being charged at the rate of 5 per cent. The respondent was now in arrear to the extent of ten instalments of £50, together with £150, which he should have paid on entering into possession of the hotel.

The respondent, in his affidavit, repudiated the debt of £750, or any part of it. He further stated that the whole of the £1,750, for which the acknowledgment was given, had been paid, and he produced receipts to prove this.

The answering affidavit of the applicant set forth that the applicant agreed to dispose of the hotel to the respondent for £3,350. It was agreed that £1,500 was to be paid in cash, and that for the balance, promissory notes should be given. Applicant asserted that the respondent had suppressed the last receipt for £50, which would have shown that the respondent had actually paid more than he alleged was the amount of the purchase price.

The replying affidavit of the respondent stated that this sale was made in the presence of his late partner, one Berman, and that the price of the purchase was £2,000. The whole of this sum had been paid.

Mr. Close appeared for the applicant, Mr. W. P. Buchanan for the respondent.

De Villiers, C.J., suggested that respondent should give security for the £750, and that the parties should go into the principal case.

Mr. Close asked that respondent should also be required to give security for costs.

The Court, by consent, ordered the parties to go into the principal case, respondent to give security for £850, costs to follow the result.

ESTATE OF KAMER V. DALY.

Mr. De Waal applied, on behalf of Daly, under Rule 330, for leave to sign judgment against plaintiff, he not having proceeded with the action, as required by rule of Court.

Granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte KUPFER.

Mr. De Waal moved for an order authorising the Master to accept a certain will, in which an alteration was made by petitioner before she and the witnesses signed the will. Testatrix had substituted her maiden name for her married name.

The Court granted the order.

Ex parte FULLER.

Mr. Close moved in this matter, which stood over from the previous day, pending report by the Master. A report had since been made by the Master, in which he recommended that before the application was granted, notice should be published in prominent papers in Sydney, Australia.

An order was granted in terms of the Master's report, the rule to be published for six months at intervals of a week in three Sydney papers.

SHAPIRO V. FRIEDMAN.

This was an application for an interdict, but since the proceedings were instituted, respondent had paid the amount of the debt. The only point in dispute now was with regard to the costs. Respondent had expressed his readiness to pay the costs, but had not tendered costs.

An affidavit of the applicant was put in, to which was attached a letter, in which he asked if respondent would give his personal guarantee for costs. Friedman wrote on June 9, saying he was prepared to give his personal guarantee. On the same day that reply was made, the plaintiff wrote saying he had briefed counsel to apply for costs. Mr. Buchanan (for respondent) contended that respondent should not pay costs incurred by plaintiff after the respondent had said he would guarantee the costs, though if counsel were briefed before that letter was received by applicant he could not object to respondent being ordered to pay the costs in that connection.

Mr. Burton (for applicant) was not called upon.

Respondent was ordered to pay all costs incurred by applicant up to the date of the receipt by the applicant's attorneys of the letter of the 9th June.

ROSS V. HAZELL AND (1904.
SCHWAB. (June 10th.

Partnership—Insolvency.

The applicant and S. bought certain property for the purpose of making profit out of cottages which they built thereon. Being unable to pay the creditors who had supplied goods to the partnership, S. informed the applicant that he would have to surrender the estate of the partnership. The applicant did not pay any of the debts, and S. surrendered the estate by petition, signed by himself on behalf of the partnership. After a trustee had been appointed, the applicant applied to set aside the sequestration.

Held, that as the estate was insolvent and no benefit would accrue to anyone from an order setting aside the proceedings, the application should be refused.

This was an application for an order setting aside certain insolvency proceedings. The matter had been ordered to stand over from the previous week for further information on certain points.

When the matter was previously before the Court Ross stated, on affidavit, that he was not a partner in the alleged firm of Schwab and Ross, which had been adjudicated insolvent, and had not been served with notice of the insolvency proceedings. They were joint owners of a certain property, but further than that, they had no connection. He (Ross) was shown in the schedules as a creditor of the supposed firm for £14. A replying affidavit was made by Mr. Hazell, the trustee in the insolvent estate, in which he stated that Schwab came to him, and said he was a member of the firm of Ross and Schwab, and that the firm wished to surrender. Notice was published in the "Gazette" of the intention of the firm to surrender, and subsequently the estate was sequestrated by order of the Supreme Court. Notice of this proceeding was duly published. When deponent sent notice to one Ross as a creditor, he was not aware that this person was the plaintiff. Deponent stated that transfer of a certain property had been taken by Ross and Schwab in undivided shares, and that Ross and Schwab had given powers to pass certain bonds.

The answering affidavit of the respondent Schwab, stated that he had entered into an agreement with Ross in July, 1903, whereby they undertook to jointly purchase a property in Cape Town for £1,700. Bonds were passed, signed by Ross and deponent. There was a loss on the transaction, and he (Schwab) determined, believing that the agreement made them partners, to surrender the estate of Ross and Schwab. Other affidavits were read to the effect that Ross and Schwab had received advances on account of loans raised on the property, and had both signed receipts for same.

Mr. Burton appeared for the applicant; Mr. McGregor for the first respondent, the trustee in the insolvent estate of Ross and Schwab.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are the creditors brought up in the schedule persons who have advanced money in respect of this property.]

Mr. McGregor said it would seem so.

Mr. Burton read an affidavit by Ross, who said he had delayed proceedings, owing to being advised by his solicitor that he should take no notice of the affair. Applicant stated that though the signature on the power to pass one of the bonds was his, he did not know the nature of the document. He denied that he had had advances on account of a loan raised on the property. He said there was no partnership, and that he was solvent, and able to pay his debts. Money had been spent on the property.

Mr. Burton said the applicant was prepared to meet all his liabilities.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is rather vague. The point is: Is he prepared to pay the £2,300 bond?]

Mr. Burton: I suppose he is, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Before appying for the insolvency proceedings to be set aside, he should have tendered the money to meet the liabilities.]

Mr. Burton urged that there was no partnership, and that one person could not surrender another person's estate with his own. This was a joint speculation, and he submitted that Schwab could not surrender a single speculation.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The creditors must prove that the money advanced, or the goods sold, were advanced or sold to the partnership.]

Mr. Burton said that if Ross owed money, which he was unable to pay, then he should be made insolvent, but he had no opportunity of showing he was able to pay, and he should not be dragged into insolvency in this irregular manner. He submitted that Ross was entitled to the order prayed for.

Mr. McGregor urged that every element of partnership was present in this case. In the various money transactions that took place sometimes one signed and sometimes the other, thereby binding both. It was at least peculiar that plaintiff should have made such mistakes as to the signing of the bond. Why did not plaintiff not go to see the trustee when he was asked to call? In any case, he trusted the Court would hold the trustee harmless as regards costs.

Mr. Burton pointed out that the estate was voluntarily surrendered without applicant's knowledge. If applicant had known, perhaps some arrangement might have been made to avoid the insolvency.

De Villiers, C.J.: Schwab and the applicant bought certain property together, and passed a bond for the greater part of the amount of the purchase price. They then agreed that each should hold a half share in the property, and that the existing buildings should be pulled down, and two stores erected. The work was to be done under the supervision of Schwab, who was to receive wages, and the stores when completed were to be let and sold when a favourable opportunity occurred, and the profits shared. Well, that is a partnership between the two in respect of these buildings, and no creditors are entitled to anything from that partnership, except those who have advanced money to be expended on the buildings. Schwab clearly believed that there was a partnership—that the agreement between them constituted them partners, and he surrendered the estate, and states the circumstances under which the surrender took place. He states one of the creditors demanded payment. Schwab spoke to Ross about it, and Ross said he could not pay. Nor could Schwab, according to his statement, pay. Subsequently Schwab received two letters from the solicitors, and certain creditors, and he thereupon consulted Ross, who said he could do nothing. Schwab then told him they had better surrender the estate. The creditors were pressing, and Schwab thought it would be for the benefit of all to surrender the estate, and the Court believes that that was a legitimate conclusion to come to. Schwab told the person with whom he was practically a partner that they must surrender, and then carried out what he said he was going to do. In strictness, looking at the partnership, both should have joined in the surrender, but the surrender was effected, and all the proceedings gone through. The question is whether, owing to a technical mistake having been committed the proceedings should be quashed, and everything done over again in a strictly legal manner. The applicant does not tender to pay the debts. Schwab spoke to his partner before proceeding with the surrender, and therefore the applicant knew about it. It was advertised in the papers and in the "Government Gazette," and no objection was raised by the applicant. It is possible he did not see it, but on the other hand, the object of the notification in the papers was to give notice to all concerned. I do not think any good purpose would be served by granting the application. It is for the benefit of the creditors that the whole matter should be concluded, and the application must therefore be refused. As to the question of costs the Court presumes the trustee will be able to obtain his costs out of the estate. Therefore, the Court is of opinion that there should be no order as to costs. Each party will pay their own costs, the trustee to recover his costs out of the estate.

Buchanan, J., concurred.

Personal injury — Negligence — Damages.

This was an action in which one Duncan Campbell Anderson sued the Caledon Baths, Limited, for £5,000 damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the carelessness and negligence of the defendant company or their servants.

The plaintiff's declaration was in the following terms:

1. The plaintiff is a manufacturers' agent, carrying on business at Cape Town. The defendant is a duly incorporated company, which carries on the business of a hotelkeeper, and is the owner of a hotel at Caledon, known as the Caledon Sanatorium.

2. In or about the month of June, 1903, the defendant by itself, its contractors, or its servants, was constructing certain alterations to the building of the said Sanatorium, and in the course of the said construction excavated a deep hole in the stoep of the said Sanatorium.

3. The said hole was on or about the night of the 19th June, 1903, carelessly and negligently left by the defendant, its contractors, and its servants, open and unguarded, and without any light or other means of notifying to persons using the stoep the existence and position of the said hole.

4. On or about the said night, the plaintiff, who was a boarder at the Sanatorium, was lawfully, and, by the invitation of the defendant, walking on the said stoep, when he suddenly fell into the said hole, of the existence of which he was unaware.

5. The cause of the plaintiff's fall was the carelessness and negligence of the defendant, its contractors, and its servants, in excavating the said hole, and leaving it in the state set forth in No. 3.

6. By reason of the said fall, the plaintiff sustained divers injuries, from which his health still suffers, endured great pain, was put to great expense for medical fees, and other expenses, was unable for a considerable time to attend to his business, and sustained other damage.

7. The plaintiff estimates the damages sustained by him as in No. 6, set forth in the sum of £5,000, but the defendant neglects and refuses to pay the said sum or any portion thereof, though called upon to do so.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims:

(a) Judgment for £5,000 damages.

(b) Costs of suit.

The defendant's plea was:

1. The defendant has no knowledge that the plaintiff is a manufacturers' agent, carrying on business in Cape Town, and denies it. The rest of paragraph 1 is admitted.

2. The defendant admits that in June, 1903, a contractor under a contract with him was constructing certain alterations to the building of the said Sanatorium, and in the course of the said construction excavated a hole of considerable depth, but he denies that it was excavated on the stoep of the said Sanatorium, and says that the hole was excavated directly in front of the bedroom of Mrs. Halls, the manageress of the Sanatorium, and that the place where it was excavated was at no time part of the stoep for visitors, but was the entrance to Mrs. Halls' bedroom.

3. The defendant denies all the allegations in paragraph 3.

4. The defendant denies that the plaintiff fell into the said hole; he denies that the plaintiff was lawfully or by defendant's invitation at the place where the hole was, and he denies that the plaintiff was unaware of the existence of the said hole.

5. The defendant denies the allegations in paragraph 5, and says that if the plaintiff fell into the said hole it was through his own negligence and carelessness, and not through the carelessness or negligence of the defendant or the contractor, which, even if it existed, which the defendant denies, could have been avoided by the plaintiff.

6. The defendant denies all the allegations in paragraphs 6 and 7, save that he refuses to pay the plaintiff any portion of the sum claimed.

Wherefore the defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

The plaintiff, in his replication, said: Save in so far as any of the allegations in the declaration are admitted, the plaintiff denies all allegations of fact and conclusions of law contained in the plea, joins issue thereon with the defendant, and again, as before, prays for judgment with costs.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner), for the plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington), for the defendants.

Duncan Campbell Anderson (the plaintiff) said he acted as representative of Robert McDowall and Sons, Edinburgh, T. and H. Smith, coffee essence manufacturers, and the Hovis Bread Company. He came out here in 1902. When at Home he used to travel for the Mazawattee Tea Company. He was then an active and vigorous man. He had an accident in 1897, by falling from a dogcart, which necessitated an operation. Between 1897 and 1902 he went actively about his business. He was now aged thirty-seven years. Before the dogcart accident he had a fall from a football stand, but, apart from these occurrences, he had had good health. He was enjoying good health in June, 1903. He went to the Caledon Baths to bring back to town his father-in-law, Mr. Jackson (who was an invalid), and Mrs. Jackson. He went to Caledon from Cape Town, and arrived there on the 18th June. His intention was to come back on the following Monday, the 22nd. He had his meals at the Sanatorium. He walked down to the village from the Sanatorium. In the evening a charade took place in the dining-room, which he attended, and afterwards he wrote certain letters. He made the acquaintance of certain people. Afterwards he walked out of the west door on to the stoep, simply for a breath of fresh air before retiring. "I walked straight out," he proceeded, "along the stoep, turned round the corner, and continued straight on, until I felt myself falling into space; I dropped into a hole." Continuing, witness said that he had not been warned of the danger from the hole, and there was no light about to indicate danger. He suffered pain about the middle of the body and above the hip, as well as about his shoulders. He took a warm bath, but could not sleep during the night, owing to the pain. Next morning he informed Mrs. Hall, the manageress, of what had occurred. Mrs. Hall was very sympathetic, and distinctly blamed somebody else for not having put the barricade up. She said that she had given orders for it to be put up some time before. That day he returned to his home at Sea Point. He was suffering acute pain. His ankle appeared to have been twisted. Mrs. Anderson called in Dr. Waterston, who examined him, and said that she thought the case was one for a surgeon. Dr. Elliott afterwards saw him. He was confined to his bed for about three weeks. He had never been as vigorous since the accident. He was lame, and mentally his activity was also impaired. He had to engage special assistance. Dr. Nairn, who was chief surgeon of the Sanatorium Hospital at Glasgow, came out and saw him on the 10th February. He had known Dr. Nairn at Home, and had been under his treatment. Dr. Nairn consulted with Drs. Elliott and Stevenson, and they operated upon plaintiff. He was laid up for ten weeks. He had never been properly restored to his former health. He was still nervous and shaky, and had been very much reduced in size and weight. He was an abstainer from liquors. He went back to Caledon in September to try the mineral baths, but only stayed seven days. He had had a return prepared of his business transactions. He established the agencies in this country that he had mentioned. Between September, 1902, and June, 1903, his gross earnings, commission, and allowance were £1,192 15s. 7d., and his expenditure was £404 3s. 7d., showing a profit of £788 12s. In the period following his expenses had increased in consequence of engaging extra travellers and so forth, and as a result his transactions now showed a loss of £170 19s. 5d. He estimated his loss of profits, due to the accident, at £871 10s., and he had also incurred the following expenses: Dr. Nairn, £100; Dr. Elliott, £54 17s. 6d.; Dr. Stevenson, £25 4s.; visit to Caledon, £15; visit to Muizenberg, £14 16s.; chemists' account, £19 19s. 9d.; nursing expenses, £24. His actual losses in money were £1,296 6s. 8d. His health was very much impaired, and his future was uncertain.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He did not remember smoking while he was at the Caledon Sanatorium. He remembered seeing Miss Venter, the housekeeper. He did not have any conversation of a familiar nature with her. He was not smoking on the stoep at the time of the accident. Building was going on; there were additions being made to the Sanatorium. He did not see anything going on at that time. He did not see outside Mr. Jackson's room on the balcony. From that balcony it was possible to see the hole into which he fell, but he had not noticed the hole at the time of his first visit. He did not look all round the place on the occasion of his first visit. He saw the building operation going on, as he was coming up from the village. He was not on the stoep in the course of the Friday afternoon. He had not walked round the house at all before the accident occurred. He had been attending to his business in the village during the day. He returned to the house for lunch and dinner. He had been troubled formerly in his back from the old place on his right side. The fall he had formerly sustained had left him with some slight suffering. He was not smoking a cigar while he was at the Sanatorium; he could not smoke a cigar. He fell into soil. It seemed to him to be a deep hole, but he did not think it was 10 feet deep. He clambered out by getting hold of something that seemed to be a ledge, or the root of a tree. There was no light over the hole from the room of Mrs. Hall's or the maid. He recognised the position from the model produced. He might have told several people that he got out of the hole by the root of a tree; he had not told Dr. Petersen so. He did not see the room of Mr. Green-slade, the secretary. He had not, since the accident, been to see the effect of a light from Mrs. Hall's room over the hole. When Dr. Elliott called upon him, the fistula in his back was suppurating; the doctor advised him to have an operation. When Dr. Petersen saw him in July he did not recommend an operation to him. In October Dr. Stevenson advised him to have an operation. Correspondence occupying a few months took place with Dr. Nairn, of Glasgow, in regard to the suggested operation. Dr. Nairn advised him to delay, unless an operation were absolutely necessary. Dr. Nairn arrived in this country on the 10th February of this year. He received a letter from Dr. Nairn in August last. Dr. Nairn advised him not to consent to an immediate operation, as the fistula could do him no harm, unless he had been particularly damaged by the fall. Witness was damaged by the fall. He felt a little better at the time he was at the baths. The £100 he had paid to Dr. Nairn was a final payment. The money was given in the way of expenses. The question of whether he would make any further payment to Dr. Nairn did not depend on whether he won this action, or not. He had a good business. Trade had been bad, but he did not think the difference would have been so great as in any other businesses, as he was interested in foodstuffs, tea, coffee, sugar, biscuits, and so on. People must have food.

Trade was bad during the time he started business as well as last year.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness had never seen the side of the stoep where he fell until the accident happened. He was not aware of any other hole than the one he fell into. He bore the situation as well as he could until Dr. Nairn could come out. Dr. Nairn was an old friend of the family. He thought Dr. Nairn would be entitled to something more if witness won the case, but there was no agreement between them. He could not say whether he would have had to engage extra assistance if the accident had not occurred.

Dr. Elliott said that he examined the plaintiff on his return from Caledon. He found the left ankle swollen, an old fistula on the right side, and pain in the lower part of the back, principally on the left side, and also above the shoulder. There were no external indications of the injury except a slight swelling of the ankle. He saw the plaintiff again on the 5th July, and he continued to be called in from time to time. About the 5th July he noticed a definite swelling just above the hip on the opposite side to the fistula. He advised an exploratory operation to be taken to see whether there was any connection between the swelling and the fistula. Plaintiff returned to his business with the swelling still there. It was evident from the plaintiff's demeanour, when he was walking, that he was suffering. On the 27th October plaintiff was examined by Dr. Stevenson and witness. The swelling had increased. Dr. Stevenson and witness conferred, and they decided it would be best to operate. Dr. Nairn came out in February; on the 10th they had an examination and consultation, and on the 11th an operation was performed by Dr. Nairn. It was found that there was no connection between the old fistula and the swelling. An operation was performed on the old fistula and the abscess. He considered that the abscess was consistent with what might result from a fall, such as had been described. The plaintiff's general health was very poor; he was suffering from nervous shock.

Sir H. Juta cross-examined the witness in some detail in relation to the medical aspects of the case. Witness said that both Dr. Stevenson and he advised the plaintiff in October that an operation should be performed. It was a simple operation, and he did not think it needed a doctor to come from Scotland to perform it. He admitted that the plaintiff's health suffered by the operation being delayed. There might have been a connection by circulation between the suppurating fistula and the injured part, though not directly. The swelling, which afterwards formed into an abscess, increased in size between October last and February of this year.

By the Court: He thought that the chance that the fistula had something to do with the abscess was very remote indeed.

Dr. Stevenson, of Rondebosch and Cape Town, gave evidence, substantially agreeing with the last witness's. Witness said that a conference took place between Dr. Elliott and himself, and Drs. Petersen and Fuller, in regard to the case. They agreed that the abscess had been caused by the accident, but they thought there might have been some accessories, and they thought some pus might have been conveyed to the abscess.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: It did not strike witness in October that plaintiff's health was very much impaired by the accident. The operation was a simple one. The operation in February had, so far as the abscess on the left side was concerned, been successful. He thought it would have been better for the plaintiff if the operation had been carried out in October.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He was not aware that people now so strongly objected to surgical operations. They were now more educated, and they did not seem so reluctant.

Mr. Schreiner: But I suppose they prefer to have pus removed by poulticing rather than the knife. Women, for instance, would rather poultice?

Witness: I don't think so; I think they are very much more plucky than men.

Mr. Schreiner: Yes, but when they are themselves the persons to be operated upon?

Witness: Oh, yes.

The evidence of Dr. John S. Nairn, of Glasgow, taken on commission on February 23, was read by Mr. Gardiner. His evidence as to the condition of the plaintiff and the operation agreed with the testimony of Drs. Elliott and Stevenson. He said that his fee in the ordinary way for coming out here would be £500.

Mrs. Jackson, wife of James Jackson, Sea Point, and mother of the plaintiff's wife, spoke to the visit of the plaintiff to the Caledon Baths while witness's husband, who was an invalid, and herself were staying there. The plaintiff had been very active in business prior to the accident at Caledon. Plaintiff did not come to Caledon for the benefit of his health, but in order to take witness and her husband home. Witness told Mrs. Hall that plaintiff had fallen into the hole, and the latter seemed much distressed. There was no question at all about any other hole. Witness knew of the existence of that hole. Mrs. Hall told witness she had given orders for something to be put up at the hole. Witness had never seen a barrier before the accident. On the day after the accident she saw what she considered to be an insufficient kind of barrier being finished. Mrs. Hall was very kind and sympathetic, and she never said anything to witness to indicate that she considered plaintiff could not have fallen into the hole. Plaintiff was very much changed since the accident.

Mrs. Annie D. Anderson, wife of the plaintiff, said that she saw her husband on his return home from Caledon. He appeared to be very ill. Up till the accident her husband had had good health since coming out to this country, and he had been very active. Witness spoke as to the treatment to which the plaintiff was subjected for his illness. Witness said she was very adverse to an operation being performed, and she persuaded her husband not to let an operation be performed until they saw whether there was a chance of Dr. Nairn (Glasgow) coming out. The operation was performed in February by Dr. Nairn. Her husband's health and demeanour had been quite changed by reason of the accident. He grew very irritable, and could not bear any noise. Her husband was in every way different from what he was. He was absolutely changed; he could not even speak as he used to do.

James Jackson, brother-in-law of the plaintiff, said that he had been helping the plaintiff in his business. The plaintiff was in splendid health before the accident. Witness corroborated the evidence given by the last witness as to the enfeebled condition of the plaintiff after the accident. He also spoke as to the shrinkage of the business which followed, stating that he (witness) was quite new to that line, having been an engineer. When plaintiff got back to business he did not appear to have the same grasp of the details that he had had before. There were two children in the plaintiff's family. Proceeding, witness said that he went down to Caledon Baths last month in consequence of certain rumours. He had prepared a plan of the building. A corridor was now built across the stoep. The photograph now produced did not show the stoep as it was when the accident occurred.

John Henry Morris, broker and insurance manager, said he believed the plaintiff was insured in one of the companies he represented, the Law Union and Crown. The plaintiff was entered in 1901 as a first-class life.

James David Louw, chief clerk of Mr. Masterton, accountant, gave evidence as to preparing a return of the profit and loss in plaintiff's business, and the payments to medical men, etc. The account was, he said, correct according to the best of his knowledge and belief.

William Martin, general dealer, Cape Town, said he was staying at Caledon Baths in June, 1903, when plaintiff arrived. He knew the side stoep where the excavation was. There was not the slightest precaution taken on the stoep to protect people against the hole. He heard of the accident on the morning after the accident. Out of a "morbid desire," he went at once and looked at the place. There was no barrier at that time. A person might walk right along the stoep and into the hole. There was nothing to prevent one doing so.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He had not walked along that part of the stoep at night. He had stood at the corner of the stoep at night, and had seen a light far away coming from the drawing-room. He did notice any French windows right above the excavation. He had stood close to the hole.

Sir H. Juta: Didn't you notice any marks of a struggle in the earth?

Witness: I am not a detective. Why should I look for marks?

Sir H. Juta: But you had that "morbid desire," don't you know. Didn't that "morbid desire" lead you to want to know how he got out of the hole?

Witness: No, I wanted to see how he got in.

Francis Connolly, a detective in the Port Elizabeth Police Force, said he was staying at Caledon Baths for the benefit of his health at the time of the accident. He knew the stoep where the accident occurred. He had seen the hole; he saw it about six o'clock on the evening of the accident. The excavation was then without barrier. At 10 o'clock next morning he saw the place again, and found that it was protected by a barrier.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He had not walked round the stoep at night. It was dark at six o'clock on the night in question. He knew Mrs. Halls' room. He knew there were French windows over the excavation. He could not swear whether there were shutters outside Mrs. Halls' bedroom. There might have been a dim light burning in Mr. Greenslades' room.

By the Court: He was quite sure that on the evening of the accident at six o'clock there was no barrier at the excavation. The workmen had left. He noticed no lights. He could see the hole.

John Michael Hayes, hotel proprietor, O.R.C., and formerly of Port Elizabeth, said he was staying at the Sanatorium at the time of the accident. He had often used the stoep in question. He had seen no barrier there. He had children there, and he had called Mrs. Halls' attention to the danger that there was to children. Mrs. Halls merely smiled. He saw the plaintiff about nine or ten o'clock on the night in question leaving the Charades. Some time afterwards he again saw the plaintiff, who complained that he had had a fall, and that he was injured about his ankle and back. Witness saw the hole next morning before breakfast. There was no barrier at that time. It was a wet morning. About ten o'clock he saw a barrier.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He remembered a Miss Carroll staying there. He did not know Mr. Zietsman, the member of Parliament. There was not a pole across the hole before the accident. He did not see any bits of wood on the hole. He had been over the stoep at night. The morning after the accident he went into the hole; he found it was six or seven feet deep. He got out of the excavation quite easily by means of a ledge, the same as the workmen did. There were old roots of trees or shrubs about the top of the steps. He did not know whether there were shutters at the windows of Mrs. Hall's room.

John Jones Mills, asylum superintendent at Bloemfontein, said he was staying at the baths for the benefit of his health at the time of the accident. He was often at the new buildings. He saw no barrier at the hole. If there had been two boards across the hole he would have seen them. He was prepared to swear that there was no barrier at the hole until after the accident had happened. After the plaintiff had left Caledon, witness saw one or two pieces of wood across the excavation.

Cross-examined: He had not walked on that part of the stoep before the accident, nor had he stood at the corner at night.

Robert Brodie, manager of the Salt River Co-operative Society, spoke as to the change in the condition of the plaintiff between now and prior to the accident. He thought plaintiff's business had suffered in consequence of his not being able to get about.

John Henry Pfuhl, importer, Cape Town, also gave similar evidence as to loss of business to plaintiff and the change in his condition.

Counsel having read the correspondence, Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Caroline Mary Hall, manageress of the Caledon Sanatorium, said she remembered the visit paid by the plaintiff in June of last year. She noticed that the plaintiff had a peculiar walk. Mrs. Jackson (his mother-in-law) told witness, after the accident, certain things. Witness's bedroom was on the left of the corridor on the side stoep. She kept a lamp and two candles in her room. The lamp was constantly alight in the evening. It would be lighted about 5.30 that part of the year. Witness did not retire before 11 o'clock. She was sure her lamp was burning on the night of the accident. There was a French door to the room; she had two small green blinds inside, but no shutters. She did not draw down the blinds until she retired for the night. When her lamp was lit the light fell outside in front of her bedroom door. Witness and others made an examination of the place in April. The lamp was put in the same spot where it was on the night of the accident. The light showed the board over the hole. Witness had meanwhile changed her room. She could see the excavation from her window when she drew down the blind. The light from Mr. Greenslade's room also showed along the stoep. On the night in question two of the servants were in a room above hers, where they were packing. As to the accident, plaintiff told her that he had hurt his ankle, but he made no complaint about his back or side. She never told the plaintiff that she had given instructions about the barrier. He said that he had had an accident near her door, and that he had gone along there for a walk. There were private bedrooms along that side of the building. They did not keep a lamp there, because they did not wish to encourage people to promenade on that part of the stoep. Before the accident two poles were placed across from the verandah at the entrance to the stoep. The poles were never removed with her knowledge or consent. She went to the place after hearing of the accident, and she found that the poles were still there. It would then be between 8 and 8.30 a.m. She denied that Mr. Hayes had ever complained of the danger of the hole. There was a cement slab, about the thickness of her finger, on the stoep; it was very brittle. She found no marks as of a man having been in the hole. The cement slab had not been disturbed. She went again later with Miss Venter (the housekeeper), and yet they found no indication of anybody having been in the hole. There had been an old peach tree near, but she saw no roots lying by.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness's brothers started the Sanatorium at Caledon, and it was afterwards floated into a company. Witness's brother (Mr. Walsh) was a director. He was a large shareholder. Witness also had a good many shares in the company. Mrs. Jackson told her that Mr. Anderson had had an accident somewhere in a hole outside. Mrs. Jackson did not say that it was the hole on the side stoep. Mr. Anderson told her which hole he had fallen into. She did not ask him how he got past the barriers. She asked him what he was doing at her bedroom. He said he went for a walk. It did not occur to her at the time about the barriers. She did not take Mrs. Jackson to the spot and suggest to her that her son-in-law could not have fallen into that hole. She did not like to doubt the word of visitors. She did not suggest to any of them that there had been any impropriety of conduct on the part of the plaintiff. She was certain that the plaintiff did not fall in the hole. She could not say what took the plaintiff round to that part of the building. She did not know where the plaintiff got injured. She did not draw down the blind of her room that night when she dressed for the after-dinner proceedings. Charades were not taking place; progressive whist was being played. The lamp would be burning all the evening at full. She was not sure whether the light from Mr. Greenslade's office shone on the excavation, but it extended a good way along the stoep. She did not remember having tested a lamp over the excavation prior to the accident. She would certainly say that anybody walking on the stoep was bound to see the hole when the lamp was lighted. She did not mean anyone necessarily looking on the ground. She saw the poles across the stoep before the accident occurred; she believed they were there when the railing was removed in front of her private stoep. The poles were there for at least a month. The poles were fixed, as far as she could remember. The barrier was quite near the hole, only a few inches away. She had never at any time thought there was any blame to be attached to the contractors. She did not know that such an attitude had been taken by the Baths in a letter to the contractor's attorneys. She had never blamed the contractor. She looked over the barricade for any marks in the hole as of a person having been there.

Re-examined: She thought anyone in the hole could have seen the light from her room. The cement of the stoep overhanging the excavation about 15 inches. The edges were jagged, just as the workmen had excavated underneath. The cement was all intact; there was no appearance of anyone having broken the edges away. She did not think anybody could have fallen into the hole without breaking the concrete.

By the Court: There were a few showers during the night following the accident. It was about 8.15 a.m. when she looked at the hole. They had a dog in the hole one night, and she remembered that it could not get out, and it barked all night.

Witness, replying further to the Court, said she could not suggest any reason why the plaintiff should have said he had fallen into the hole. She did not think that he had been there at all.

Dr. Julius Petersen stated that in the early part of July he examined the plaintiff, and advised him to have the fistula operated upon. The plaintiff told him that he was finding his way from the back to the front of the house when he fell into a hole, from which he extricated himself by the means of a root of a tree. He agreed with Dr. Stevenson and Dr. Elliott that a patient going about with an abscess would get worse and worse.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Materially, he did not differ from the evidence of the other medical men. The plaintiff complained generally of pain without specifying any particular part when witness saw him in July. He came to the conclusion that the infection came from the fistula, and there he differed from Dr. Elliott and Dr. Stephenson.

By Hopley, J.: The abscess might have been set up independently without the plaintiff having a fistula.

John B. Greenslade, resident secretary of the Baths, stated that he remembered the plaintiff coming to the Baths. He was walking in a somewhat peculiar manner. The lights were usually put out at half-past ten o'clock. On the Friday night in question witness was sitting outside the inside bar when he saw the plaintiff come upstairs, but he noticed nothing particularly wrong about him. If anybody had fallen into the hole he would have come out of it with plenty of adhesive mud on him. When witness saw the plaintiff next morning he strongly advised him to wait and see the doctor, but plaintiff said, "I have important business, I shall be all right." He saw the two poles in the same position on the Saturday morning that they were in during the week.

Witness saw no traces of roots of trees in the hole. A person could not have fallen into the hole without breaking the cement slab in front of it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He sold his shares out in the company before the accident. He was positive that the plaintiff passed upstairs within ten minutes either way of half-past ten o'clock. He was not the person who suggested the theories of the defence, nor was the person who was responsible for bringing forward the little-tattle about the plaintiff's character. He was not the person who worked up the case.

There was no warning to a person that he should not walk down the stoep. Within two or three feet of the wall six rafters projected across the stoep. When the plaintiff was down at the Baths in September, he said to witness, "If your directors were to pay me £500 and sundry expenses there would be nothing more about the case." The attorneys for the defence were informed of this. It was unlikely that he (witness) would suggest £1,000 to the plaintiff to settle the case.

Norton Elam, of Caledon, proprietor of the Alexandra Hotel, said he was acquainted with the Caledon Baths. He heard of the accident on the Saturday, the day after it had occurred. Before the accident happened, there were two pieces of scantling to protect the hole; he saw the scantlings across the stoep on the day of the accident.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He was not a shareholder in the Baths Company. He often went up there; he was interested in the concert hall which was being built. He was on that side of the stoep, and he noticed the scantling poles. The matter had been mentioned to him two or three months ago. He believed some of the solicitors asked him whether he knew anything about it. Mr. Jacobsohn mentioned the matter to him, and asked him if he knew anything about the accident. He had had no conversation before with Mr. Walsh or Mrs. Halls. He was at the baths when he was asked the question. Mr. Greenslade introduced him to Mr. Jacobsohn. He had not talked over the case with Mr. Greenslade on any previous occasion. It was not suggested to him that he had seen any scantlings there. He did not see any rafters there.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juts: He had not the slightest interest in the case.

By the Court: He was sure that it was not the morning after the accident when he first saw the scantlings on the stoep. He was certain that he was not at the baths on the Saturday; he was certain it was on the day when the accident happened.

Louis Frederick Zietsman, M.L.A., and attorney, Cape Town, said he was at the baths in April and May of last year. He remembered the side stoep, where building was going on; he saw an excavation. He saw some poles and scantlings erected there. There were two pieces of wood across, fastened either to an upright or a railing.

Cross-examined: He had no interest in the company. If his memory served him correctly, he thought it would be about the beginning of May when he left Caledon. He did not remember the exact date. He sent a cheque on the 7th May, and he thought that must have been immediately on his return from the baths. This matter of the case was first mentioned to him by Mr. Jacobsohn on Saturday last. The scantlings and spars were being put up about the time when he left the baths; the work was not actually finished. The hole would then be about 6 feet deep, he believed. He did not remember having noticed a railing across the stoep at that time.

Re-examined: He was quite sure there were at least two poles or scantlings at the hole.

John George Walsh, of Caledon, said he was interested in the baths before it was floated into a company, and he was now local managing director. He did not live at the baths. He received on the morning after the accident a letter from the secretary reporting the accident to him. He went up with Swales, a plumber, about 8.30 in the morning. They went to the hole. Witness saw a barricade of two poles across the stoep. He also saw a lot of joists, with their ends projecting on the stoep. He saw a slab of cement towards the wall. He had not the slightest doubt about the two poles being there. Witness saw the contractor walking towards the building. He instructed the contractor that the barricade was insufficient, and that corrugated iron should be put up, so that children could not reach the hole. He had examined the hole; there were no roots or stumps of trees near by. He did not think it possible that there could have been any roots in the portion undetermined.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had not investigated the hole before a letter threatening a claim by plaintiff had been received. This would be a few days after the accident happened. He did not think plaintiff had fallen into the hole. He did not see the plaintiff. He did not know where the letter was that he had received from the secretary reporting the accident. He had as many shares in the baths as his brother; they held the major portion of the shares. He did not go up to see Mr. Anderson; he wanted to fix the responsibility of the barrier. Mr. Davidson was the contractor. Certain correspondence took place between the baths' attorneys and the contractor, stating that, in case they were mulcted in damages, they would look to him.

Mr. Schreiner: You thought this was a mere attempt to levy blackmail on the company?

Witness: It is what I believe. I believe it is a fraud Mr. Anderson saying that he fell into that hole.

Mr. Schreiner: And yet no mention is made of this in the correspondence or in the pleadings?

Witness: It all puzzled me to know what he was proceeding on at all. I had seen the barricade up. I did not know what leg he had to stand upon.

Mr. Schreiner: Yet, the plaintiff went there in September, and neither you nor Mrs. Halls, nor Mr. Greenslade had the delicacy to mention it to him?

Witness: I never went near him.

Mr. Schreiner: You see, not one of these things is raised in your plea, and you put the plaintiff to proof of everything he says in his declaration?

The hole into which the plaintiff alleged he had fallen was an old cellar. Witness was convinced that if the plaintiff had gone into the hole he would have hurt his head. Plaintiff might have fallen over the tennis court; which was in front of the stoep. There were trees near the tennis court.

By the Court: The hole was originally a cellar. The walls were still in good condition, and did not bear a crack. It was filled up with loose rubbish and stones, and with a covering of cement had formerly been made into a stoep. He was sure there could be no tree roots in it. The company's position was that if there had been no barrier, or there had been a bad barrier, then the responsibility was upon the contractor.

Richard Swales, plumber, Caledon, said that he was working at the Baths building on the day when the accident happened. He distinctly remembered having seen two scantlings across the stoep near the hole. He did not think anybody who fell into the hole would be able to get out unaided. He had had frequent opportunities of seeing the place. The light from Mrs. Halls' windows shone on the excavation.

Wm. George Cowdrey, of Caledon, said that from April to October last he was employed as foreman bricklayer by Mr. Davidson at the Baths. He knew the excavation in question. They were digging a hole to put two cross walls in. At the time of the accident it was about 5 ft. 9 in. deep. He remembered his younger brother having been in the hole. It was perhaps a fortnight before the accident. His brother could not get out, and he had to be assisted out. When they built the wall there were no roots in the hole. There was no reason why the workmen should go in after the excavation had been made. It was partly witness's duty to see that the hole was protected. There were two scantlings across the stoep, placed in a slanting position. There was a portion of cement overhanging the excavation. He went to the place on the morning after the accident, about half-past nine. The barriers were still there; the cement did not seem to have been disturbed. It was impossible to have walked on the cement slab without its having collapsed. He had passed in front of Mrs. Hall's room many a time in the evening; he did not remember an occasion when the room was not lighted. There would be sufficient light from Mrs. Halls' window for anyone to see who walked along the stoep.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had not been in the employ of Mr. Davidson for seven or eight months. He was now in business with his brother at Caledon. He had not since been employed at the baths; he had not laid a brick for them yet. He showed to some of the plaintiff's witnesses about a month ago that the cement slab would not bear his weight. Certain joists were moved up to the stoep on the day of the accident. Some of the joist ends were placed across the stoep. If a man walked close to the wall he might still go by and keep clear of the joists. The joists were intended for the new concert hall. He went there the following morning expecting to find the man in the hole. He went up with Mr. Davidson, because, he thought, the man had just fallen in, and he expected to assist to get him out. He thought his employer (Mr. Davidson) was joking at the time.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: The corrugated iron was put up on the stoep on Saturday morning, after the accident.

Wm. Arundel Creden, masseur and medical electrician, said he had been employed at the Caledon Baths. He saw the plaintiff at the Caledon Baths on the morning after the accident. He looked at the plaintiff's ankle; he failed to see any discolouration. He advised plaintiff to lie in bed until the doctor came. He had frequently seen the excavation. He remembered poles being put up at the excavation about a month before the accident. He looked at the spot on the day after the accident, but failed to observe any signs of a disturbance of any kind. He did not think anybody walking along the side-stoep in the darkness would be able to go into the hole without breaking the cement.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He left the employ of the Baths about the end of 1903. He saw portions of the joists projecting on the stoep several days before the accident. He was at present doing work for Dr. Thompson, but he was shortly starting business on his own account. He had an office in the Cape Times Buildings. He saw poles at the hole on the day of the accident.

John Hunter Mitchell, retired publican, of Sea Point, said he knew the plaintiff, and he remembered the latter boarding with Mrs. Robertson at Sea Point. Plaintiff was ill about a fortnight or three weeks. He did not know whether it was before or after June; it was before. Witness went to England. Plaintiff said he had a bad cold, and Mrs. Anderson said he had an old complaint in his back.

Mr. Schreiner objected that the plaintiff or his wife had not been cross-examined on this point, and said that he would have the right to call rebutting evidence.

Sir H. Juta said he quite recognised that.

Cross-examined: Witness believed that plaintiff was suffering from diarrhoea at the time. He did not hear any mention of a fistula.

Re-examined: The plaintiff groaned when he turned over.

Mrs. Bella Swales said that she was in service at the Caledon Baths in June last year. She had to look after the room occupied by the plaintiff. There was a balcony near, from which one could look out on the stoep and the excavation. Plaintiff's father-in-law and he were sitting together on the balcony. Witness was in her room, over Mrs. Halls' room, all the evening of the accident, from half-past eight. Witness and Mrs. Parrish (the housekeeper) were packing. They did not hear a sound. The light from Mrs. Halls' room shone on the hole. She noticed two poles and a piece of string on the stoep on the afternoon of the accident. Next morning, about 10 o'clock, she went out on the stoep to see whether there was a ladder from the stoep to her window.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: There was a Scotch mist on the day of the accident, and yet Mr. Jackson, who was an invalid, was sitting on the balcony at four o'clock. The plaintiff treated her in a respectful way. She did not think he was given to light thoughts. Nobody suggested to her that he might have been climbing to her room; the thought came from herself. She had heard that he was asking that she should go out for a walk with him. All that the plaintiff said to her was "Good morning."

Charles Maloney said he was a miner in the employ of De Beers at Kimberley. He was staying at the Caledon Baths between April and July of last year for the benefit of his health, as he was suffering from rheumatism. He used to sit at the corner of the front stoep, and he had an opportunity of seeing the excavation. Two boards were put up on the side stoep near the hole. The poles were there when the side wall was erected. On the morning after the accident he went to sit at his usual place. He saw that the poles were still there.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He was now living in Cape Town. He was still weak, but he was better than he was last year. He was first asked about this case on Tuesday afternoon. He was seen by Mr. Greenslade. He had not seen the reports of the case in the papers, because he was unable to see well enough to read. He used to have a temporary bed on the east side of the building. He sat on the other side in the afternoon, as a rule. He sat at the cold corner on the morning in question for a short time. He did not remember whether it was wet on that morning, or whether it had been wet during the night.

Re-examined: He met Mr. Greenslade on Tuesday afternoon in Adderley-street. He was sure that the poles were across the side stoep before the accident.

By the Court: The poles were not put up as soon as they began excavating. He could not say exactly when the poles were put up. He noticed two or three short pieces of timber lying along the verandah. He could not say whether the poles had been removed to allow the timber to be brought on the stoep, but the barriers were there at ten o'clock on the morning after the accident.

Maria B. Venter, chief housekeeper at the Caledon Baths, said she knew Mrs. Halls's bedroom, and she also knew that it was the custom of Mrs. Halls to keep a light burning in her room in the evening. Two poles or rafters were across the side stoep prior to the accident. She was positive that the barriers were there. She was certain that the poles were there on the 1st June, because on that date she had just returned from her holidays. She remembered seeing Mr. Anderson about ten o'clock on the night of the accident. Witness then took some medicine to a bedroom, and when she came back, the plaintiff asked her where he could get some stamps. She got some stamps for him; he posted the letters, and then went out by the front door. Plaintiff was smoking. She heard of the accident on the following morning before eight o'clock. She went out a little after nine o'clock, and looked at the hole. The poles were still there. The cement overhanging the excavation had not been disturbed.

John Davidson, contractor, Caledon, said he was engaged on the alterations at the Baths last year. The plaster model (produced) of the side of the building was made under witness's instructions and supervision. He described the operations at the stoep in question. There were no roots or shrubs in the hole. Two boards were put up on the stoep to prevent anyone falling into the excavation; these were put up about four weeks before the stated accident. The object was partly to protect children who were playing on the stoep. Those boards were never, to his knowledge, or by his instructions, removed. He went up on the morning after the accident, and, on Mr. Walsh's advice, he nailed corrugated iron to the boards. He would swear that he did not put up the poles for the first time when he put up the corrugated iron. He went to the spot between 8.45 and 9 a.m. on the day following the accident. He examined the hole, but saw no signs or marks of anyone having been down there. He looked for a cigar, as he had been told that the man had been smoking. The soil was black and sticky; the depth of soil was 3 or 4 inches. A man could not have got out of the hole without breaking down the cement. There were also heavy joists projecting on the stoep.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The model was not made to scale. The width of the side stoep was 8 ft. 3½ in. He would not say that the cement slab as shown in the model was correct according to scale. He admitted there was an inaccuracy in the model as regarded the soil shown at the side of the hole. The wall in front of the hole had been finished about ten days before the supposed accident took place. The workmen would have to go into the hole in order to build the wall. He did not see any bits of cement lying in the hole.

Mr. Schreiner: You feel if this matter goes in favour of the plaintiff it is a matter that concerns you?

Witness: It is a matter of law.

Mr. Schreiner: I don't want you to prejudice your position. You have had these demands made upon you?

Witness: Yes.

Further cross-examined: He was sure that the poles were put up not less than four weeks before the accident. Mrs. Halls spoke to him about putting up some barriers.

Mr. Schreiner: I put it to you that you supervised the putting up of that barrier on the morning after the accident?

Witness: I did not.

Further cross-examined: He did not actually supervise the erecting of the corrugated iron on the day after the accident.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Mr. Schreiner said that if they were to take the theory put forward by the defence of a conspiracy on the part of the plaintiff to blackmail the Baths, then they must conclude that a man like Anderson, with a good business, was a dreadful sort of person, but if they thought he was a conspirator, then was it unlikely that he would have had a confederate? It was not the action of a conspirator to walk quietly to bed and say nothing about the accident. They were asked to believe first of all that the plaintiff did not fall into the sluit, and, secondly, that he could not do so, because of the barriers, but they would remember that it was only when Mr. Greenslade came into the box that they heard of anything about joists. Did they notice how the witnesses for the defence, after hearing Greenslade's evidence, came forward with ready resource and spoke of the joists? If they were going to find his client guilty of a conspiracy they must also find that he was absolutely perverting the truth; that he simply had no injury whatever. It was difficult for Mr. Walsh to see that the plaintiff was making an honest claim after he had been inspired, no doubt, by the gentleman, who patted Mr. Moloney on the back on the previous day. Could they believe the evidence of the girl who said that the plaintiff winked at her at the table, or did they believe that the plaintiff arriving only on Thursday night pushed against her in the corridor? If they dismissed these cock-and-bull stories they would have to believe the plaintiff on his oath.

Through a failure of memory, he omitted to call the plaintiff and his wife on the points raised by the evidence of Mr. J. H. Mitchell. With the indulgence of the Court, he should now like to put a few questions to Mr. and Mrs. Anderson.

No objection was raised.

The plaintiff was then called, and said that when he came to Cape Town he first stayed at Milner Hall, Sea Point. Before he left there, he had a slight attack of diarrhoea. That continued off and on when he boarded at Mrs. Robertson's. He was not obliged to take to his bed. Mr. Mitchell called late one night in June, 1902, when witness had gone to bed. That was the only occasion when Mr. Mitchell saw him in bed. Mrs. Anderson did not say, "That's his old complaint." He had not to call in a doctor.

Cross-examined: It was not true, as Mr. Mitchell alleged, that he used to come to his (witness's) boarding-house two or three times a day when he was ill.

The plaintiff's wife said that her husband was not laid up by the illness described by Mr. Mitchell. She made no remark about the old complaint.

Cross-examined: She never spoke to Mr. Mitchell about the fistula. Mr. Mitchell might, perhaps, have heard it mentioned in conversation.

Mr. Schreiner then said he wanted the jury, where they had this conflict of evidence, to classify the testimony. He urged that the evidence given by Mrs. Jackson (mother-in-law of the plaintiff) was extremely strong corroboration of Anderson's account. Her evidence did not suggest for a moment that she was conspiring with the plaintiff. Four of the people who were visiting at the hotel had said distinctly that there were no barriers at the time of the accident. They were direct and positive in their evidence. The best evidence, he contended, would be, not the persons who were interested in the case, but the visitors at the baths. The only visitor called for the defence who was there at the time of the accident was the witness called that morning, Maloney. It was a most extraordinary circumstance that the defendants had not brought a single visitor who was staying at the baths at the time, except Mr. Maloney. Counsel proceeded to criticise the evidence given by Mr. Elam (of the Alexander Hotel, Caledon), and urged that he had been mistaken in fixing the day of the accident as the occasion of a visit which he paid to the baths. He commented on the disparity between the evidence of Mr. Zietsman, M.L.A., and Miss Venter in regard to the state of things at the side stoep early in May. Mr. Zietsman had said that the excavation had been begun when he left the baths early in May, and that he sent a cheque on the 7th May on his return to town. Then Miss Venter, upon whom the defendants' case hinged, came and told them that she went on holidays on the 6th May, and told them how surprised and disappointed she was when she came back to find that the stoep had been broken up, so that, presumably, the excavation had not been begun when she left. He asked them to disbelieve the evidence of Miss Venter, who had brought this trumped-up idea of a man making proposals to her for the first time in her life. Dismiss that, and the whole of this attempt to defend what was a perfectly just claim on the part of his client broke down entirely. He submitted that the conclusion the jury must come to was that this story of Miss Venter's was not to be believed. A deep-laid scheme of the most extraordinary character was charged by the defence against the plaintiff. The plaintiff was now practically on his trial, and if the defence were believed, then they practically found plaintiff guilty of the crime of perjury and of attempted conspiracy and fraud. In face of the evidence given by Mrs. Swales, how could they accept such testimony as had been given by Miss Venter? They had seen how the points in the defence had been dropped here and there. He commented strongly on what he described as the "cigar theory" of Mr. Davidson. There had evidently been a busy mind at work that very morning after the accident to prepare to meet the claim for damages that would manifestly arise. The case for the defence was built up on tittle-tattle, and they knew that from ancient times there was no place which was so full of tittle-tattle and scandal as a place of that kind. Counsel next dwelt upon the medical aspects of the case, and then addressed the jury on the question of the measure of damages to be awarded. He urged that it was reasonable that the plaintiff should have deferred the operation until the old family practitioner should arrive from Scotland. Surely it was not to be said that a man should immediately submit himself to the knife of the surgeon. Counsel next called the attention of the jury to the account of the plaintiff's business, and the gradual growth that it disclosed during the ten and a half months prior to the accident. He asked them to believe that the return was a fair test of what would have gone on under normal circumstances. Plaintiff made £83 profit per month while he was well, and then, in the subsequent period, his business showed a loss of £170. The plaintiff's claim consisted of £871 10s., estimated loss of profit for 10½ months and other items, bringing the total to £1,296 6s. 8d., in the way of medical and nursing expenses. But where in those figures did there come in the suffering, the destruction of life as it was, the loss of activity, the loss of nerve, the loss of business power? The man stood crippled before them, and he pleaded with the jury to award substantial damages. Counsel urged that the plaintiff had suffered singularly in the way in which he had had to prove his case. He called attention to a recent case in this court in which £3,000 damages had been awarded.

Sir H. Juta drew the jury's attention to several of the circumstances connected with the previous case of damages. He contended that counsel on the other side had in his excess of zeal not put that previous case to the jury in a fair light. In this case the question was not whether the plaintiff had met with an accident, but whether he had met with an accident owing to the defendants' negligence. The plaintiff had to prove that he met with an accident in this particular excavation. The jury would have to be satisfied that it was this hole into which he fell. The defendants also said that the accident was due to plaintiff's own negligence. The jury would have to find, if they gave a verdict for the plaintiff, that it was owing to the negligence of the defendants that the plaintiff met with the accident in this hole. It was not denied for a moment that he fell somewhere. This was not a case in which all the witnesses were contractors and persons employed about the place and interested in the litigation. But he submitted that by far the larger number of witnesses called by the baths were not now in the employ of the baths. The baths had said all along to Davidson—and he recognised it—that if this case were going against the baths, the baths were going against Davidson. The baths were only the nominal defendants in this case. It was not really a question between the baths and the man, but between the contractor and the man.

Hopley, J., said he would like to know what ground counsel had for putting the point so strongly to the jury?

Sir H. Juta said that he admitted that the contractor did not acknowledge liability, but the matter had been put to him in that way by the Baths. Proceeding, he commented on what he described as the very extraordinary conduct of the plaintiff subsequent to the occurrence. He alluded to the delay between the plaintiff being advised to have an operation performed in October and the operation carried out in February. They had the letter from Dr. Nairn to the plaintiff, in which he said: "The mere fistula or abscess could do you no possible harm by waiting, unless you have been particularly damaged by the fall. Don't undergo any operation whatever, if you feel yourself improving. If the doctors say you require an operation immediately, let them clearly and definitely say it is owing to the injury that you have just now received, and that they are prepared to back you up, otherwise no operation."

"Now that's not playing the game, to say the least of it. Unless the doctors will back you up and say it was owing to the accident, go on getting worse—wait. Why? In order to show that he was suffering badly. Surely the common-sense thing would have been to have the abscess removed." Continuing, counsel observed that the strangest part to his mind was Dr. Nairn's coming out. As to the plaintiff's conduct, he did not think it was the straightforward conduct of a man who, having met with an injury, did what he could to repair the effects of the injury, and then came to Court with a claim for damages. The plaintiff had done nothing of the kind. The conduct of the plaintiff in delaying was absolutely contrary to what every ordinary straightforward man would do. When a man had, through his own wilful blindness to follow the advice which he went himself to seek, then he had only himself to thank for his suffering. Who knew how fit he might have been today, if he had had that abscess removed in October? Continuing, counsel commented on the extraordinary conduct of the plaintiff at the hotel. Bar his statement, he submitted that there was not a tittle of evidence to show where the plaintiff went that night when he went out of the baths. He commented on the fact that the plaintiff never called out for assistance. He laid stress on the evidence given as to the lighting of the lamp each evening in Mrs. Hall's room over the excavation. Yet the plaintiff had told them that he saw no light. The plaintiff might have believed he fell in there, but he might be mistaken; and it was not a question of perjury, and so on, as his learned friend had suggested. He did not pretend that the plaintiff had not hurt his foot. Mr. Walsh said that the plaintiff could not have fallen down that hole; he did not say that the man had not hurt his foot. He wished the jury to ask themselves whether it was this particular hole that the plaintiff fell into, whether he was unaware of its existence, and whether he was himself to blame if he fell into that hole that night. On the question of the presence of a barrier, counsel remarked on the difference of character between the evidence of a person who said definitely he saw a certain thing, and another who said he did not see it. The former was either speaking the truth or committing perjury; but the latter, although a certain thing was there, might say that he did not see it, and yet be speaking the truth. Counsel proceeded to allude to the evidence, and confessed that he did not know what Mr. Hayes went into the hole for. In Mr. Hayes' zeal to help his friend he had gone a bit too far. According to the hypothesis of the plaintiff, that the place was in darkness, was it not likely, if that were the case, that he would have walked carefully? If there were no barrier, why did the plaintiff's witnesses want to know how Anderson got into the hole? It was ridiculous to suppose that Miss Venter would have concocted a most cruel and deliberate lie for the purposes of this case. To put it mildly, counsel suggested that the whole of that part of the evidence showed that the plaintiff was having a lark with the girls, and in all probability that induced him to walk away from the stoep. On the whole of the evidence before the jury, counsel contended that the plaintiff must prove that he walked into the hole, and that it was not guarded, and supposing they thought somebody removed the barriers, before they could make the defendants liable they must be satisfied that the removal took place with the defendant's knowledge. If the jury was against him, he would ask them on the question of damages to think of how the plaintiff had injured his own business, and how he had ruined his own health, and so destroyed his chances of recovery.

Mr. Schreiner, in reply, remarked that counsel on the other side had placed before the jury some very clever arguments, but those arguments, he ventured to think, would not weigh with the jury. He contended that the company were the real, and not the nominal, defendants, as had been alleged by the other side. There would be important legal points involved in this question as to whether the company could recover from the contractors. Negligence, as had been said by his learned friend was the basis of the case. He submitted that it had not been proved that any barrier had been placed on the stoep as a protection against the excavation. As to the animadversions which had been made on the plaintiff's conduct, he urged that the plaintiff had allowed a natural delay to take place before he underwent the operation in February, the man very properly desired to avoid what might be an unnecessary operation, and he was quite justified in delaying the matter. He submitted that the conduct of the plaintiff on the night of the accident and the following day was not the conduct of a conspirator or blackmailer, the defendant company. They could not theorize on this matter; the simple fact was, as had been said by the plaintiff, that he walked out on the stoep and fell into a hole. The defence, again, was based largely on suspicion. They had the statement of Mr. Davidson that he looked in the hole for a cigar. The suddenness and adroitness of the scheme was significant. It seemed to have been anticipated from the outset that the claim for damages would be brought, although nothing was said about a claim until a few days after. In regard to Miss Venter's evidence, he did not see how that could be believed, for it was too utterly incredible. He was surprised to hear his learned friend suggest to the jury that they need not find the plaintiff to be a liar, but that they could find that he fell into some other hole. They had had, he insisted, an attempt made for several days past to prove the plaintiff to be a liar. If the plaintiff were not to be believed in the definite statements which he had made as to what happened on that night of June, 1903, what other conclusion could they arrive at than that he was a liar? Counsel proceeded to deal with the question of the lighting of the excavation from Mrs. Hall's room, and designated the theory set up by the other side as absurd. He commented strongly on the failure of the defendant company to disclose the letter sent by Mr. Greenlade (secretary of the Baths) to Mr. Walsh (the local managing director) on the morning after the accident. In conclusion, he submitted that the plaintiff was entitled to exemplary damages, and contended that a sickly trail of suspicion and fraud had been cast over the plaintiff's conduct, and that the matter was one of immense importance to him.

Mr. Upington said that, with the permission of the Court, he would like to mention that counsel for the plaintiff had laid great stress on the point that the barriers were put up on the morning after the accident. He would remind the jury that the witnesses for the defence had not been cross-examined on that point.

Hopley, J., said he would like to put a question to the plaintiff.

Plaintiff then came forward, and was asked by his lordship which of his ankles was damaged by the accident. He replied that it was the left.

Hopley, J., dwelt on the extremely protracted nature of the trial, and the zeal and thoroughness with which the learned counsel in the case had brought out every point. Sir H. Juta had said that this was not really a case between the plaintiff and the Baths, but rather between the plaintiff and the contractor. He failed to see how or why the learned counsel should have said that. As far as they knew, there had been no attempt to shift the responsibility from the Baths' proprietors on to the shoulders of the contractor. It was true that there had been threats. The defendants, he thought, had made it extremely difficult, by the way of their defence, to cast the liability upon the contractor, Davidson. Alluding to the marked conflict in the evidence, he urged the jury to strip away from their mind the present surroundings as far as possible, and to take their thoughts to the Caledon Baths, and what happened there on that night in June last year, and to carefully weigh the circumstances and the probabilities. The whole defence amounted to this, that the plaintiff was a fraudulent swindler. They had to ask themselves whether the plaintiff and his connections were such that he was likely to be such a fraudulent person? Coming to the happenings at the Baths, he said the first point was, was the plaintiff injured at the Baths? The main question was, was that injury—if he did sustain such injury—due to the negligence of the defendant company? The question, it seemed to him, divided itself into two parts: Firstly, did the plaintiff fall into that particular hole, and, secondly, did he fall into it, because it was not properly guarded? A point that should weigh heavily with the jury was that the plaintiff on the very next morning told everybody that he fell into the hole on the stoep. His lordship commented on the fact that at the very outset the affair was treated by the company as of such importance that a letter was immediately sent by the secretary to the local managing director. The point remained that there was no other hole on the stoep, that the plaintiff swore that he was never off the stoep, and that on the day after the accident nobody inspected any other hole. His lordship then addressed the jury on the question as to whether there was a barrier on the side-stoep on the day of the accident, and observed that it was evident somebody was lying in this case, and it was for the jury to say whom. The jury must judge by the acts and attitudes of the parties at the time, and on the spot. The learned Judge entered in some detail into the various aspects of the evidence, and put it to the jury why the four visitors called on behalf of the plaintiff should have given perjured evidence? He did not see why they should. If they were to be believed, then the hole was not protected. A great point in the case was, was there a barrier? If so, then the plaintiff's case broke down. He next directed the attention of the jury to the question of whether there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Legally speaking, he thought the plaintiff was "invited" on the stoep. His lordship referred at some length to the nature of the plaintiff's injuries, and the measure of damages.

The jury found for the plaintiff, and awarded £1,000 damages.

Mr. Schreiner moved for judgment accordingly, and specially applied for costs as, between attorney and client.

Mr. Upington opposed the latter part of the application.

Hopley, J., said he could not see his way to grant the order for costs as between attorney and client, but he thought the expenses of witnesses from a distance, who had been waiting, should be allowed, and he should direct the Taxing Master accordingly. Judgment would be for the plaintiff for £1,000, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

BASSON V. BASSON. { 1904.
June 13th.

This was an action for divorce brought by the wife, Catherine Sophia Caroline Basson.

The plaintiff married Stephan S. Basson in community of property at Port Elizabeth in 1883. Subsequently he deserted the plaintiff, and lived in adul-try with a woman named Mary Ann Talmarke, at Albert-road, Woodstock. Plaintiff now sued for divorce, with forfeiture of the benefits in community.

Mr. Williams for plaintiff; Defendant in default.

Catherine Sophia Caroline Basson was called, and stated that she was married to the defendant in 1893. Her married life was always unhappy, and several years ago her husband left her and went to live with the woman Talmarke. Witness had been to the house, and had seen her husband and Talmarke.

W. T. Birch, clerk in the office of Mr. W. B. Shaw, deposed that he had written to the defendant claiming damages on behalf of a certain woman for seduction and breach of promise. Defendant had admitted his liability.

A decree of divorce was granted as prayed, with costs.

HEYDENRYCH V. JEFFERY.

Principal and agent—Promissory note—Payment to agent.

J. had engaged one S. to raise a loan. S. approached H., who advanced the money on J.'s promissory note, "payable to H. or order at S.'s office." J. paid the money to S., who, before paying it over to H., became insolvent. H. now sued J. on the promissory note.

Held, that H. was not entitled to recover.

This was an action for the recovery of £105, being the amount of a promissory note with interest a tempore morae and costs. The defence was that the amount of the note had been paid to Scott, in accordance with a condition endorsed on the promissory note that payment should be made at Scott's office. The note reads as follows: "Cape Town, October 15th, 1902. On the 5th day of November next I promise to pay to B. G. Heydenrych, or order, at James Scott's office, 10, St. George's Hotel Chambers, St. George's-street, Cape Town, the sum of one hundred and five pounds sterling, value received.--(Sgd.) T. JEFFERY."

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff resides at Observatory-road, and the defendant at Fairfield, both in the Cape Division.

2. On or about 15th October, 1903, the plaintiff lent to the defendant the sum of £100, and received from the defendant in respect of the said loan the prom-issory note made by defendant (copy of which is hereunto annexed), and which the plaintiff prays may be considered as inserted herein.

3. The defendant failed to pay the note on the due date thereof, and still neglects and refuses to pay the same.

4. Alternatively, the plaintiff says that on or about the 15th of October, 1902, he lent to the defendant the sum of £100, for which the defendant was to pay him the sum of £105 on the 15th November, 1902.

5. The defendant has failed to pay the said sum of £105, and still neglects and refuses to pay the same or any part thereof.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims:

(a) Payment of the said sum of £105.

(b) Interest thereon a tempore morae.

(c) Alternative relief.

(d.) Costs of suit.

To this the defendant pleaded:

1. He admits paragraph 1.

2. As to paragraph 2, he admits that on the 15th October, 1902, the plaintiff, through his duly authorised agent, one James Scott, lent to the defendant £100, and the defendant delivered to the said Scott in respect of the said loan the said promissory note.

3. As to paragraph 3, save that he admits that he did not pay the whole of the note on the due date, he denies the allegations in the said paragraph, and says that he has paid the amount of the said note as hereinafter set forth.

4. On the 15th November, 1902, the due date, the defendant paid to the said Scott at his office for the plaintiff, the said Scott being the agent authorised by the plaintiff to receive the amount of the said note, and his office being the place of payment prescribed in the said note, the sum of £4.

5. The said Scott being duly authorised in that behalf by the plaintiff, agreed to extend the said note for the payment of the balance until the 29th November, 1902. Thereafter on the 29th November, 1902, the defendant paid to Scott at his office for the plaintiff the balance, £101.

6. As to paragraphs 4 and 5, the defendant admits that on the 15th October, 1902, the plaintiff, through his agent, lent him £100, and says that the plaintiff received in return for the said loan the said note, which note has been duly met, as hereinbefore set forth. Save as above, he denies the allegations in paragraphs 4 and 5.

7. If this Honourable Court should find that Scott was not on the 15th and 29th November, 1902, the agent of the plaintiff to receive the aforesaid payments, the defendant says that the plaintiff represented and held out to the defendant that the said Scott was and continued to be his agent to receive payment, and did not notify the defendant that Scott had ceased to be his agent until the 24th August, 1903, prior to which date—to wit, in or about May, 1903, Scott absconded and his estate was sequestrated. The defendant, acting on the said representation and holding out, paid the amount of the said note to Scott as hereinbefore set forth, and by reason of the premises has lost all recourse against Scott, and the defendant says that by reason of the said representation and holding out the plaintiff is estopped from claiming from him the amount of the said note.

Wherefore he prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

To this plea the plaintiff made the following replication:

1. As to paragraph 2 of the defendant's plea, the plaintiff admits that a cheque for £100 payable to the defendant was handed by the plaintiff to the said Scott, who delivered to the plaintiff the said note, but the plaintiff denies that the said Scott was his agent in the matter, and says that the said Scott acted therein as the agent of defendant.

2. As to paragraph 4 of the plea, the plaintiff has no knowledge of any payment made by the defendant to the said Scott, and denies that the said Scott was ever authorised by him to receive, or ever received any moneys on his behalf.

3. As to paragraph 5, the plaintiff admits that an extension of time was granted by him to the defendant for the payment of the sum of £105, but says the said extension was granted upon the request of the said Scott acting as the defendant's agent. The plaintiff has no knowledge of the payment alleged to have been made by the defendant to Scott, and denies that the said payment was made on the plaintiff's behalf.

4. Save as above set forth and save as to admissions, the plaintiff joins issue with the defendant upon his plea, and again prays for judgment as claimed with costs.

Mr. Moltend for plaintiff; Mr. W. P. Buchanan for defendant.

Onus of proof resting on the defendant.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan calls

Thomas Jeffery, who states: I am the defendant in this case. I live at Parow, and have been there for 2½ years. I am well known in Cape Town and the suburbs as a builder. I signed the promissory note in question. About October I was trying to raise a loan on some property, and I was introduced to James Scott by James Scales. Scott said he could get the loan. He did not say from whom he would get it. He said he had one or two clients he would be able to get it from. I then left him the transfer deeds of my property. About a week or fortnight after, I went back, and he told me he had not raised the loan, but would do so within a day or two. I said I wished to meet certain bills, and asked him to let me have £100 on account. He said he had not got it in cash, but would get it from one of his clients. Either that same evening or next morning he handed me a cheque and gave me a receipt, as I thought it was, to sign. I had never seen a promissory note before, and had had no transactions in connection with one. That is my signature to the promissory note produced.

By the Court: I promised to repay the money within a month's time, as I thought the loan would then be through.

Examination continued: I cannot say what time of day this was. I got the cheque before I signed the receipt. I think I got the cheque in the afternoon, and I hurried to the bank at Woodstock and paid it in. I went to the bank with the cheque on the same afternoon as I received it. It is so long since I cannot say for certain. The amount became due on the 15th November, a month afterwards. I could not pay at that time because the loan had not been put through, and I asked Scott to extend the time for a fortnight. He said he would see his client. I called in again and he said I could have the extension, but he was a bit short of ready money, and asked if I could let him have a few pounds, and which case he would get me the extension of time. I happened to have £4 in my pocket, and I gave it to him. I got no receipt for that. I got the cash on the loan inside the fortnight, and I repaid Scott for the temporary loan by cheque. The cash on the loan was paid to me direct by the lender. The cheque produced is the one I paid to Scott. It is in the handwriting of Scott, but the signature is mine. I asked him about the promissory note or receipt, as I thought it was at the time. He said, "I have not got it, but will let you have it to-morrow." I called twice after this, but he had not got it, and he then promised to send it by post. I never received it. I heard nothing more until after Scott had left, when I had an application from plaintiff. I often saw Scott after I had paid him, and thought the matter settled. I came to know plaintiff by getting into conversation with him when he was speaking to a friend of mine. I saw him several times afterwards, and we wished each other "Good day," but he never mentioned the matter of the promissory note. I asked Scott on the day he left to speak to me, but he said he had no time.

Cross-examined by Mr. Moltend: I asked Scott for the promissory note thinking it was a receipt. If I have paid money and have previously given a receipt, I want that receipt back. I did not think it of great consequence that I should get it back. This was the first bill I ever had to my knowledge. I had not got to meet bills, but I had paid out cheques knowing there was not enough money in the bank to meet them, and I wanted to pay this money in so that the cheques would be honoured. The loan was for £1,500. I placed the matter in the hands of Scott, and he raised the loan for me. I was in urgent need of the £100 when I asked for it. I only signed the receipt after the cheque was given me. I remember making an affidavit in the previous proceedings (see 13 C.T.R., 866, in which I said I received a cheque for £100 from Scott. It was plaintiff's cheque, but Scott was writing a cheque at the time, and when he handed me plaintiff's cheque I thought it was the one he had just been writing. I just put the cheque in my pocket, and did not look at it until I paid it over the counter at the bank. I looked through a portion of the promissory note, but did not read it carefully. I cannot say on what day I went to ask for the extension. The letter produced was written by Mr. Scott, and I signed it.

Re-examined by Mr. W. P. Buchanan: As soon as I got the cheque I went to the Woodstock Bank and paid it in.

Further examined by Mr. Molteno: I cannot remember what amount I paid Scott for raising the loan. I paid him the £101 by cheque, and the £4 to settle the matter of the temporary loan. Scott found me a man to give the loan on the bond. I cannot say whether I paid Scott anything. I cannot carry accounts in my head for years.

Further re-examined by Mr. W. P. Buchanan: The £4 paid was part payment of the £105 due on the £100 loan. Mr. Hofmeyr gave me the loan on the bond. I paid Scott the £105 for the £100 loan, but nothing to Scott himself as agent for getting the loan from plaintiff.

Mr. Buchanan closed his case.

Benjamin Godlieb Heydenrych, states: I am the plaintiff, and am a financier carrying on business in Cape Town and Observatory-road. I remember Scott applying on the 15th October. He met me at Steer's office and said he had a man who wanted an urgent loan, and asked if I could discount a bill for £105. He said he was raising a loan of £1,500 on a bond, and when this was done Jeffery would repay the £105. I agreed to give him the money. He handed me the papers, including a power of attorney to sign a covering bond to me for £150 if the bill was not met. I came back in the afternoon and then gave the cheque in favour of Jeffery. I got the promissory note before signing the cheque. It is not the custom of any business man to give a cheque before he gets the promissory note. On the due date I got the note, which has been put in, asking for an extension of time. I allowed the extension. Scott brought the letter to me, but not with £4. The £4 was not mentioned. I went to Scott on the due date and asked about the matter, and he said the loan was not through, and might take another couple of weeks. I do not think I have seen Jeffery before. He may have had a conversation with me, but I do not know him. When Scott disappeared I traced where Jeffery lived. I then wrote a letter in August, 1903, asking for payment. I have never at any time authorised Scott to receive money on my behalf. If I did such a thing I would give him the promissory note for collection. I do my own collecting, and never employ agents. When a promissory note is made payable in a bank I take it to the bank, but if there are no funds I take the note back again. I never part with a promissory note before the money is paid.

Cross-examined by Mr. W. Buchanan: I have no office in town. I usually make notes as due to me at Observatory-road. I had the transfer deeds and the power of attorney to pass a bond in my favour.

By the Court: I never had the title-deeds. Scott had them to raise the loan upon.

Cross-examination continued: The promissory note is in Scott's handwriting. It was ready for me before I accepted it. The promissory note was to be paid at Scott's office. I was willing to apply there for the money. I take a promissory note as an acknowledgement of payment. I presented the promissory note for payment at Scott's office, and he then handed me the letter. The letter may have been dated the 14th November, but I got it when I presented the note. Steer is my attorney, and his office is on the same flat as Scott's. I do not do my business there. Scott would apply to me for loans, but the people paid me. I applied a number of times after the fortnight had expired, and Scott always made the excuse that the loan had not been raised. I lent the money on the papers, but defendant's address was not on them. I asked Scott for the address, and he told me not to trouble about it as he was the man's agent, and was raising the loan for him. I was trying to find defendant before Scott decamped, but could not find him. I am certainly a very good business man. If the interest is going on I allow a man to keep a loan. A promissory note bears interest from the date it is due. Scott was the only man who could tell me whether the loan had been raised. I know that mortgage bonds are registered periodically, but I do not always follow them. I let this matter hang on, but I was anxious to get the papers. I was too lenient in allowing Scott to put me off so long. It is possible that I knew Scott had gone insolvent in May. I followed the general rule that as long as I held the promissory note I was entitled to payment. I found defendant's address from a certain person whose name I would not like to give.

By the Court: When I presented the bill I received the note dated the 14th which was arranged between Scott and defendant on the day before.

Re-examined by Mr. Molteno: My business is of a confidential nature, and I therefore do everything in connection with it myself, and, as a result, I am always extremely busy.

Mr. Molteno closed his case.

Mr. Buchanan (for defendant): The plaintiff did not apply timeously; he lies by for months until Scott had become insolvent, and we had lost our recourse against Scott. By his silence the plaintiff led us to believe that Scott had paid him. See Bowstead on Agency Irvine and Co. v. Watson and Sons (5 Q.B., 102) Darison v. Donaldson (9 Q.B., 627) (where see judgment of Jessel, M.R.). The promissory note given to plaintiff merely says that the money was payable at Scott's office. It does not appoint Scott as agent.

Mr. Molteno (for plaintiff): Counsel for the defendant seems to think that Scott had a good deal to do with plaintiff. Defendant knew very well that he had to deal with the plaintiff. The defendant went to Scott to get him to raise a loan. Scott could not raise it, so he went to the plaintiff, to whom he gave a promissory note, by which he bound himself to pay to plaintiff or to his order. It was his duty, therefore, to pay to plaintiff; see Bills of Exchange Act, sec. 87, sub-sec. (1). Instead of that he pays his own agent (Scott). In this case one of two innocent parties must suffer; the only question is "which one?" Surely the one who by his negligence has contributed to the loss.

Mr. Buchanan (in reply), cited the provisional case of Heydenrych v. Jefferys (13 C.T.R., 866.)

Buchanan, J.: Provisional sentence was prayed last September upon two promissory notes, both in favour of the plaintiff, when the cases were heard together by the judges then sitting. One was the case of Heydenrych against Hector, and the other was the case of Heydenrych against Jeffery. In both these cases the money had been received through one Scott upon promissory notes given by the defendants to Heydenrych, the plaintiff. Scott's agency was relied upon in both cases. In the case against Hector, the parties were ordered to go into the principal case. In the case against Jeffery, provisional sentence was refused absolutely. The case of Heydenrych v. Hector came for trial in the principal case before me recently (14 C.T.R., 375.) It was found that Hector had seen Scott, who raised the money from Heydenrych's office. Afterwards Hector, through his attorneys, paid Scott the amount borrowed but did not obtain back the promissory note. I held in that case that, though Scott negotiated the transaction for both parties, and was to some extent the agent for both parties in raising the loan, he was not the agent of Heydenrych to receive the money from Hector, and consequently judgment was given against Hector. To my mind, the present case differs from that one. Here Heydenrych knew nothing of the debtor, whom he had never seen, and with whom he had had no communication, but dealt with him through Scott. Instead of making the note payable to himself at his own office, he accepted the note made payable at the office of Scott. He thus intimated to the debtor that Scott had authority to receive payment on Heydenrych's behalf. On the day before the due date, Heydenrych, at Scott's request, allowed fourteen days further time to be given, and on the date when the note was to be paid, according to this latter arrangement, the defendant brought his money and paid it into the office of Scott. This case, therefore, differs from that of Hector. In Hector's case the defendant did not perform his contract; in this case the defendant had performed his contract. He undertook to pay the amount at Scott's office, and he did so. He carried out strictly the tenor of the note—viz., to pay the £105 at Scott's office on the due date. But in this case there might even be a further defence on the equities. The defendant gave a power of attorney, which Heydenrych said was to enable him to pass a bond to cover this advance. Heydenrych afterwards returned this power and the title-deeds to Scott, treating him as his representative in this matter. He also received from Scott a guarantee that Scott would see that the amount was paid out of the loan to be raised for the defendant on bond. A loan was raised, and the amount of the loan was paid to Scott, at Scott's office, on the 29th November, 1902. Then, again the plaintiff made no demand upon the defendant for the amount after Scott had absconded and Scott's estate had been sequestrated. In these circumstances, even if the defendant had not so strictly performed his contract, as he had done, there would be considerable ground in equity for saying that plaintiff was now estopped from recovering from defendant. But it is not necessary to decide this point. Mr. Heydenrych says he never parts with his notes until he receives the money, even when they are made payable at a bank. Now, supposing the maker of a note had undertaken to pay at a certain bank, and, when that note became due he went and deposited the money at the bank to meet the note, and that some time afterwards before the holder got the money from the bank the bank stopped payment, would not the loss be that of the holder of the note? If Heydenrych had only inquired from the defendant in due time, he would have found that he had paid the money at Scott's office. This case differs so materially from the case of Hector, that I think the judgment in Hector's case does not govern this case. In this case, I have no doubt whatever that judgment must be for defendant, with costs.

This judgment was reversed on appeal (14 C.T.R.)

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPELY.]

REVIEW CASE.

REX V. NIEKERK.

{ 1904.
June 14th.

Magistrate's Court—Irregularity.

Where a prisoner had committed a technical assault on M., with which he was charged, and had thereafter committed a serious assault on B., with which he was not charged, but to which most of the evidence was directed and for which the Magistrate admitted he had really sentenced the man. The Court quashed the conviction.

Hopley, J., said that a case had come before him for review involving a decision of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Durbanville. One Abraham Niekerk was charged with threatening one Mosa with a knife. The evidence showed that Mosa kept a shop, and that there was some dispute between him and the accused, whereupon the latter threatened him with a knife. Nothing further happened, and that was undoubtedly a technical assault. Then Burghers Mahomet, a clerk to Mosa, intervened, and there was no doubt that the accused then had a struggle with Burghers, in the course of which he bit the latter on the arm rather severely. The Magistrate found the prisoner guilty, and sentenced him to three months' hard labour. The whole evidence dealt more with the bite on Burghers Mahomet than any assault on Mosa, and therefore he (his lordship) sent back the case to the Magistrate, with a note asking what the sentence was for—the threat or the bite. The Magistrate replied that it was for the bite on the arm of Burghers Mahomet, which was of rather a serious kind. The Magistrate, however, admitted that he had sentenced the man for a crime with which he had not been charged in the indictment. There was a technical assault on Mahomet Mosa, and the practical result was that unless the proceedings were quashed for the irregularity mentioned, the man might have to serve three months for biting Burghers on the arm, and, on coming out, there was nothing to prevent him having another three months for that offence. The matter was really so irregular that there was no way of actually curing it except by quashing the sentence. The man had been in gaol since the first of this month for a technical assault on Mahomet for showing a knife at him. His Lordship trusted that magistrates would exercise a little more care in the future. The fortnight's punishment would in itself be sufficient punishment for the technical assault in threatening by showing the knife.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte THE EXECUTORS TESTAMENTARY IN THE ESTATE OF CHARLES HODGSON.

Mr. Graham moved as a matter of urgency for a rule nisi, interdicting Augustus Hodgson, brother of the deceased, from passing transfer of certain property, until his indebtedness to the estate was satisfied.

Rule granted, to operate as an interdict, pending further action, with leave to the respondent to move to have it set aside, a copy to be served on the Registrar, with no order as to costs.

TRIAL CAUSES.

FINDLAY AND CO. V. HEMPEL.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan said that in this matter he appeared for the defendant, and the brief had just been delivered to him, and he asked for a postponement on the ground that there would be an attempt to settle the case.

Mr. Close, for the plaintiffs, pointed out that all his witnesses were present, and there was no reason given for the postponement. He was instructed to oppose the application,

Mr. Buchanan suggested that the matter might stand over until later in the day.

Mr. Close said that if the matter was ordered to stand over, he would apply for the costs of the day.

The matter was ordered to stand over until later in the day, and if there was no time to hear it, the case to be set down for July 1, the defendant to pay the costs of the day.

KAISER V. SHENKER AND CO. { June 14th.
" 15th.

Negligence—Damage to property.

This was an action brought by Harry Kaiser against Herman Shenker and Hyman Shenker, trading as Shenker and Co., to recover £784 9s., for negligence in not protecting a gable which fell on the plaintiff's property.

The declaration set out that on the 16th February, 1904, the defendants' premises in Longmarket-street were completely gutted by fire, and owing to the negligence of the defendants, a gable was left unprotected, and it collapsed on the 21st February, and injured the plaintiff's building. In March, 1904, plaintiff discovered that the remaining portion of the building was weakened and shaken, and it was necessary to take it down. Plaintiff had suffered damage to the amount of £784 9s., and he claimed that amount, with costs.

The defendants' plea set out that the gable was blown down by a severe wind on the 21st February, and it was not owing to their negligence that the plaintiff sustained any damage, the amount of which set out by plaintiff they denied.

Mr. T. L. Graham, K.C. (with him Mr. P. Jones), was for the plaintiff, and Mr. McGregor (with him Mr. M. Bisset), was for the defendants.

Harry Kaiser, plaintiff, stated that his building was a two-storied one, and adjoined that of the defendants. He valued his property, which was a well-built one, at £3,150 before the fire. Since the 21st February some of his tenants had left, and he had lost £14 a month in rentals. The fire totally destroyed the roof of the defendants' property, from which sheets of iron were flying about. Next morning he noticed that the gable was not protected in any way, and as a consequence it fell on his property, and destroyed a considerable portion of the building. Some of the tenants were injured, and the police had to take them out. On the 22nd February the Town Council notified him that his property was in a dangerous condition.

[Buchanan, J.: Is the insurance company not liable?]

Mr. Graham: No, my lord. The occurrence took place five days after the fire.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: The day after the fire he saw Mr. Hyman Shenker, and he went over the building. He did not know that the defendants had various people inspecting the building. There were a few cracks in the top of one of the walls after the collapse. It was continually blowing, from the time of the fire up to the morning the gable fell. He did not paint his property to save the cracks in the walls. His house was a substantial one. There were no women living in the house. The rent was paid in advance, but he could not produce any receipts for the amount. The people that lived in the house were highly respectable. In order to place the house as it was before the fire, it would cost £697.

Wm. H. Gray stated he had considerable experience in England as Municipal Engineer, architect, and surveyor. He examined the property after the collapse. The plaintiff's property was in very fair condition for an old building. The damage was caused by the falling of the gable end. It was certainly unsafe to leave the gable unprotected after the fire. He considered it absolutely necessary to take the plaintiff's house down, and rebuild it. He calculated that it would take £697 to renovate the building.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: His son was the agent for the property and he went through Kaiser's property in order to fix the rent before the fire. He saw no cracks in the defendants' wall. He was aware that the existing walls had been used in re-building defendants' property. It would be in the ordinary course for the Town Council to send a building inspector round after a fire. If the plaintiff succeeded he would not have a worse building than his old one.

Re-examined by Mr. Graham: The house must have been built with a good class of material considering the time it was erected.

By Buchanan, J.: The fall of the gable smashed the upstairs room, and from the debris he calculated the weight of the gable that fell. To use up the old material would cost more than purchasing new brickwork. According to his estimate the rebuilt walls would be of better material than the old ones. From his experience as an architect it would cost, roughly speaking, £100 a room to build a house of that description.

James E. Dyke, a builder, said he went over the property last week. He estimated that to put the property in the same condition as before would cost about £668.

Cross-examined: The old material was worthless.

Anthony Martinus de Witt, architect, stated that he had inspected the property in question. About 40 feet of the gable fell on to plaintiff's building, and 30 feet into the yard. If there had been a fire and the roof had been damaged, on no account should the gable have been left standing as it was. The gable stood broadsides to the south-easter. There were two gables. Witness did not know what became of the other gable. Plaintiff's building had been seriously damaged, and he estimated that it would cost £610 to restore the building. This did not include the front wall and portion of the side wall. If the Municipality insisted on everything being new it would cost about £800. The old material could not be used.

Charles Henry Smith, architect, gave similar evidence. The gable could have been roped so as to make it fall inside. It was unsafe to leave it standing under the circumstances. It would cost, roughly, between £400 and £600 to restore the building to its original condition. Witness had made no detailed estimates, not having taken measurements.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: He had not made an estimate as to the cost of removing the debris. It did not follow that the thicker the wall the better the support the gable had, because when the wall started to rock there were so many tons assisting to overturn it. It was customary to anchor the gables to the roof. There was nothing artistic in anchoring a gable to a roof.

John Mitchelmore, builder and contractor, estimated that it would cost £568 to rebuild the plaintiff's property, which was damaged by the fall of the gable. He contracted for £50 to remove the debris. The old material, to his mind, was useless.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: The brick was originally of a poor style.

John Cook, City Engineer to the Municipality of Cape Town, stated that under the Town Council regulations he had the sole power to determine whether a building should be re-erected on the old foundations. Yesterday afternoon he inspected the building, and he was positive that the back portion of the building would have to come down; but at present, he could not say anything about the front portion.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: The plan did not show quite as much as would have to come down. He could not say whether one of the walls which had to come down had developed the deterioration after the accident.

Harry Dalters, builder and contractor, stated he estimated the cost of re-instanting the building at £566.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: It was not an inferior-built house when it was considered the time it was built.

Frederick Draiby, architect, stated that he examined the property on the 22nd April. The gable ought to have been propped up. He estimated that £593 would replace the house in its former condition, without going down to the foundations.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: He would say about eight tons of material fell on the plaintiff's property. He knew that only part of the gable came down on the house.

Mr. Graham closed his case.

Mr. McGregor called

Henry Rowe, architect, who stated that he visited the scene of the fire when it was practically out. The following morning he visited the premises professionally. He made a detailed examination of the building, and found no cracks in the walls. When he inspected the gable after the fire, it was perfectly sound. In rebuilding, it would have been unnecessary to demolish the gable. On the day after the gable came down he visited the premises, and found the wind blowing fiercely. He thought that the gable came down through an exceptionally heavy gale of wind. A workmanlike job could be made of the plaintiff's premises for £215, which was about the average amount of the tenders. The building was a dilapidated one, and had it been brought to the notice of the Medical Officer for Health, he would have closed it. The roof had been constructed of second-class material.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: A strong sou'-easter was not blowing at the time of the fire. It might have been blowing strongly at Observatory, but not in Cape Town. He called at the fire because it was on his way home. He never thought it necessary to have the gable propped up. He never saw any of the Town Council inspectors at the building. Witness was quite prepared to leave the other gable standing after this gable was blown down. He thought it safe to leave it. The gable was built sufficiently strong to withstand an ordinary south-easter. If the work had to be done according to Mr. Cook's idea, it would cost £250. To raise the walls of a room an extra three feet would cost about £5.

Edward W. Pugh, building inspector, in the employ of the City Corporation, said he went to inspect the property on the day after the fire. He found that the upper story had been gutted, the roof principles charred, and several sheets of iron lying about, which witness ordered to be removed, in order to prevent them from being blown into the street. The walls were not damaged, and the gable was intact. Witness considered the roof and the gable safe after the removal of the iron. The gable must have come down subsequently owing to exceptionally heavy wind. After the one gable fell, the other practically lost its support.

Cross-examined: After the first gable blew down, he thought it necessary to secure the other.

Chas. Henry Edwards, acting building surveyor, in the employ of the Cape Town Corporation, stated that he inspected the premises on the 19th February. Regulation 163 gave the Town Council power to pull down any building that was dangerous. The timbers appeared to give support to the gable, and the danger notice was not issued until after the collapse. The notice was sent because of the collapse of the one gable weakening another, which was swinging in the wind. There were no cracks on the walls of Shenker's buildings.

[Buchanan, J.: If the roof was quite safe why did the gable come down?]

Witness: I cannot say what they did after I left the premises. The supports might have been taken away, or there might have been an over strong wind.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: The supports might have been weakened when the iron sheets were taken away. He agreed with Mr. Cook that the walls would have to come down. It was just possible that when the wall was tampered with the whole structure would come down. A good deal more than what appeared on Mr. Rowe's plan would have to come down.

Re-examined by Mr. McGregor: Some of the iron work was quite firm, and only that portion of it that was dangerous to the public was removed. The plaintiff's building was an old one, the stair treads being half worn through. About £70 would cover the extra work required on Mr. Rowe's plan.

George Smith, partner in the firm of F. B. Smith and Sons, building contractors, stated that he examined the plans, specifications, and quantities prepared by Mr. Rowe, and his firm tendered to do the work for £193. Witness inspected the building, and thought that the work specified by Mr. Rowe would be adequate to reinstate the house.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: Looking at the plans he could not say exactly what it would cost to do the extra work not provided for by Mr. Rowe, but he thought £20 would cover it.

By Buchanan, J.: His tender was a bona fide one.

Herbert Cox, contractor and builder, stated that formerly he was building inspector to the Town Council. Three and a half years ago he was in charge of district 6. He gave an estimate of £185 for the work to Mr. Rowe. He examined the building towards the end of May, and that was before he gave his estimate. Now he would tender to do the work in accordance with the Town Council Regulations for £220.

[Buchanan, J.: Will you tender that in court?]

Yes.

[Buchanan, J.: You had better accept that, Mr. Graham.]

With security, my lord.

H I

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: The side wall would have to come down, and that was not provided for in Mr. Rowe's plan. The whole thing would not cost more than £220, and he had been successful as a builder. He thought it quite safe to leave the gable unprotected even with the purlins charred, but he did not agree with Mr. Rowe that it would be safe to leave the gable standing with the purlins destroyed.

Hugh Frith, fire loss assessor, stated that he saw Kaiser's house on the morning following the fire. He was there to assess the contents of Shenker's store, and he visited the top story, and saw several iron sheets hanging loose, which he suggested should be removed. Nothing appeared to him to be unsafe except the iron sheeting.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: After fires he generally found gables pulled down. He would not say that he took particular notice of the gable. He never worked with Mr. Rowe.

Charles Jas. Robus, carpenter, in the employ of defendant, said he removed the galvanised iron from the roof after the fire. Most of the iron was loose, and no damage was done to the roof in taking it off. On the night the gable fell, the wind was very strong.

Daniel Kennedy, painter, Frederick W. Hardin^o wood carver, and Jacobus J. Myburg, plumber, gave similar evidence.

Hyman Shenker, one of the defendants, said he saw the property just after the fire was extinguished. The Building Inspector of the Corporation instructed witness to have the loose iron taken down, as it was dangerous to the public, and witness accordingly instructed his men to take down the iron. No timber was taken out with the iron, and the purlins were not touched by the men. He would not have left the gable there unless he had believed it was safe. He was advised by the architect and the Town Council inspector that it was safe. On the morning the gable fell the wind was blowing very heavily. After a portion of the first gable fell, witness gave instructions for the rest of it to be pulled down inside the building. The other gable was subsequently taken down.

By Mr. Graham: Everything he was required to do by the Town Council authorities he carried out.

Isaac Shenker, brother of the last witness, confirmed the latter's evidence in certain particulars.

Mr. McGregor closed his case, and counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

Buchanan, J.: The plaintiff is the owner of a certain building, divided into two houses, situated in Longmarket-street. The defendants own a store adjoining these two houses. The roof of the defendants' store was on the 16th February last destroyed by fire, and afterwards, on the 21st February, the gable wall, which had been left standing after the fire, fell on the plaintiff's property, and did considerable damage. The declaration alleges that the estimated cost for re-building the premises would be nearly £700, and that in addition the plaintiff has lost £42 in rent, and that the architect's fees for commission and plans would be another £44, making in all the sum of £784, for which action is brought as damages suffered in consequence of the negligence of the defendants. The defendants deny any negligence or default upon their part, and that is the question upon which the whole action hinges. Now, in the matter of negligence, I quite agree with Mr. McGregor's argument that the defendants are not necessarily answerable for every event which may occur, but that the fact of damages resulting must be traced to their negligence. Under the old lex Aquilia to which he referred, there must be some act done by a person sought to be charged; but there is another action known to the law—a noxal action—in which damages from a default may be recovered, and that more nearly represents this case. In considering the question whether or not there is any negligence or default on the part of defendants, the evidence shows that the defendants' building—a three-storied building—had the roof entirely destroyed by fire. At each end of the roof was a gable, and after the fire the inspector of the Town Council seeing these gables standing, inspected them for the very purpose of seeing whether they were dangerous or not. The evidence goes to show that when gables stand like this apart from the roof, they are an element of danger. The inspector (Mr. Edwards) did not think when he saw this gable that it was unsafe, as it was still attached to some of the purlins. He gave instructions to defendants to remove the loose iron. He says he does not know what took place in consequence of his instructions. The loose iron was removed by the defendants' servants, principally by Robus, and he says that the men in removing the loose sheets of iron, tried to get some of the purlins off, and that they did remove some of the burnt purlins. It seems to me very probable that even if the gable was safe when inspected by Edwards, it became insecure in consequence of these acts of the defendants' servants. We must bear in mind the facts that this was a three-storied building, that the gables were left exposed to the high winds which usually prevailed at that time of year, and that the gable was tampered with after the fire. If the gable was blown down in consequence of something altogether unusual, something very exceptional, it might be that the defendants' would not be liable, but I see it has been laid down in an English case that even if damages are done through a storm which is very unusual, but which is not unprecedented, such storm does not come within the category of what is called act of God. If a defendant can show he has provided for every probable contingency, and that notwithstanding through some course which reasonably would not have been anticipated damage resulted, he might not be liable. But it is a matter of common knowledge that south-east winds are very prevalent in February, and that during that month they are usually more severe than at other times of the year. After this gable was blown down, damage was done on the subsequent evening by gusts of wind in other parts of the town, but it is not shown that any damage was done anywhere else on this particular evening. Singularly enough, as soon as this gable was blown down, the same inspector of the Town Council thought that the other gable was unsafe. He saw it was rocking in the wind, and he immediately gave orders for it to be propped up. These two gables were, according to the statement of the witness, some 48 feet apart, and it is suggested that as long as the purlins remained the gables were secure. I do not see how the falling of the one gable could remove the purlins from the other gable at the other end of the building. Yet this one also was found to be so insecure that it had to be propped up. The defendant, no doubt, relied upon their architect and upon the city official, who had inspected this building. But this does not relieve them from liability for leaving an unsafe gable standing. The City Engineer was acting simply in the interests of the public, and though he did not consider that in the interests of the public it was necessary to take any steps, yet unfortunately, the very supports upon which Mr. Edwards relied were in all probability, taken off by the defendants' servants when they removed loose sheets of iron from the roof; and that an ordinary wind afterwards brought the gable down on the plaintiff's property. Under these circumstances, considering the position of the gable, and the two properties, and the manner in which the gable was damaged by fire, and the exposed position of the gables, I think it was the duty of the defendants to have taken steps to secure the gable and to prevent it from falling down into their neighbour's property. Not having done so, they are answerable for the damages resulting. I quite acquit the defendants of having done anything intentional to cause the damage. It is not necessary that the damages should have been caused intentionally to give a right of action. The damage resulted through neglect in not taking proper and reasonable precautions, even though the necessity for these precautions was not brought home to the defendants.

minds. Assuming, therefore, that there was neglect on the part of the defendants, the next question is the amount which plaintiff is entitled to recover. The measure of damage would ordinarily be, what it would cost to replace the house as nearly as possible in the condition in which it was before the accident. As however, the Municipal Regulations require certain improvements, and as new material will take the place of old, and the plaintiff will get a more valuable property in consequence, some allowance should be made for the increased value of the new building as compared with the old one. After analysing the evidence as to the cost of rebuilding, his Lordship came to the conclusion that £350 would be a fair amount to award to plaintiff. Judgment was given for the plaintiff for the amount of £350 and costs.

ANNEAR V. ANNEAR.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for the applicant. The action was one for restitution of conjugal rights, brought by Helena Augusta Annear against her husband James Charles Annear, failing which, for divorce, with custody of the three children of the marriage and forfeiture of benefits.

Counsel stated that there had been due publication of the rule nisi in the "Star," Johannesburg.

Helena Augusta Annear stated that after the marriage she and her husband lived in Johannesburg. Her husband, when he left her in 1891, said he was going to Cape Town. Witness remained in Johannesburg for sixteen months after her husband left her. Witness afterwards came to Paarl, and while there sued her husband for maintenance. Respondent then wired her five pounds, and afterwards sent her other amounts, but she had had no support for herself or children since. Witness last saw him in Simon's Town, but had heard nothing of him since February, 1902.

The Court granted a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, defendant to receive his wife on or before August 1, failing which a decree nisi to be granted, returnable on August 18, calling upon the defendant to show cause why divorce should not be granted.

SUPREME COURT

ADMISSIONS. { 1904.
June 16th.

Mr. McGregor moved for the admission of Martinus Fourie as an advocate.

Granted, the oath to be taken before the Resident Magistrate of Potchefstroom.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the admission as an attorney and notary of Willem Adrian de Klerck.

Granted, the oaths to be taken before the Resident Magistrate of Graaff-Reinet.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

DE JAGER V. DE JAGER.

Mr. Gardiner moved for an order declaring the respondent, Cornelius de Jager, of unsound mind, and for the appointment of a curator of his person and property. Mr. Roux appeared on behalf of the respondent.

Mr. Gardiner called

Dr. Robert Black, medical officer at the Valkenberg Asylum, who stated that the alleged lunatic had been under his care since May 9. Since his admission he had suffered from acute mania and acute excitement. He had been in the asylum on three different occasions. He thought the lunatic might recover within a few months.

[Buchanan, J.: Is he dangerous?]

Witness: I consider he is dangerous to others.

Margaretha de Jager, wife of the respondent, said that the five children of the marriage were under age. Her husband at times was very violent. The farm at Prieska in the joint estate was valued at £2,500. There was only £120 a year coming in to keep herself and the children. She would like Mr. Syman to look after her husband.

[De Villiers, C.J.: When your husband comes back after being detained, does he drink?]

Witness: No, my lord.

What brings it on?—He wants to do business, and he is too weak to do it.

By Mr. Roux: He had been violent to her.

Order granted declaring the defendant of unsound mind, Cornelius Syman appointed as curator of his person and property, costs to come out of the estate.

Ex parte VAN NIEKERK.

Res religiosa—Burial ground.

The Court refused to grant leave on motion to remove the bodies from a certain burial ground and to sell the same.

Mr. M. de Villiers appeared for the applicant, Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the Town Council, and Mr. Howel Jones for the Colonial Government.

Mr. M. de Villiers said that he appeared in May last on behalf of the Dutch congregational community of Rose-street Chapel, to apply for an order authorising the congregation to sell a certain burial ground in Somerset-road, and to acquire with the proceeds other ground in Maitland Cemetery. On that occasion Sir Henry Juta opposed on behalf of the Town Council, and he then suggested that a rule nisi should be issued calling on all parties concerned to appear at a further date. The notice had been duly published in the newspapers. Counsel took exception to the Town Council appearing in the matter, as they had no locus standi. He could not understand why the Town Council, who really stood in the position of plaintiffs, did not institute an action to declare their rights long ago.

[Buchanan, J.: I don't see how you can object to their appearance after the rule.]

Mr. M. de Villiers said he did not see what the Town Council had got to do with it. The plaintiff was prepared to produce all the books that had been demanded by the other side. Counsel then proceeded to read the affidavit of Frederick Neethling van Niekerk, in his capacity as Dutch Reformed minister of the Rose-street Chapel, which set out that in 1840 the then Governor, Sir George Napier, granted to the pastor of the congregation and to his successors a certain piece of ground on the Somerset-road, for the purpose of burying the dead. In 1886 the congregation enclosed the cemetery with a wall, and had maintained it up to the present time, but owing to the surrounding houses, it had now become a place for the deposit of rubbish. It was resolved by the congregation in April, 1904, to proceed to have the bodies removed and re-buried in the Maitland Cemetery, and that the said ground should be sold, and the proceeds devoted to the purchase of certain ground at Maitland. Petitioner prayed for an order authorising him to have the remains of persons transferred from Somerset-road to Maitland, and to devote the proceeds of the sale of the ground to the erection of a memorial column, and for the purchase of the ground at Maitland.

Sir H. Juta read the affidavit of Mr. Finch, Town Clerk of Cape Town, which set out that the Council were interested in the question of closing all open spaces. In the interests of the public health, it was imperative to prevent the ground in question being built upon. Further, in the interests of the public health, and out of respect to the dead, the Town Council thought if the bodies should be removed that the site in question should be left as an open space. The Town Council prayed that the application should be dismissed, pending the result of any proceedings to be taken in the House of Parliament.

Mr. Howel Jones read the affidavit of the Commissioner of Public Works, which set out that the Government would introduce legislation with regard to the matter.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the whole thing was very vague, as the Court did not know what the real rights of the applicant were. The Court would hear the merits of the case.

Sir H. Juta then proceeded to cross-examine the applicant.

The Rev. Frederick Neethling van Niekerk stated that the Rev. Mr. Vogelgezang died before he was born. From documents it would appear that he died in July, 1859. In 1888 there was a lease entered into between the Ebenezer Congregation and the Home Mission of the Dutch Reformed Church.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is your object in the cross-examination to show that the applicant is not the lawful successor of the Rev. Casper Vogelgezang?]

Sir H. Juta: Yes, my lord.

Further cross-examined, witness stated that the book containing the names of members of the congregation at the time of the lease was drawn up had got lost.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is the ground very valuable?]

Witness: Yes, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: My reason for putting the question is to see whether it should be decided on motion.]

Sir H. Juta: I feel it is a difficult position, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It seems to me to be a matter between the Government and the applicant.]

Sir H. Juta: Then we will have it out with the Government. It is a big question, my lord, and I think it would really not be wise to decide it on motion.

De Villiers, C.J., said it was quite clear that the case could not be decided on motion. There were very important questions raised on which the Court would require to hear evidence. The applicant would have to proceed by action for a declaration of his rights, with leave to the municipality to intervene, costs in the application to be costs in the cause.

MOORE V. THE COLONIAL MEDICAL COUNCIL. { 1904.
June 16th.
July 15th.

Medical Council—Act 34 of 1891 —Order for issue of licence—Reciprocity.

On an application for an order that a licence to practice as a dentist be issued by the Colonial Medical Council under the 19th section of the Act, it appeared that one of the regulations framed by the Council under the Act provided that dental diplomas recognised by the British Medical Council shall entitle the holders to registration in this Colony.

Held, that in the absence of proof that the applicant's diploma was so recognised or that he held a diploma otherwise recognised by the Colonial Council, he was not entitled to the order.

Another regulation provided that no diploma of a foreign country shall entitle the holder to registration unless equal rights are given in such country to the holder of any British registrable degree, but in the absence of any express authority given by the Act to frame a regulation of this nature, the Court declined to found its decision on this regulation.

This was an application on notice of motion, calling on the respondents to show cause why an order should not be granted in terms of section 19 of the Medical and Pharmacy Act of 1891, authorising the applicant to practise in the Cape Colony as a dentist. The 19th section of the Act provided that where the Council had refused to approve of a diploma the Supreme Court on application might, if they considered that the Council had not adhered to the regulations, after communicating with the Governor, order a licence to be issued to the applicant. The section is a reciprocity regulation, under which no diploma would be granted unless it was shown that the country from which the person came extended equal rights to the holder of a British certificate. The applicant held a certificate from the University of Philadelphia, and the State of Pennsylvania extends equal rights to the holders of British certificates.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Do you say that reciprocity is the only test?]

Sir H. Juta (for applicant): No, my lord, it is the only ground the respondent set out.

In his affidavit the petitioner stated that he had a diploma as Doctor of Dental Surgery of the Dental College of Pennsylvania, and had practised in Philadelphia for six years. Before coming to South Africa he was advised by the American Consul in London that other dentists possessing the same diploma had shortly before proceeded to South Africa, and that their diplomas had been recognised. He was also informed to a like effect by a firm having special knowledge of the procedure followed in various countries. He interviewed the secretary of the Colonial Medical Council on arrival here, and was told he could not practise in his own name, but could take a position as assistant. He subsequently took a post as assistant, but was summoned for contravening the Medical and Pharmacy Board Act, and was fined £25. He had tendered his fees to the Colonial Medical Council, but had received a reply that the diploma of the Pennsylvania State could not be recognised. Persons holding the same qualification as he held had been admitted. British diplomas were recognised in Pennsylvania, subject to an examination.

The answering affidavit of the secretary of the Colonial Medical Council, stated that the diploma of the Pennsylvania State was not recognised in the United Kingdom. Since the passing of these regulations only one Pennsylvania surgeon had been admitted, this gentleman having made application before the regulations were passed. The Medical Council contended that there could not be reciprocity, as between the Colony and Pennsylvania, inasmuch as the whole of the United States did not recognise British diplomas. Moreover, persons holding British diplomas were required to pass an examination in Pennsylvania.

To this affidavit were annexed two regulations of the Colonial Medical Council, one providing that only the diplomas recognised in the United Kingdom should be recognised here, and the second stipulating that there should be reciprocity in regards to entries where British and Colonial diplomas were recognised.

A replying affidavit was read to the effect that the United States did not make regulations governing the admission of dentists, etc., but delegated the power to the different States.

After argument

De Villiers, C.J.: The matter appears to be largely in the hands of the Colonial Medical Council, but the Court will give an expression of opinion, and ask the Council to reconsider the matter. The Court will remit the matter to the Colonial Medical Council with a view to their considering whether the examination mentioned in the applicant's affidavit is of such a nature as to take away reciprocity. If it is not, the Court is of opinion that regulation 10 ought not to stand in the way of applicant's omission if he is in other respects entitled to admission.

[Buchanan, J.: In other words, reciprocity of the State of Pennsylvania is sufficient, without reciprocity of the whole of the United States.]

No order was made as to costs.

De Villiers, C.J., I think that the Council ought to make their regulations much clearer than they are. The whole thing is in a perfect muddle, and it is quite impossible from these regulations to decide who must be admitted and who not. If I take these regulations literally, only dentists from the United Kingdom would be admitted, but I do not suppose that was the object of the Medical Council.

Postea, July 15.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an application, under the 19th section of Act 34 of 1891, for an order that a licence to practise as a dentist be issued to the applicant. The objection raised by the Medical Council is twofold, namely, that the applicant's qualification is not recognised by the General Medical Council of Great Britain, as required by Regulation No. 1 of the Colonial Medical Council, and that there is no such reciprocity between the United States, where the applicant obtained his diploma, and this colony as is contemplated by Regulation No. 10. The regulations in question were framed under the 20th section of the Act, which empowers the Colonial Council, with the approval of the Governor, to prescribe or define what diplomas or certificates will be recognised by the Council. The section further enacts that no diploma or certificate shall be included by the Council in such regulations which does not furnish, in the opinion of the Council, a sufficient guarantee of the possession by the holder of the requisite knowledge and skill for efficient practice as a medical practitioner or dentist, as the case might be. In order to succeed in the present case, the applicant must satisfy the Court that the Council has not adhered to its lawful regulations. The regulation prescribing that dental diplomas recognised by the British Council should entitle the holder to registration in this colony appears to me to be perfectly regular and within the power of the Council to frame. There is, however, no formal evidence as to whether the British Council would recognise the applicant's diploma, which he obtained from the Pennsylvania Dental College after a four years' course of study at that institution. Copy of a cable from the Agent-General has been produced by the respondent, to the effect that no Pennsylvania degrees admit to registration in Great Britain. This cable message is, of course, not strictly evidence, but if the information be correct, it would be impossible to hold that the Colonial Council has not adhered to its own lawful regulations. The applicant has stated in his affidavit that other holders of diplomas similar to his have been admitted here, but the fact that the Council has in other cases departed from its regulations would not entitle the applicant to claim that the Council shall admit him in the face of its own regulation. In regard to the want of reciprocity, I do not find any provision in the Act which authorises the Colonial Council to insist upon such reciprocity, even if it is satisfied that the applicant possesses the requisite qualification. I am not, therefore, prepared to decide that Regulation No. 10 is a valid one, but the question must be left open for further consideration. There will be no further order on the present application, but leave is reserved to the applicant to renew his application on production of proof that the British Medical Council would recognise his diploma as sufficient to admit him to registration as a dentist in Great Britain, or that, in other respects, he has the requisite qualification.

PROVISIONAL CASES.

BOARD OF EXECUTORS V. FISHER. { 1904.
June 16th.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence on two mortgage bonds for £6,500, with interest, less £268 of interest paid, and for specially hypothecated property to be declared executable.

Granted.

CILLIERS V. VAN DER MERWE.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond, and for specially hypothecated property to be declared executable.

Granted.

TOWNSEND V. SIBBERT AND STEPHAN.

Mr. Gardiner moved for the final sequestration of the defendants' estate.

Mr. Stephan appeared, and asked for a postponement in order to file affidavits to show that the debt was not due by the partnership, but by him (Mr.

Stephan) individually. His estate had already been sequestered.

Buchanan, J., the matter came on a month ago, and defendants had had time to file affidavits. The rule must be made absolute.

GARDINER AND CO. V. MACKIE, YOUNG AND CO.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved to make final a provisional order granted for the sequestration of defendants' estate. Granted.

BURDETT V. WIGGETT.

Dr. Greer moved for provisional sentence for £1,000 on a mortgage bond, and for property to be declared executable. Granted.

CUNNINGHAM AND ANOTHER V. SALONIKA.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for a decree of civil imprisonment.

Defendant had made an affidavit in Kimberley, in which he said he had a large family, and had no means.

Mr. Buchanan asked that the case be removed from here to the High Court of Kimberley.

The Court ordered the removal of the case accordingly.

DE SMIDT V. TRUNT.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of defendant's estate. Granted.

VERSFIELD V. DONOUGH.

TENNANT V. ZWAIGENHART.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate. Granted.

FORTUIN V. WEINTROB.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate.

Defendant said he was not insolvent. He only wanted time, as he was negotiating with a view to raising a loan.

[Buchanan, J.: What time do you want?]

Defendant: I want six months, my lord.

Subsequently the defendant reduced the period to three months.

[Buchanan, J.: Three months are altogether unreasonable?]

Final sequestration was adjudicated.

HALKS, CAIRD AND CO. V. BOESSEN.

Provisional sentence—Damages.

Damages cannot be set up as a defence against a claim for provisional sentence.

Mr. Gardiner moved for provisional sentence on certain drafts for the sums of £77 19s. 7d. (balance of draft), £114 1s. 7d., £32 10s., £56 3s. 7d., and £116 5s. 6d.

Defendant, who appeared in person, had filed affidavits, in which it was stated that the first draft sued on was given in respect of goods to be supplied by the plaintiffs to defendant. He alleged that part of the goods supplied were of bad quality, and claimed he was entitled to deduct for such bad goods. He had refused to meet drafts for goods in respect of which the other notes were subsequently given owing to the plaintiffs having broken the agreement. Defendant intended to enter a claim for damages against the plaintiffs.

Buchanan, J.: Provisional sentence is prayed upon a number of bills of exchange, which the defendant admits he has accepted, and he admits also that these bills were all accepted for value received. The first of these bills, however, was for invoice on a lot of goods, which, among other things, contained fifty cases of turpentine. The turpentine ordered was best American turpentine of a certain brand. When these goods arrived this was found to be adulterated turpentine, and consequently the defendant refused to pay the amount charged to him on account of this. This is the amount claimed in the first count of the summons. Plaintiffs are represented here by an agent, who, at the time when it was represented to him that the turpentine was bad, accepted payment of the balance of the Bill, deducting the amount of the value of the turpentine. I think that, prima facie, without any answer to this, there is a good defence set up by the plaintiff as to this balance of the first draft. As regards the other bills, the defence set up is that there was a breach of the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, whereby defendant suffered damages. He wishes to set this up against the claim on these documents, but it is a clear principle that damages cannot be set up against liquid documents. If he wishes to set up damages he must do so by action. Provisional sentence will be granted for the sums claimed in the summons, with the exception of the balance of £77 19s. 7d. on section (a), in regard to which the parties can, if they wish, go into the principal case.

ANDERSON V. KOEN.

Mr. Russell moved for judgment for £3,535 on a bond, and for specially hypothecated property to be declared executable.

Granted.

SMITH AND CO. V. HERMANN.

Mr. Russell moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £149 17s. 6d., less £30 5s. 3d., with interest and costs.

Granted.

VAN ZYL V. VAN GERVE.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £250, and for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £92 3s. 3d., for goods sold and delivered.

Granted.

WESSELS V. GAMBA.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence for £600 on a mortgage bond, and for property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Mr. Close moved, under Rule 329d, for judgment for £33 fs. 6d., for goods sold and delivered.

Granted.

BAM AND OLIFF V. BLOOM.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for judgment in terms of declaration, by reason of the defendant's default in pleading. The action was one for £500 commission on the sale of certain farms.

Mr. Alexander, for the defendant, moved to purge default, and for leave to plead. Counsel read affidavits in support of the application, in which it was stated that defendant only agreed to pay plaintiffs the commission provided they gave him a guarantee for the payment of the purchase price, which guarantee they had failed to keep. Defendant had been unable to file his plea owing to want of funds.

Mr. Schreiner said that the defendant had not stated anything as to the merits when he applied to plaintiffs to allow the bar to be removed. It was not until now when he came into court that defendant said anything about the merits. Rule 26 requires an affidavit of merits, and with this rule defendant now complies for the first time. He submitted that defendant must pay all costs, and that he should be put to a date to go to trial.

Mr. Alexander contended that the plaintiff, having compelled the defendant to come into court with this application, should be made to pay the costs of the day.

The Court ordered the removal of the bar on payment by defendant of wasted costs in connection with the bar. The Court directed that the plea be filed on or before Monday next. Costs of the present application to be costs in the cause.

MURRAY AND CO. V. HORSBURNH AND BARRE.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for judgment for £262 7s. 6d., for goods sold and delivered, with interest and costs of suit.

Granted.

MILBORN, GULLANDER AND CO V. HEMPEL.

Mr. Pittman moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £255 10s. 3d., for goods sold and delivered, with interest and costs of suit.

APPEAL.

REX V. RATHBONE. { 1901.
June 20th.

Liquor Law—Evidence—"Trap" —Conspiracy.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Vryburg, brought by Solomon Rathbone, of Vryburg, the defendant in the Court below. The accused had been fined £10, or one month's imprisonment for a contravention of Act 28 of 1883 in that he sold a bottle of F.C. brandy and a bottle of Cape brandy at a time not authorised by his retail licence, to wit, 9 a.m. on Sunday, the 17th April last. Mr. W. P. Buchanan was for the appellant; Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown.

The evidence of the principal police witness showed that he went out near to the Vryburg Hotel on the morning in question for the purpose of "trapping" the accused. He sent to the hotel one Philip Kotze and Albertus van Rhyn, who were supplied respectively with a bottle of Cape brandy and F.C. brandy. The licensed hours for Sunday trade were 12 noon to 8 p.m. For the defence a complete denial was given of the story of the police. The principal police witness, Corporal Jacobs, stated that he gave a marked half crown to one of the "traps," and he admitted that this money had not been traced.

Mr. Buchanan contended that the conviction was against the weight of evidence. He submitted that the liquor was either obtained the night before the alleged offence was committed, or it was got from some of the boarders or the cook. It had not been brought home that the liquor was supplied by either the accused or his wife, his brother, or any other responsible servant of the accused. The "traps" themselves were inconsistent in their evidence, and their story lacked due corroboration.

De Villiers, C. J.: The only defence which has been raised was either that there was a conspiracy between the witnesses for the prosecution to procure the conviction of the accused, or that the witnesses for the prosecution were mistaken. As to the theory of a conspiracy all the circumstances of the case tend to show that there was no attempt at conspiracy. A charge against witnesses of conspiracy is a very grave one. It is said that this was a serious charge that was made against the accused, but it would have been much more serious, in my opinion, on the part of the police corporal if he had made himself a party along with two other persons, to procure evidence against a man who had done him no wrong merely for the purpose of proving a criminal charge against him. The evidence supported the conviction if that evidence were true, and it is impossible for this Court now to say that the evidence was untrue.

Review—Appeal—Irregularity of proceedings.

On a summons for a review of proceedings in an inferior Court, it is not competent for the applicant to raise the question, whether upon a fair survey of the evidence the decision ought not to have been in his favour, but the applicant should confine himself to the grounds of review authorized by the law.

This matter came up for review from the Court of the Resident Magistrate of Lysikisiki, and the Chief Magistrate of Eastern Pondoland. Mr. W. P. Buchanan appeared for the applicant; Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown.

Mr. Buchanan said that the matter really arose in the first instance out of a dispute as to certain huts that the applicant had built, under directions from the Public Works Department. Certain of the huts were to be occupied by the C.M.R. The C.M.R. came on the scene, and took possession. The dispute ranged round two of the huts that the applicant said that the C.M.R. had nothing to do with, but which they insisted upon taking possession of and clearing out the goods that the applicant had there. The upshot was that the applicant came into collision with the C.M.R., and he was subsequently proceeded against on two charges—one of using abusive and insulting language and the other of assaulting a private in the C.M.R. He was convicted by the R.M. On an appeal to the Court of the Chief Magistrate the conviction for using abusive language was quashed. The object of the present application was to have the record of the proceedings certified to this Court.

The appellant did only what he was entitled to do. The property had not been handed over to the C.M.R. and the sergeant seized upon these huts before they had been handed over.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is this application made by way of appeal or of review?]

On review.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Review can be granted only on the ground of irregularity. Where is the irregularity in this case?]

The charge disclosed no crime.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Under what section was he charged?]

Section 158 of Act 24 of 1886.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Where is the irregularity?]

He was found guilty of assault when the circumstances do not disclose an assault.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You admit that what he did would have been an assault had there been no provocation?]

I go further, and say that what the appellant did did not amount to an assault at all. He was justified in repelling force.

[Hopley, J.: It seems to me that this was a mere civil dispute: why did not the appellant institute a civil action?]

He may not have been in a financial position to do so; but section 64 and 67 of Act 24 of 1886 recognise the right of a man to defend his property.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Has the sentence been confirmed by the Chief Magistrate; because you admit that you have no appeal from the decision of the Chief Magistrate, and that is why you proceed by way of review?]

Yes, I see that difficulty, but I say that the whole procedure was irregular. The Chief Magistrate refused permission to call three witnesses.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The Chief Magistrate could not grant you a roving commission to call three witnesses.]

The appellant had to defend himself, there being no attorney at the place, and the Magistrate refused to grant a postponement to enable us to obtain the services of one; and that is the second ground on which we ask for review. Our third ground is that admissible evidence was excluded.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You say that the record is incorrect?]

Yes, and in the similar case of Van Ryn v. Cape Licensing Court (7 Juta, 295) the Court granted review. As to appeal, see section 268 of Act 24 of 1886.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then why do you not appeal?]

It may have been that the people thought there was no appeal.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown) was not heard.

De Villiers, C.J., in giving judgment, said that this was an application to review proceedings in the Court below on the ground of gross irregularity. He had listened very attentively to the argument of the learned counsel for the applicant, but he had been unable to find any instance of gross irregularity. His lordship then passed under review the three grounds for the application which had been cited by counsel. He added, if the applicant had a right to appeal he should appeal, but if he pro-

Judgment in terms of the consent paper.

For the defence, Mr. Gardiner called Gideon Brand van Zyl, attorney, who said he acted for the first Mrs. Ashman in the divorce proceedings. Witness advised her to accept £500 and the piano.

inasmuch as the property was mortgaged to this extent.

Henrick R. van Ellewee said he first heard of the bond on the 3rd August. Before that he had no idea of its existence. Witness asked for £8 to pay his expenses to go to Cape Town to cancel the bond, saying he would do whatever was legal. Ashman did not send the £8 to witness's knowledge. Witness refused to sign a power of attorney. Witness became annoyed because the plaintiff sent a postcard to him addressed to the house of people with whom he traded, and so damaged his credit; and he thereupon made up his mind that Ashman would have to pay £40 before he (witness) would do anything. Witness's shop had been closed for a time.

This concluded the evidence, and Mr. De Villiers was heard in argument.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is to be regretted in this case that a simpler course of procedure was not adopted in the first instance, because if a petition had been presented to the Court, there would have been no doubt that upon the facts which had been disclosed, the Court would have made an order calling upon the defendant to show cause why the bond should not be cancelled. It would then be for the defendant to say whether he would oppose the application, and if there had been no opposition, then the sale would have been cancelled in the ordinary course without further expense. But the plaintiff has proceeded by action, and the defendant has defended it, and the question now to be decided upon the question of costs is whether the defendant was not justified in saying that the plaintiff must come into Court to prove his case, and to state all the facts to the Court, and that if the Court then choose to cancel the sale, the Court could do so, but that he should not be a party to it. Prima facie, the defendant was not bound to give any consent whatever. He was not a party to the bond. It was the plaintiff's own act to pass this bond, and it was for him to get out of the difficulty as best he could. Moreover, the bond was passed under certain circumstances, which would quite justify any person, and certainly the defendant, in saying that further explanation is required in Court. There is no satisfactory explanation yet as to why the bond was actually passed before any money was paid over to the defendant. I think it is to be regretted that the conveyancer who passed the bond did not give some explanation, but at present there is no explanation why the bond is passed in the Deeds Office, without any money whatever being paid, while the creditor was not in a position at the time to lend any money at all. Well, in such circumstances, the defendant was quite justified in saying: "I refuse to be a party to the cancellation. If the Court wishes to do it, let the Court do it; but let all the facts be disclosed."

The circumstances under which this bond was passed seem to be extraordinary, and it is quite clear that, but for the existence of this third bond, those who represented the estate of the first wife would never have accepted the amount which they did accept as her share if they had known that this third bond was a purely fictitious bond, and that fact would rather justify the defendant in believing that that bond was fictitious, and that it was merely intended to draw the creditors off the scent as regards the amount which was actually owed by the plaintiff. The facts have been proved now in Court, and they are by no means satisfactory to the plaintiff; but one thing is clear, and that is that the defendant is not entitled to this money, and therefore the Court is quite justified, whether the defendant consents or not, in cancelling the bond. The Court will therefore order the bond to be cancelled; but, upon the question of costs, I am of opinion, as the plaintiff was himself entirely to blame for the position in which he found himself, and as he has asked for costs in his action against the defendants, that the defendant was justified in refusing to give any consent until the requisite proof was given. I think, therefore, that the costs incurred by defendant for the purpose of putting the plaintiff to the proof of his case ought to be borne by the plaintiff. It is his fault, and his fault alone, that the present position has arisen, and therefore he must pay all the costs incurred for the purpose of correcting the bond itself, and of placing it in the position it ought to be. The order of the Court will therefore be that the bond be cancelled, and that the costs be paid by the plaintiff.

Mr. Gardiner asked for costs as between attorney and client.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court cannot allow the costs. One cannot help saying that there is something to be said that defendant might to some extent have facilitated the proceedings by himself making clear that he consented, provided that certain facts were proved. But he did not do that. As it is, the Court has gone somewhat far in making the plaintiff pay the costs, considering he got his judgment, and the Court cannot go the length of ordering him to pay costs between attorney and client.

Plaintiff was allowed costs as a necessary witness.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.) and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY]

APPEAL CASES.

HOBDEN V. RISELY AND J. 1904.
MCINTYRE. (June 22nd.

Magistrate's Court — Exceptions
— Misnomer — Summons.

A summons was issued against the defendant in the name of R. and M. without any mention of their Christian names. The defendant excepted to the summons in the Magistrate's Court, and upon the exception being overruled, he tendered the amount claimed which he admitted to be owing to the firm of R. and M., carrying on business as tailors.

Held, that the Magistrate ought to have directed an amendment of the summons, which could not possibly prejudice the defendant, but that the exception was of too technical and trivial a nature to justify the Supreme Court, after what had taken place, in practically setting aside the proceedings.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the A.R.M. of Maclear by which the respondents obtained a verdict against the appellant for £4 ls. for goods sold and delivered. From the record in the Court below it appeared that in May last the present respondents sued the appellant for £4 ls. for goods sold and delivered. The liability was admitted, but the appellant's attorney excepted to the summons on the ground that the full names of the plaintiffs were not inserted in the summons as required by law. The exception was overruled, and judgment was given for the plaintiffs as prayed. The Magistrate, in his reasons, held that the defendant, by making a tender, showed that he knew the nature of the claim he was called upon to answer, and under the circumstances the Court considered the insufficient description of the plaintiffs in the summons as not a fatal objection.

Mr. McGregor (for the appellant): See section 7 of Schedule B to Act 20 of 1856. In this case the rule of the Magistrate's Court was not complied with. The summons does not state who the plaintiffs are. They are supposed to be Riseley and McIntyre, but these names should have been given.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are they not a firm.]

Even if they are, the names of the parties should have been given.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Have you not cured that defect by your tender?]

No, the Assistant R.M. should not have admitted evidence of tender. Bridger v. Wills (4 Juta, 282) is illustrative of my case. It is most essential that the names of the plaintiffs should be on the record, with a view to further proceedings (such for instance, as execution). The A.R.M. seems to have thought that this defect had been cured by amendment of the summons. But there is no evidence of amendment. See De Stadler v. Morris (9 Juta, 408), Lolly v. Gilbert (1 Menz., 434), Farmer v. Owen (1 Menz., 124), as to the necessity of names.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would there be any danger of your being sued again on this bill?]

I think the whole matter now resolves itself into a question of costs. We have tendered the amount claimed, but we object to the costs, and say that they have been incurred unnecessarily. Then there is some doubt as to the demand having been made. The plaintiff produced his letter book, but non constat that the letter was ever sent.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If there was no demand, how came the tender to be made?]

I suppose it was made on the summons. I submit that the A.R.M. should have given judgment for the amount without costs.

[Hopley, J.: Why?]

Because we pleaded tender.

Mr. Gutsche (for the respondent): Substantial justice has been done in the R.M. Court, and I submit that the appeal should be dismissed with costs. The appellant paid an instalment on his debt, and after that did nothing more till a demand was made upon him. We have complied with the terms of section 50 of Schedule B of Act 20 of 1856. The plaintiffs were described sufficiently for the defendant to know who was suing, and the Court has never decided that the names of plaintiffs must be fully set out. All the reported cases bear rather on the names of defendants. As to the demand, the R.M. clearly held that that was sent. Jones v. Cuurin (8 Juta, 217). Moreover, no demand was necessary. The goods were bought for cash, and the defendant was at once in mora. The Magistrate had a right to decide on what was a sufficient description of the defendants. Malony v.

Conradie's Executors (6 C.T.R., 205).

Mr. McGregor (in reply) cited Derry on Partners to an Action (p. 170).

De Villiers, C.J.: It is always a difficult matter to deal with cases of this kind, for while, on the one hand, the Court might by allowing exceptions of this kind really do an injustice to the parties, on the other hand, the Court might encourage looseness in the proceedings in the lower courts. In the present case, it appears that substantial justice has been done by the Magistrate. The plaintiffs appear to be a firm of tailors, hosiers, and outfitters at Kokstad. The account served by them shows the name of the firm to be Risely and McIntyre, and that Hobden is indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum mentioned, £4 ls. Upon this account the defendant was sued. The objection taken was that the full names of the plaintiffs are not inserted in the summons as required by law. In strictness, this objection was correct, as there was a misnomer, because the christian names of these two gentlemen ought to have been inserted, and it is greatly to be regretted that the Magistrate did not there and then tell the agent of the plaintiffs to insert the christian names. The question now arises whether after all these proceedings, after the tender by the defendant to the plaintiffs, the Court would be justified in setting aside the proceedings on the ground of this original technical mistake. The 50th section of the Magistrate's Court Act shows that it was never intended by the Legislature that technical objections of this kind should stand in the way of substantial justice. Where there is a misdescription an amendment may be allowed, provided, of course, that the opposite party shall not be prejudiced by reason of such amendment. In the present case the plaintiffs were described by the title by which they are commonly known, and the misnomer would not, at all events, be of such a nature as to justify the Court in setting aside the proceedings. The question has been raised as to whether there had been no letter of demand, and the point is raised whether there ought to be any costs in the case. On the record it appears that the agent for the plaintiffs informed the Court that a demand had been made, and he was prepared to produce the letter-book showing a copy of the letter. Thereupon the agent for the defendant admitted the debt. But for this admission the plaintiffs would, I presume, have proved the demand. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Hopley, J., concurred.

HACK V. DREYFUS AND CO. { 1904.
June 22nd.
Oct. 15th.

Company—Power to sue.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the A.R.M. of Maclear, in which he found for the plaintiffs for £102 16s. 3d., the amount of a promissory note.

From the record in the Court below it appeared that the promissory note was signed on the 5th March, 1904, and the defendant was to pay the money to "Dreyfus and Co." on 5th April, 1904. Several exceptions were taken to the summons by the attorney of the defendant, all of which were overruled, but counsel now relied principally on the exceptions that the plaintiff, who was really the manager of the firm, did not set forth any authority to sue, and as the name "Dreyfus and Co." appeared on the note, there was nothing to show that "Dreyfus and Co., Ltd.," were the legal holders of the note.

Mr. McGregor (for appellant): The summons was excepted to as insufficient on the ground that the names were not set out in full, but as the company is a persona I do not urge that. Another exception was taken, on the ground that the summons did not state that the company was registered in this Colony, and that the proper officer of the company had not been sued N.O. The promissory note was objected to on the ground that it had not been protested, and that it did not appear that the plaintiff was the holder of the promissory note. I rely chiefly on the first exception scilicet: that there is another on the record to show that Dreyfus and Co., Ltd. were suing. As to proceedings taken by a syndicate, see Arling v. Belrier Syndicate (9 Juta 34), particularly the judgment of De Villiers, C.J., as there reported; also Stoffels v. Mills and Rethman (5 C.T.R., 29). In that case it was urged that the exception as to power to sue was premature when it was taken in limine.

[Hopley, J.: Why cannot a limited liability company sue in its own name?]

It can do so, but it must sue through some person, authorised by the articles of association, or by a resolution of the directors to sue. Non constat that Dalrymple had authority to sue. The normal persons to sue would be the directors, but Dalrymple does not describe himself as a director, but as a manager. He may have been only a local manager, and the company (if so disposed), can disclaim him.

[Hopley, J.: Would you wish to have the case remitted in order to ascertain whether he has power to sue?]

I would not object to that point being referred, but it would be a very serious matter to refer back the whole case.

The other substantial point is as to the form of the summons. The summons is too concise, and does not comply with the forms given in Schedule C of Act 20 of 1856. The plaintiffs are Dreyfus and Co., but the promissory note is in favour of Dreyfus and Co. Limited.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Are you prepared to show that Deyfus and Co. are not Dreyfus and Co., Limited?]

There is no indorsement from Dreyfus and Co. to Dreyfus and Co., Ltd.

[De Villiers, C. J.: No indorsement is required if Dreyfus and Co. and Dreyfus and Co., Ltd. are one and the same?]

If the Court is against me on that point I will not attempt to carry the case any further.

Mr. P. S. Jones (for the respondent): Should the manager of the Standard Bank sue there would be no evidence before the Court to show that he is authorised to do so; and so with Dalrymple. The onus is on the appellants to show that he had not power to sue. In any case when the defendant paid Dalrymple he would get his note returned, and that being the case, how could Dreyfus and Co., Ltd. sue again on the same note? I submit that this is a purely technical exception; taken, apparently merely for the purpose of gaining time. The case of Arling v. Belvoir Syndicate (9 Juta 34), is not on all fours with the present case, because there the liquidators sued themselves. As to Stoffels v. Mills (5 C.T.R. 29), it would seem that there the names of all the directors were set out in full.

Mr. McGregor (in reply), cited Lindley on the Companies' Act.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What does our law provide as to the seal of the company?]

See section 14, 57, and 100 of Act 25 of 1892, but I can find nothing about the use of a seal in case of actions. The Act seems to leave the manner of bringing an action to be provided for by the rules of each company.

De Villiers, C.J.: An objection was taken that there is not sufficient proof that Dalrymple, who signed the power, was the proper person to sign that power. It may turn out to be a purely unsubstantial objection. As there may be possibly something in it, the Court will order that further evidence be taken, and the case will be remitted back to the Resident Magistrate to take evidence upon the question as to whether the articles of association of the plaintiff company contain any provision that the manager shall sue on behalf of the company, and whether Dalrymple was duly authorised by the plaintiff company to take proceedings on its behalf, the evidence to be forwarded to the Registrar of this Court. There will be no further argument unless the Court thinks it necessary to hear counsel.

Postea (October 15th.)

De Villiers, C.J.: This matter was referred to the Magistrate for further evidence upon one point, and that was as to the power of Dalrymple to represent the firm of Dreyfus and Co., and to sue on their behalf. The Magistrate has taken further evidence, and it has been clearly proved that Dalrymple had the power. Power of attorney was put in in which it was stated that he had been duly authorised by Dreyfus and Co. to bring actions in this colony and elsewhere in South Africa on behalf of the firm of Dreyfus and Co. That matter having been cleared up, the Court will dismiss the appeal, with costs.

TRIAL CAUSES.

FOURIE V. FOURIE. { 1904.
{ June 22nd.

Mr. Gardiner moved for judgment by reason of default.

Judgment was granted as prayed.

TREURNICH AND WENTZEL V. ESTATE OF DE VILLIERS.

Funeral expenses—Authority of executor to erect monument.

This was an action brought by Abraham J. Treurnich and Dirk E. Wentzel against Bernardus D. Schut, in his capacity as executor in the estate of De Villiers, to have expunged from the administration and distribution account of the executor of the estate of the late P. I. de Villiers a certain item, on the ground that it was not properly chargeable to the estate.

The plaintiffs' declaration set forth that defendant is the executor testamentary in the estate of the late Petrus Izaak de Villiers and predeceased spouse, and was sued in his capacity as executor; and the plaintiffs were heirs in the estate in addition to the defendant's wife. Defendant had filed with the Master a distribution account, in which appeared an item as follows:

M. Veenendaal, for tombstones and enclosing graves of the deceased and his predeceased spouse, £51 15s." Plaintiffs alleged that the defendant wrongfully and improperly, contrary to the express wish of the deceased and against the wish of the heirs, had the body of the late P. I. de Villiers buried in a separate grave from that of his predeceased spouse, and next to the grave of his (the defendant's) child, and that thereafter the defendant wrongfully and against the wishes of the heirs, had all the said graves enclosed, and had tombstones erected over them. Plaintiffs further contended that the sum of £51 15s. was in any case an exorbitant one to pay for the enclosures and tombstones, and that the defendant incurred an unnecessary expense in having the same erected. They submitted that the defendant was not justified in so acting, and that the estate was not chargeable with the sum. They therefore prayed that the account might be amended, by expunging the item.

Defendant, in his plea, said that in the lifetime of the late Petrus Izaak de Villiers and his wife, the defendant purchased certain ground at Frenchhoek for the purpose of burying his son, who had died there, and at the request of the late Petrus Izaak de Villiers and his wife, he bought a piece of ground sufficiently large, so that they might be buried, one on each side of their grandson. About a year after the death of the said grandson, Mrs. De Villiers died, and was buried on one side of the said grandson, in pursuance of the arrangement. The defendant took no part in and gave no instructions as to the burial of Mrs. De Villiers. Thereafter the late Petrus Izaak de Villiers gave defendant instructions as to the putting up of tombstones and enclosing the ground with a railing after death. Thereafter Mr. De Villiers died, and was buried on the other side of the grandson, in pursuance of the arrangement. The defendant took no part in and gave no instructions as to the burying of the late Mr. De Villiers, he arriving in time only for the funeral. The plaintiff Treurnich had charged the estate, and had been paid for digging the grave. After the burial, the plaintiffs wished the body of Mr. De Villiers removed, and placed in one grave with his late wife, which the defendant refused to do, as being contrary to the wishes of the deceased parties. The defendant denied that the sum of £51 15s. was an exorbitant sum for the enclosure and tombstones, and denied that the expense was an unnecessary one, and said, further, that he had the graves enclosed and tombstones erected in accordance with the express wish and instructions of the deceased.

Mr. Burton for plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) for defendant.

Buchanan, J., remarked that this was one of the most novel cases that had ever come before the Court.

Mr. Burton: It does seem a curious sort of case, my lord. It comes as near as possible to quarrelling about the bones of one's ancestors.

Buchanan, J., asked as to the relationship of the plaintiffs to the deceased.

Mr. Burton stated that the plaintiffs were sons-in-law, as also was the defendant.

Evidence was then called for the plaintiff, among the witnesses being the manager for Phillip A. Caine, monumental mason, who deposed that a reasonable charge for erecting the stones and putting a rail round the graves would be £37 10s.

For the defence, Julius Bolman, monumental mason, said the charge was a reasonable one. Witness estimated that on a quotation of £51 15s. he would make a profit of about £7. To have done the work under that sum Caine would have to "cut the price."

Other witnesses were called who spoke as to the reasonableness of the price.

Mr. Burton contended that the executor had no authority to put up a tombstone and railings around the grave of the testator. Here, of course, the heirs were quite ready to erect a stone over the grave of their parents, but they objected to Mr. Schut acting in the way he did without having consulted them. The work was not to their liking, and they further contended that it was not worth the money. He submitted that where an executor did a thing which in law he was not authorised to do the heirs were right in objecting to what they considered to be an excessive expenditure.

Sir H. Juta said the plaintiffs in the witness-box had confined their objection to the amount only, and it was not for counsel now to raise the objection that the executor was not authorised. They ratified the action of the executor, and only questioned the amount paid. Counsel quoted Voet (book 11, title 7, sections 7, 13, and 14), with regard to authority to incur burial expenses, and also referred to Wilson and Others v. Bruton (12 Snel, page 234.) The heirs had, however, said they were quite willing to have this done, and there was, therefore, no need for the Court to go into the matters of law as though the heirs had objected to the whole amount. The whole question was the point of the cost.

Buchanan, J.: I have no doubt in this case the legal advisers of the parties did their utmost to prevent this matter coming before the public in this way, but the matter having come into Court, one must deal with the case as it is presented to the Court. The plaintiffs are both sons-in-law of the late Mr. and Mrs. De Villiers, and the defendant is a third son-in-law, and also executor testamentary to the estate of the late Mr. De Villiers. The executor testamentary in winding up the estate of the late Mr. De Villiers, brought up the amount of £51 15s. paid to Mr. Veenendal for tombstones, and enclosing the graves of the deceased and his pre-deceased spouse. The plaintiffs say that the defendant acted contrary to the expressed wishes of Mr. De Villiers, and against the wishes of the heirs in burying Mr. De Villiers in a separate grave from that of his pre-deceased spouse. The evidence shows, however, that in consequence of the death of a grandson—the son of the defendant—in Mr. De Villiers' house, at French Hoek, Mr. De Villiers himself requested that a plot of ground should be bought large enough to hold not only the child's body, but also the body of himself and his spouse. The defendant, therefore, bought a plot of ground large enough for this purpose, and Mr. De Villiers expressed to the defendant the wish that when his turn came he should be buried on one side of his grandchild and his spouse on the other. The defendant did not at the time live at French Hoek; but the plaintiff Treurnich lived there. Mrs. De Villiers died first, and Treurnich had her body placed next to that of the child. When De Villiers died Treurnich had a grave dug at the other side of the child, and directed that the body should be buried there. At this time the plaintiff was at Observatory-road. This, therefore, altogether disposes of the allegation that the defendant had the bodies buried in separate graves, against the wish of the deceased themselves, and against the wishes of the heirs. Here is the plaintiff Treurnich doing the very thing which he complains about the defendant having done. It is true Treurnich afterwards wished to have the body taken up and placed in the grave, which contained the remains of the pre-deceased spouse, but this wish was not carried out. The defendant did not wish it done, and the other plaintiff, Wentzel, did not seem to have strong wishes on the matter. When Mr. De Villiers died it was found that the defendant Schut, who lived at Observatory-road, had been appointed executor testamentary to De Villiers' estate. This seems to have given offence to Treurnich, and no doubt it was to some extent at the bottom of his action. After the funeral the defendant spoke to Treurnich, and said that he was going to put the matter right; that he was going to put in order the graves, and Treurnich simply said, "Yes; all right." The defendant expended the sum of £51 15s. in enclosing the plot of ground and erecting tombstones at the head of the graves of Mr. and Mrs. De Villiers—a stone over each grave. It would be interesting to go into the question as to how far an executor has authority to erect a monumental stone over the grave of the person to whom he is executor, and to pay for the same out of the estate. It is contended that an executor has no such authority, but that this is a matter which should be left to the heirs, and if the heirs did not care to do so they need not erect any stone to their ancestors. It may be that this is a matter of sentiment in which the heirs, perhaps, have more natural interest than the executor, but at the same time I am not prepared to lay down a hard and fast rule that an executor cannot place a tombstone at the head of the grave of the person to whom he is executor, provided he acts in a reasonable manner. But it is not necessary to decide this, because the plaintiff's declaration says they object to the amount on account of its being exorbitant, and an unnecessary expense. They come into Court and say they have no objection to what has been done. Treurnich says his only objection is that the price is too high. Wentzel does not object, but he says he does not consider the tombstones worth the money. The defendant, who held the same relationship to the deceased, says he certainly considers the amount a reasonable one to pay. In proof of this he says he handed over the administration of the estate to the Paarl Board of Executors, who considered this a fair thing to do. They consider the act of enclosing the ground and erecting a monument a fair thing to do, and the price a fair one, and they paid the amount as agent for the executor. The objection taken by the two plaintiffs that the work done is not worth the money is only supported by their own opinions, and that of the manager of Mr. Caine. The latter has had his information from the plaintiff's, and has only seen a photograph. He has not been to the place, but on the information supplied by the plaintiff's he says his estimate of the value of the work done is £37 10s. Mr. Bolman, on the other hand, who is also a practical man, has been down to the place, and seen the tombstone, and judging from actual knowledge says the price is a fair one to pay. I think on the whole of this case, considering the position of the late Mr. and Mrs. De Villiers, considering their social rank, and the value of the estate, it was by no means an unreasonable thing to do to spend £50 in enclosing the plot in which they were buried and erecting a tombstone. It is not a sum which one would not expect to be spent in connection with while he was on active service. In April, 1901, he again resumed service of his articles, and served for 121 days under his father, who afterwards left for the Transvaal, and became Master of the High Court.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the applicant): Rule 212 requires that there should be registration of articles within three months. Here confessedly the articles were not registered till some few days after the expiry of this time. The applicant has served years and years beyond the time prescribed. As to costs against the Law Society, see ex parte McLeod (12 C.T.R., 431).

Mr. Graham, K.C. (for the Law Society): We do not object to the admission, but felt bound to come into Court on the matter.

[Buchanan, J.: What do you say, Mr. Schreiner, to the breach of service?]

We are quite willing to make that up, and there are many cases in which a breach of service has been condoned under similar circumstances.

Buchanan, J., said that in this case there was really no objection raised to the admission. One of the objects for which the Law Society was formed was to see that clerks duly served their articles, and duly performed the contract of service that they entered into, and it was quite right in case of any irregularity that the Law Society should bring the facts to the notice of the Court. In this case there seemed to have been two points raised. The first was that there had not been that continuous service which was required by the rules of Court, but when they came to see the cause of the break and the circumstances under which it occurred, there could be no objection by the Court to condoning the want of continuous service. The applicant had served until almost the end of his articles, when he was called out during the recent disturbances in the country. The safety of the State was the highest law, and all other contracts must give way to that. It was a public duty that the applicant was performing, and he was called out, and the Court would, therefore, have no hesitation in condoning the break of continuous service. The other consideration was that it had been the practice for a considerable time past for the Registrar of this Court to require, when the articles were presented to him for enrolment, a certificate from the Law Society that the requirements of the law had been complied with. That was an excellent rule, and he was not inclined to say that it should not be insisted upon in future, but at present it was not a rule of Court, though he thought the Registrar would be quite right in carrying on the practice. In the present case Mr. Bell could be admitted, and an order would be made for his admission.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the admission of Jacobus Pietrus Viljoen as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, oaths to be taken before the Resident Magistrate of Prieska.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

HARRIS V. DOYLE. { 1904.
June 23rd.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on four promissory notes, representing a total of £355, less £15 paid on account.

Mr. Percy Jones applied for the postponement of the matter for a fortnight, owing to the absence of the defendant at Queen's Town. He read an affidavit sworn by a clerk in the defendant's employ, which embodied a telegram from the defendant disputing the claim. Deponent believed there was a good defence to the claim.

Mr. Buchanan read a replying affidavit by the plaintiff, Leah Harris, a widow, of St. George's-street, who stated that the only payment she had received was the £15 with which defendant had been credited. The only goods she had received from the defendant had been in lieu of interest. Counsel objected to a postponement, and said that the plaintiff had been constantly put off by the defendant.

The matter was postponed until the 14th July, costs to abide the result.

ZEEDERBERG AND DUNCAN V. ANDRUSIE.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Final order granted.

ASPELING V. ALLIE AND AHMED.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £650, the bond being due by reason of notice: and for interest and property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

In re STABLEFORD AND CO. { 1904.
June 23rd.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor), moved as a matter of urgency for the winding-up of this company by an order of Court. The petitioners were Mr. E. R. Syfret and others having claims against the company, which was at present in voluntary liquidation. The petition stated that the company was registered in a capital originally of £1,500, which was increased from time to time to £45,000. The total value of the assets was estimated at £18,600, and it was estimated that the deficiency between assets and liabilities was £9,169 odd. Certain of the property of the company had been attached by an order of the Court upon a bond ceded by one Kidney to one Cowling.

Order granted, winding up the company and appointing the petitioners as provisional liquidators, and a rule granted, returnable 7th July, calling on all persons concerned to show cause why the provisional liquidators should not be appointed official liquidators, with powers under sections 149 and 151 of the Act, one publication in the "Government Gazette" and one in the "Cape Times."

Ex parte NASIEBA AND OTHERS.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for an order authorising the petitioners in their capacity as executors to raise £200 on mortgage in the interest of a minor.

Order granted.

NICOLAS V. NICOLAS.

Mr. Wilkinson said that this matter was before the Court on the 17th inst., when the plaintiff obtained a decree of divorce against her husband. The defendant was ordered to show cause why the joint estate should not be appraised and one-half of the proceeds handed over to the plaintiff, and for the appointment of two receivers. Counsel now put in a consent paper signed by the parties.

Judgment in terms of the consent paper, costs to be paid out of the joint estate.

Ex parte WOOD.

Mr. Graham, K.C., moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to pass transfer of certain property at the corner of Newmarket-street and Dorset-street, Cape Town, to one J. Z. Drake, to whom the petitioner had disposed of the ground. The Registrar refused to pass transfer on the ground that the said property was registered in the name of another party. This unfortunately occurred owing to the fact that in the early days the Municipality kept no records of transfers of Municipal property.

Order granted.

Ex parte HANDS.

Mr. P. Jones moved, under section 113 of the English Bankruptcy Rules of Court, for an order seeking the aid of the Natal Courts in recognising the sequestration in the Supreme Court of the Cape Colony of the estate of Mackie, Young and Co. The estate was finally sequestered on the 9th inst., and the petitioner was appointed curator bonis. He had been informed that the said Mackie, Young and Co. carried on a business at Durban, the stock of which was valued at about £300, with certain outstanding debts. It was understood that the creditors in Natal were pressing, and it was desirable in the interest of the creditors generally that the assets in Natal should be secured.

Order granted in terms of the usual precedent of the Court.

Ex parte STEINHOBEL.

Mr. Roux moved for an order authorising the petitioner to purchase certain property in the interest of the minors. The Master recommended the purchase.

Order granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte GINSBERG.

Mr. P. Jones moved for an order authorising the Registrar to register a certain ante-nuptial contract entered into between the parties in Germany. The original minute was signed by both parties, but the Registrar refused to register the contract.

Buchanan, J., said he would like to know what the Registrar's objections were, and ordered the matter to stand over until to-morrow morning.

Ex parte WINKELMAN AND ANOTHER.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the sale of certain property in order to invest the proceeds in other landed property.

Order granted.

WINDVOGEL V. BISHOP OF ST. JOHN'S.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan, for the respondent, moved for an order barring the appellant from prosecuting his appeal. There was an affidavit of personal service. The appellant had not proceeded with his appeal within reasonable time.

Order granted.

Ex parte FOUCHE AND OTHERS.

Mr. Sutton moved for an order authorising the Registrar to register certain property at Hanover, in the names of the petitioners.

The matter was ordered to stand over for the Registrar's report.

GOLDER V. HOWES.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the High Sheriff to sell certain property by private treaty. The property had been declared executable by the Supreme Court, and there were three mortgage bonds on it to the extent of £500, £100, and £100. At a meeting of mortgagees, when all three were represented, it was decided that the property should be sold by public auction, with a reserve price of £700. Only £500 was offered. The petitioner, who was the second mortgagee, had received a private offer of £700 for it. The respondent, who is the third mortgagee, it was believed had left the Colony, and the other bond holders had agreed to the sale of the property by private treaty for £700.

Order granted.

LUMSDEN V. EAST LONDON { 1904.
MUNICIPALITY. { June 23rd.
 " 24th.

This was an application to make absolute a rule interdicting the respondents from selling certain land between Albany-street and Stevenson-street, East London. The petitioner was joined by other property holders in the district, who contended that the piece of land was a street. The affidavit of the petitioner stated that he had improved his property to the extent of £15,000, his plans had been passed by the Municipality, and he would not have gone to this expense if he had thought that there would be any attempt on the part of the Municipality to dispose of the ground. If the sale were permitted, it would be a gross breach of faith with the owners of the adjoining property, and it would be a great danger to the public health, should it cease to be a means of disposing of sanitary matter. Petitioners were always willing to pay a certain sum for the proper construction of a road. The value of the ground to the Municipality was paltry, but to the petitioners, the holders of the adjoining property, it was a very serious item.

The respondent's answering affidavits set out that the piece of ground was vested in the Municipality as vacant common or pasture land, and they were entitled, under the Act of 1880, to dispose of it for money to carry on important public works. Due notice was given of the intention to sell, but there was only one objection within the proper time. The piece of ground was described as vacant, and it had never been shown to the Council to be a road or street. It never could be used as a thoroughfare, and people who used it as means of access to their premises did so without permission. If any of the applicants who purchased lots considered the ground in question to be a street, they had only their own surveys to blame.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for applicant; Mr. Graham, K.C., for respondents.

[Buchanan, J.: Did I gather the price of the land from the affidavits?]

Mr. Schreiner: In the respondents' affidavits, they say they can get a good price for it.

Mr. Graham: And the applicants say it is of a paltry value. I might mention that we have been offered £1,100 for it.

[Buchanan, J.: Both attorneys might wire down and get replies at once.]

Mr. Graham said that, according to section 42 of Act 23 of 1880, all property and servitudes vested in the Commissioners, and all unsold erven and Municipal pasture land, was transferred and vested in the Corporation. Under the following section, the Council could dispose of, with the consent of the Governor, any such land, if they gave continuous public notice. All these conditions had been fulfilled by the respondents. Counsel contended that the East London Municipal Council had never in any way mentioned or described the vacant ground as being a road. The first time this land appeared to have been called a road was in 1897, when some purchasers of land adjoining it, in sub-dividing it, called the land in question a road, but without any authority for doing so. The idea that seemed to prevail was that, because this piece of land adjoined two streets, it must itself be a street. With regard to the statement that the ground would interfere with the sanitary arrangements, the Sanitary Inspector had stated that it would not.

[Buchanan, J.: He has not made an affidavit to that effect.]

We have his evidence to that effect. It is peculiar that the other side have not expert evidence in support of their contention. Continuing, counsel stated that it was intended to devote the amount derived from the sale of the land to complete the drainage section between Stevenson-street and North-street. For sanitary purposes, this portion of the town compared favourably with any other part. It was unlikely that the Town Council would allow houses to be erected on this ground unless adequate arrangements were made for drainage.

Mr. Schreiner contended that if the Government had had the facts of the case before them, they never would have given the grant to the Municipality. It was a most significant omission from the minutes of the Council to leave out the lease to the Convent. It could not take place without correspondence with the Government, and here again that correspondence was not put forward. If the Government had had Mr. Murray's diagram before them they would never have decided that the strip of land in question was vacant. Up to a certain time in the correspondence the Act of 1880 was followed, but it was important to note that the Council afterwards adverted to the Act of 1887. Counsel contended that it was municipal land dedicated as a street, and it never could be shown that it was Crown land. If, in 1882, the Court found that the strip of ground was set apart as a lane or thoroughfare, then the applicants were entitled to their rights. The case must be concluded on the broad question whether when the plots were sold when the Convent property was leased in 1882, and when Murray prepared the diagram, this strip of land was dedicated for public use, and, secondly, if that were so, whether it had been used by persons in the neighbourhood as a lane which they were entitled to use. The applicants were large municipal ratepayers, who had submitted their plans to the Council, and it was difficult to conceive why the latter should come forward now and attempt to sell the land. The Government's consent, counsel contended, was given on imperfect information. He would prefer, if his learned friend would try and bring about a condition of things between the municipality and the ratepayers by which the interests of the latter might be properly represented, and any suggestion his lordship might make would be gladly welcomed by his clients.

[Buchanan, J.: One might fancy a satisfactory arrangement between the parties could be arrived at if a certain payment was made.]

Mr. Graham: Of course, the principle is very important, my lord.

Buchanan, J., said he would like to know what was done at the time of the sale of lot R if there were any records in the Council minutes.

Mr. Schreiner said that he thought there must be some record in the Municipal minutes of the grant to the Council.

Buchanan, J., said that he thought that the ground might be disposed of with a reserve maintaining it as a road or thoroughfare. The case would stand over for further information.

[N.B.—Up to the present date (Dec. 31st, 1904), the further information desired by the Court has not been produced.]

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

TRIAL CAUSES.

PORTER V. KADER. { 1904.
 { June 24th.

This was an action brought by Philip John Porter, land and commission agent, Claremont, against Abdol Kader, of Cape Town, to recover balance of account for goods sold and delivered, with interest a tempore morae and costs.

The plaintiff, in his declaration, said that he sold several quantities of bricks to the defendant, and that he had received £55 on account, leaving an amount still owing of £68 8s. 9d., which sum he claimed.

The defendant, in his plea, said that he had not received all the bricks alleged to have been delivered, and that he disputed the amount claimed.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for the plaintiff; the defendant was in default.

Formal evidence was called in support of the claim.

The plaintiff, Philip John Porter, land, commission, and estate agent, said that on the 23rd June, 1903, he sold 20,000 bricks to the defendant at £4 per 1,000, and in the course of a day or two received £55 on account. On the 10th July the defendant came and ordered further bricks, and told him to go on delivering until he had sufficient. Witness delivered 42,000 red bricks and 4,000 white bricks. On the 21st October he sent the defendant an account for the balance owing, £68 8s. 9d., but the latter had neglected to pay it. The defendant did not dispute the amount, but said that he did not get all the bricks, and that his foreman had got some.

Judgment was given for the plaintiff, as prayed.

VAN BOOM V. VISSER.

Encroachment—Judgment in default of plea.

This was an action in which Francis Jacobus van Boom, who resides at Somerset West, sought an order compelling the defendant, who also resides at Somerset West, to remove an encroachment, and also damages in the sum of £100. Mr. M. de Villiers appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Williams was for the defendant, who had been barred from pleading.

Mr. De Villiers said he did not understand the position of the defendant in this case. The defendant had been barred from pleading, and the Court was afterwards moved for removal of the bar, but the application was refused.

Mr. Williams said that the position of the defendant was this, that he had filed a petition embodying certain facts that might be of assistance to the Court in arriving at a decision.

Hopley, J., said that he would like to know what the nature of the case was.

Mr. De Villiers stated that the plaintiff was the registered owner of certain land at Somerset West, and the defendant owned certain adjoining land. The defendant had encroached by a building and garden upon the plaintiff's property to the extent of 300 feet by 13½ at one end, and 18 feet at the other. The plaintiff had erected a fence upon his own boundary, but this had been wilfully and maliciously removed by the defendant. The plaintiff sought an order compelling the defendant to remove his building from the plaintiff's land in so far as the said building encroached thereon, and also payment of £100 damages.

Mr. Williams was about to read the defendant's petition to the Court, when Hopley, J., interposed, and said that he did not think counsel had any locus standi. However, he would read over the petition himself, and see whether there was anything in it that he could take any notice of. The learned judge then read the petition over, and remarked that he did not know that there was anything special in the document.

Mr. De Villiers called evidence in support of the plaintiff's case.

William Millar, clerk in the office of the Registrar of Deeds, produced copy of the transfer.

Hector Mackenzie Shaw, Government surveyor, said that the defendant's house, a single-story building, encroached on the plaintiff's land, but he did not know to what extent exactly.

Francis Jacobus van Boom also gave evidence, and said that he had been offered £900 for the ground, but he could not sell, because he did not know the boundaries at the time. He did not wish to sell now. He wanted to build a further house on his land, but could not. There was at present a good demand for houses at Somerset West.

Mr. De Villiers reminded the Court that the plaintiff asked for damages.

Hopley, J., said that the plaintiff had evidently trespassed on the ground of the Municipality. What did the plaintiff think would be a fair price to pay to the Municipality for the extent to which he had trespassed on the street?

Witness said that there were a lot of houses on the street at the Strand. The village was not right.

[Hopley, J.: Yes, that is what the defendant says.]

Other evidence was also called, the value of the ground encroached upon being estimated at £20 to £25.

Order granted compelling defendant to discontinue the encroachment, save that the defendant should have the alternative of buying for £25 portion of the strip of ground occupied by the building, and also allowing a 3-ft. passage. Damages were also awarded in the sum of £10, with costs of suit, including cost of survey and diagram and plaintiff's witnesses' expenses.

[Plaintiff's Attorney: D. Tennant; Defendant's Attorneys: Walker and Jacobsohn.]

LANGFORD V. MILES, BOYD AND CO.

Sale and purchase—Verbal contract.

This was an action brought by J. H. Langford, outfitter and hosier, Cape Town, against Miles, Boyd and Co., outfitters and jewellers, Cape Town, to recover £70, the purchase price of certain shop fittings and accessories, plaintiff tendering delivery thereof.

The plaintiff, in his declaration, stated that on the 9th May he sold to the defendants for £70, certain fittings and accessories in a shop that he had occupied in Grand Hotel Buildings. The plaintiff had always been ready to give delivery, but defendants refused to pay the sum of £70, or any portion thereof.

The defendants, in their plea, denied the alleged sale, and said that in May, 1904, they hired certain premises in the Grand Hotel Buildings under lease. Negotiations took place for the hire and purchase of certain fittings and accessories belonging to the plaintiff then in the shop, but, as no agreement could be arrived at as to price, no sale was effected. On the 14th May they gave the plaintiff notice that they had hired the shop, and called upon him to remove the fittings and accessories. Plaintiff wrongfully and unlawfully refused to remove the said fittings and accessories, which still remained in the shop at his risk. The defendants prayed that the claim should be dismissed, with costs. In re-convention, they claimed £100 damages.

The plaintiff, in his replication, admitted that notice was given to him to remove the fittings and accessories, and that they remained at the time of the sale and afterwards in the shop, but he said that the defendants had suffered no damage in consequence.

Mr. Uppington appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. W. P. Buchanan (with him Mr. Russell) was for the defendants.

The plaintiff, John Howard Langford, said that for about ten years he had carried on business as a hosier, outfitter, etc. in the Grand Hotel Buildings. He had the shop on lease, the lease expiring on the 15th May. He closed his shop on the 14th April, and he had decided not to renew the lease, on account of the increased rent demanded by the owners. Early in May, Mr. Miles, one of the defendants, called to see the shop, and said that he had taken it, and that he proposed for six or twelve months to carry it on as an outfitter's shop. Witness asked Mr. Miles whether he would require the fittings, but Mr. Miles said his partner, Mr. Boyd, dealt with those matters. Mr. Boyd afterwards called, and offered witness £50 for the fittings. This witness refused, and he agreed to spring £10 on the original price he had named to Mr. Miles (£80). Mr. Boyd did not agree to purchase. Witness sent a letter to the defendants on the 9th May, and on the Monday following saw Mr. Miles, and urged him to come to a decision. He later on saw Mr. Boyd in Adderley-street. Mr. Boyd stopped him, and said he was sorry he had not had time to answer witness's letter, and that he would take the fittings. On the 11th May he wrote to the defendants, pointing out that the sale was prompt cash, but he received no reply. He later on saw Mr. Boyd, who waved his hand and said, "I don't want your fittings now; they are no use to me." Witness told him that he could not go behind a verbal contract in that way.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He had expended altogether about £150 on the fittings. He thought that the fittings were quite worth £70. He had another offer for the fittings of £50.

Herbert Knight, of the Handy House, Grand Hotel Buildings, said he considered that the fittings for the shop as they stood were of the value of £70. In an auction room they would be so much board. He did not include the telephone and electric lighting in his estimate.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He would have been prepared to give £70 for the fittings, if he had taken the shop. He usually wrote off 5 per cent. for depreciation of fittings.

Mr. Uppington closed his case.

Benjamin H. Hart, of the Auction and Estates Company, said he valued the fittings and accessories, to be taken over as a going concern, at £32 15s. His estimate did not include the telephone.

By the Court: If the goods were removed, they would fetch less than £20.

Mr. James Boyd, partner in the firm of Miles, Boyd and Co., and one of the defendants, stated his firm carried on business in both Strand and Adderley streets. In the former place they carried on a clothier's and outfitting business, and in the latter a jewellery business. He took over a shop from Mr. Langford on a five years' lease. Witness saw the fittings in the shop, and Mr. Langford asked him to buy them. Witness refused to do so, but as an afterthought inquired what he wanted for them. Langford replied that he would take £80 for them. Witness said he would not give more than £30, and said he was not anxious to take them, as he already had some. The matter ended there. He never promised to take the fixtures. He wrote to Langford, and asked him to remove the fixtures, but he had not done so, and as a result, he had not been able to open his business there.

[Hopley, J.: If you wanted to get in there, why did you not tell him you would remove the fittings, and place them where he authorised?]

The witness replied that he thought it might prejudice his case. Continuing, he said he considered he had lost about £80 on the turnover through not being in possession. He reckoned on making 100 per cent. profit on the sale of English goods.

Cross-examined by Mr. Uppington, witness denied that he had offered £50 for the fixtures. He would have given £30 for them, and have left them in the shop. He had been approached by a Mr. Friedman with regard to sub-letting his premises. He did not know Friedman's Christian name. He had a shop in Hofmeyr Chambers. Witness did not send Friedman to Mr. Langford about the fittings. Friedman ran after him. Witness did not follow Friedman.

In further cross-examination witness said that if he thought he could make a profit on sub-letting a shop, he would do so. Witness told Friedman that he did not own the fittings, and to apply to Langford. Friedman thought £70 would be too much for fittings.

Mr. Myles, the second partner, in the firm, cross-examined, said he saw Mr. Langford while his partner was away. He told witness that he would sell the fittings, which had cost him £130. Witness said he would leave the matter until the return of his partner. Langford said he would take £80 for them.

Mr. David Meek stated he managed the Strand-street business for the defendants. Langford went in to the shop to see them on the Friday morning. Langford offered to sell the fixtures at £80, but Mr. Boyd said he did not want them. Mr. Friedman wanted to take the place, and interviewed witness at least twenty times about them in the course of a fortnight.

Mr. Robert Stephenson, of the firm of Bell and Stephenson, valued the fixtures, without the telephone, at £30.

By the Court: He did not value them as if he was taking the shop over. He would allow another £5 for that. If he was taking a shop fitted as that one was with new fixtures, it would probably cost £100 or more.

This closed the evidence for the defence, and counsel for the plaintiff argued that the things had been sold, and that the price agreed on was £70, which was the lowest price Langford had agreed to accept. Under those circumstances he contended they should get a decree for the full amount claimed.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan argued for the defence that it was necessary for the plaintiff in his claim to prove that there was a contract between himself and the defendants for the purchase of the fittings. The plaintiff wanted to maintain that there was a verbal agreement, but with business men, such as the plaintiff and defendant, one would think there would be a contract in writing.

Hopley, J., said the plaintiff sued the defendants on a verbal contract of sale made on the 10th May, the articles bought being certain shop fittings in a shop under the Grand Hotel buildings. The defendants denied that the sale took place. Now, in the Colonial law a verbal sale was as binding as a written one, and the Courts had the unpleasant duty to decide in a verbal contract of this sort which side was to be believed. In the present case the whole facts to be decided were, who was to be believed. It was not alleged that Mr. Boyd would not be able to bind his firm to an agreement. Therefore the whole point that was to be decided was, was plaintiff or Mr. Boyd correct in their recollection of the interview that took place only a short time ago, and ought to be fresh in the memory of both the plaintiff and defendants. And the Court had to consider which was the most likely to be swayed in his evidence, and which of them had acted most consistently throughout. His lordship then reviewed the evidence, and said that in the discussion that took place in Adderley-street the whole case hung. The point was, what happened there. Mr. Boyd said he put plaintiff off with a civil answer by saying he would see his partner. Mr. Langford said that Mr. Boyd said he had forgotten to answer the letter, but that it was all right, he would take the fixtures. If the Court believed Mr. Langford they would have to agree that the fixtures had been sold for £70. It seemed to him that there could not be any difficulty about the recollection of the sale, nor had it been suggested that Mr. Langford was hard of hearing, and mistook the words uttered by Mr. Boyd. In conclusion, he said he had arrived at the conclusion, after hearing the evidence, that the plaintiff had made out his case. He had convinced him that Mr. Boyd did say that he had taken the fixtures, and had taken them for £70. Therefore there must be judgment for the plaintiff for that amount, with costs.

Mr. Uppington inquired if the claim in reconvention was dismissed.

His Lordship replied in the affirmative.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

REVIEW.

REX V. KRIEK.

1904.
{ June 27th.

Master and servant—Hire of mules—Act 15 of 1856.

The accused was charged before a J.P. under Act 15 of 1856 with withholding wages for work done by complainant's mules. No section of the Act was specified. Accused was found guilty and fined. Conviction quashed as grossly irregular.

Mr. Justice Hopley said that this case had come before him on review. The accused was charged before a Special Justice of the Peace at Mossel Bay, in the division of Herbertsdale, with contravening the Master and Servants Act—not any specific sub-section, but generally—in that he did wrongfully and unlawfully withhold the wages for the work done by the mules of Berend Kriek. That was the whole of the charge. The evidence stated that the accused took some four mules, belonging to his brother, Berend Kriek, without leave, and there was some disagreement between the brothers as to what would be a fair price to pay for the service of the mules. The brothers did not come to an arrangement, and the accused did not pay what the other thought he should pay, whereupon the owner brought an action against him under the Master and Servants Act. He (the learned judge) did not know by what particular process this was done, but a Special Justice of the Peace found the accused guilty, and fined him 5s. for withholding the wages of these mules, and ordered him to pay 3s. to Berend Kriek, being 1s. 6d. per pair of mules. The conviction was altogether irregular and illegal, and must be quashed.

GENERAL MOTION.

PINN V. ELLIOTT.

Interdict—Rent.

The Court will not grant an interdict to restrain a tenant from removing his goods unless rent be actually due and unpaid.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved, as a matter of urgency, on behalf of the applicant, Alfred Elliott, for the discharge of an interdict restraining him from removing certain goods from a shop in Kloof-street, failing security for rent for the unexpired period of the lease, or in the alternative, for the cancellation of the lease. Mr. Van Zyl appeared for the respondent, Lazarus Pinn.

The affidavit of the applicant, Elliott, stated that he had leased certain premises, a pharmacy in Kloof-road, from the respondent. He had paid all rent due in terms of his lease, and had been interdicted from disposing of his goods upon an application made to this Court by the respondent. He was thus prevented from earning his livelihood, and it was impossible for him to make the money necessary to meet the rent as it fell due, and other obligations as they matured.

For the respondent, affidavits were put in stating that the applicant had been seen, on the 22nd June, removing goods from the shop, and on the following day the shop was closed.

Mr. Schreiner: We are not in mora, no rent is due or in arrear. The landlord's hypothec has no force unless rent is due.

[De Villiers, C.J.: An instalment was due on July 1st.]

No rent was due, and we are not bound to leave our goods as security for future rent, Campbell v. Muller, Smith and Co. (4 Juta, 335), Smith v. Dirks (3 Juta, 142). That case seems to decide that a tenant cannot remove any of his goods during the term of lease unless he gives security; but, see Greeff v. Pretorius (12 S.C.R., 104). This goes as far as any case. See also Board of Executors v. Stigling (Buch. 1868, p. 25). They now want to attach the very goods by means of which we hope to make profit and to pay rent. Unless there is a clause in the lease to the effect that goods to a certain value must be kept on the premises, a lessor cannot prevent the lessee from removing his goods, Lazarus v. Dose (3 Juta 43). No application of this kind has ever been made unless rent was due.

Mr. Van Zyl: We say that the lease runs till 1907, and we say that some rent (viz. £17 10s.), will be due on July 1st, and that we have a right to security for that.

[Hopley, J.: The rent is not due till July 1st, how do you know that they will not have a fresh stock in by that time?]

The hypothec extends to all bona infecta et illata; moreover, we had good reason to believe that the respondent meant to close up his shop and conclude his business. In fact, the shop had been closed before our affidavit was drawn.

Mr. Schreiner was not heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the Court had already intimated that where an ex parte application was made to a judge, the applicant should state every material fact, to enable the judge to arrive at a proper conclusion. In the present case, it appeared to him that the applicant (now respondent) failed to inform the judge before whom the case came as to a very material fact, and that was, that there was really no rent owing at the time when the application was made. The rent had been paid until the 30th June, and on the 1st July the rent to be paid would be rent for the month of July. Looking at the lease, he found that one of the terms was that, "in the event of the lessee failing to pay the rent when due, or after seven days' notice, the lessor shall have the right to cancel the lease." Therefore the lessor's security was absolute; there was no better security that the man could have, and if these facts had been brought to the notice of the judge, he was satisfied that he would never have made the order. He was of opinion, therefore, the rule must be discharged, with costs.

Hopley, J., said that he concurred. The matter was put before him when he granted the rule, as far as he remembered, as one of urgency, as he believed. When he granted the order, he must say he thought there was rent due at the time. He quite agreed in the present circumstances that the applicant (Pinn) had not shown any reason why these goods should be restrained from being removed, and he thought if he (Pinn) had told him at the time, he should not have granted the rule.

REX V. MATYOLWENI AND { 1904.
OTHERS. { June 27th.

Evidence — Accomplice — Ordinance 72 of 1830, section 12.

Two prisoners having been convicted of the theft of an ox, gave evidence that the appellants, their fellow prisoners, had been concerned with them in the theft, and the appellants were convicted.

Held, that as there was clear proof that the ox had been stolen, the evidence of the accomplices was sufficient to support the conviction of the appellants.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Mount Pleasant. The matter arose out of a charge of theft of an ox, which had been preferred against six natives, who, for the purposes of the case, were numbered 1 to 6 inclusive. Numbers 1 and 5 pleaded guilty, and the others pleaded not guilty, but the whole party, except No. 6, were convicted. The present appeal was brought by accused 2, 3, and 4, for whom Mr. Russell appeared; Mr. Howel Jones represented the Crown.

The Magistrate found prisoners No. 2, 3, and 4 guilty, and sentenced each of them to two years, with hard labour, and ordered Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 to pay compensation. He was fully convinced that they stole the ox in question.

Mr. Russell (for appellants): The chief evidence against the appellants is that of accomplices. Beyond this there is only the evidence that prisoner No. 2 said that Nos. 1, 3, and 5 came to his kraal, but said that they had come about grain. Then again a considerable amount of hearsay evidence was introduced, e.g., that of the constable, Dantzie's statement to him was taken down, and does not at all agree with that of Nos. 1 and 5; but when they got into Court they had a different story to tell.

[Hopley, J.: All the evidence says that No. 2 was present.]

Yes, but there again we have the unsupported evidence of accomplices.

[Hopley, J.: What authority have you for saying that a man cannot be convicted on the evidence of accomplices?]

There certainly seems to be some doubt as to the exact amount of corroboration required. See Ord. 72 of 1830, sec. 12, but with that read sec. 48. The only case I can find in which this has been held is Reg. v. Adams (4 C.T.R. 122.)

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the evidence of an accomplice must be supported by other evidence which would in itself be sufficient to convict, why admit the evidence of an accomplice at all?]

A man may be convicted on the evidence of an accomplice, but it is quite open to the defence to call the character of the accomplice in question. The English practice goes further than ours. English law, it is true, will uphold a conviction on the evidence of an accomplice, but judges invariably caution juries not to convict on such evidence, and I submit that sec. 48 of Ord. 72 of 1830 binds our Courts to follow the English practice in this respect.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown) was not called upon.

De Villiers, C.J.: If the witnesses for the prosecution are to be believed there can be no reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the three prisoners who are known as Nos. 2, 3, and 4. There was clear proof that the crime of theft of the ox had been committed. After two of the prisoners had been convicted they gave their evidence, and, according to the evidence of both, No. 2 was a party to the original plan to kill the ox. The day after the ox had been killed Nos. 3 and 4 came on horseback, and carried it away, and 3 and 4 were the sons of 2. The accomplices gave further evidence of the appellants' guilt, but it is contended that under the proviso to the 12th section of Ord. 72 of 1830 there must be clear proof by evidence other than that of the accomplices that the appellants committed the theft. Such a construction of the proviso would be inconsistent with the rest of the section, which clearly permits of a conviction on the single evidence of accomplices. The proviso merely requires independent proof that the crime or offence charged was committed by some one. Where, as in Reg. v. De Kock (1 Rosc 441), there is no clear and independent proof that a crime or offence was committed at all, the evidence of the accomplices is not sufficient. In the present case, however, there was clear evidence that the ox had been stolen, and the two accomplices had actually been convicted of the crime before they gave their evidence. Even so, it was the duty of the Magistrate to scrutinize their evidence very closely before acting upon it, and this he certainly seems to have done. The 48th section, in my opinion, does not affect the point at all, as there is sufficient evidence here to convict. It is true some hearsay evidence was admitted, but it is not in conflict with the evidence given by the accomplices, and without that hearsay evidence there is sufficient evidence to justify the Magistrate in convicting the prisoners. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

Hopley, J., concurred.

MOHAMED V. ISHMAIL.

Master and servant — Wages — Magistrate's jurisdiction.

This was an appeal from a decision of the A.R.M. of Wellington. The appellant was sued for £30, which the respondent set out was due to him for wages, the appellant undertaking to pay it for another man named Hoesen, who had gone insolvent.

From the record in the Court below it appeared that the defendant's attorney excepted to the summons on the ground that the amount was beyond the Magistrate's jurisdiction. The exception was reserved until the evidence was heard. The evidence set out that the defendant took over the business of the plaintiff's master, who was indebted to the plaintiff in £30 for wages, and by doing so it was contended that the defendant was liable. The Magistrate overruled the exception on the grounds that the amount sued for was proved to be for wages. There was no exception that the summons was bad in law or irregular. In giving judgment for the plaintiff, he based his reasoning on facts. The witnesses for the plaintiff had all appearances of being reliable, and the Court believed the best evidence. He held that the Court had jurisdiction, as the amount was for wages due.

Mr. McGregor was for the appellant, and Mr. Uppington was for the respondent.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Under what act has the Magistrate jurisdiction over £20?]

Mr. McGregor: I submit no Act, my lord.

In the course of three separate trials respecting the ownership of certain cattle, M. had made contradictory statements on oath. His statements at the first and third trials agreed, but were contradicted by his statement at the second trial. He was thereupon tried and convicted in the R.M. Court for perjury committed at the second trial. No evidence was led to show that the statement he then made was false.

Held on appeal, that the perjury had not been proved and the conviction must be quashed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Willowdale.

The appellant had been convicted on a charge of perjury. The conviction took place on the 17th May, and the appellant was sentenced to pay a fine of £15, or, in the alternative, to three months' imprisonment, with hard labour.

Mr. Alexander (for the appellant) stated that the criminal charge arose out of curious set of circumstances. In the first instance, the accused's sister, Emily, sued James Mangoba, another brother for certain cattle, which she claimed belonged to her. The accused then gave evidence on behalf of James, and swore the cattle belonged to the defendant, and judgment was given for absolution from the instance. Then James sued the present appellant for certain of these cattle, and on this second trial judgment was given for the plaintiff. On that occasion the accused said that what he had said on the previous occasion was not the truth, and that the cattle really belonged to his sister Emily, and not to James. Thereupon, Emily brought another action against James, and summoned Koli to give evidence. He then said that the evidence he gave on the first occasion was correct, and that his statement at the second trial was false. Criminal proceedings were then instituted for perjury, alleged to have been committed on the second occasion. The appeal was brought on the grounds that the accused was charged with having committed perjury in saying, first, that the cattle belonged to his sister, and, secondly, that the plaintiff, James, had no claim to the said cattle, but that no evidence was led at the trial to show that the cattle did not belong to the sister or that James had a claim. Counsel read the record of evidence, which he contended really showed that if there were perjury at all it was committed on the first and third occasions. There was no evidence corroborating the accused's contradiction. It was necessary, he urged, that the Crown should prove that the cattle did not belong to Emily, and that James had a claim to the cattle, instead of which the evidence was all directed to show that there had been a contradiction. Such evidence as there was went to show that the occasion on which perjury was alleged to have been committed was really the occasion on which the accused spoke the truth.

Mr. Jones (for the Crown), contended that the accused's statement on the third occasion was a sufficient corroboration to satisfy the requirement of the law that there should be something more than two opposing statements by an accused person.

Buchanan, J.: The appellant was charged before the Magistrate in this case with the crime of perjury in having said that certain cattle which was the subject matter of a suit between them, belonged to his sister, Emily Mangoba. It appears that before the prisoner made this statement, he stated, when his sister sued her brother James for the cattle, that the cattle did not belong to his sister, and that on a subsequent occasion also he again made this statement. On the first occasion he told one story which he corroborated on the third occasion; on the second occasion he contradicted himself, and it is on the statement made on the second occasion that the crime of perjury has been assigned against him. There are certain requirements which have to be complied with before a person can be convicted on a charge of perjury. The old idea was that there must be at least two oaths against one—that is, two witnesses against one—before a charge of perjury can lie, but the law has lately laid down that it is not quite correct to say that two witnesses are necessary, but that there must be something to corroborate one witness in saying that the evidence of another was false, and it has also been clearly laid down that where a prisoner gives two different statements on oath, it is not sufficient to prove the two statements, but that there must be some corroboration that the statement upon which perjury is laid is false. In this case there is no doubt that the prisoner is guilty of perjury, but the question is upon which occasion did he commit perjury? As far as the evidence goes it seems to show that the prisoner committed perjury on the first and third occasions, and that on the occasion when he is alleged to have committed perjury he really spoke the truth. There is a total absence of corroboration to show that the prisoner committed perjury on the second occasion, but it has been very ingeniously argued by counsel for the Crown that the necessary corroboration is supplied by the fact that the prisoner twice on oath told the same story in contradiction to the statement which is said to have been perjured. Now I think all the authorities show that that is not sufficient. The law requires some outside evidence beyond that of the prisoner to show that he has been speaking a falsehood. I regret in this case that upon a technical ground only we must quash this conviction, because it is clear that perjury was committed, only, unfortunately, as far as the evidence goes, it seems to show that the statement upon which perjury is assigned is the true statement, and that it was upon the other occasions that he commit perjury. For these reasons the appeal must be allowed and the conviction quashed.

Hopley, J., concurred, and said it would only have wanted very slight corroboration indeed to justify the Magistrate in the finding he came to. It might be that this was the proper occasion, but the Crown had to prove it, and they produced no evidence whatever beyond the fact that the accused at two trials made statements contradictory to the one which was alleged to be perjured. The Crown had proved that perjury was committed, but had not proved that it was upon this particular occasion that it was committed.

CRESSY V. SHAW.

Messenger of Court—Attachment of private and of partnership property.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Richmond, in an action in which the appellant sued Shaw, the Messenger of the Court, for damages, and the amount of a judgment obtained against one Niehoven, plaintiff alleging that the defendant had wrongfully released certain property alleged to belong to Niehoven, which was attached in execution of the judgment.

Mr. Graham, K.C., appeared for the appellant; Mr. Close for the respondent.

From the record in the Court below, it appeared that the writ of attachment against Niehoven's property was placed in the defendant's hands for execution on the 8th April, and that a horse was attached on the 12th. On the 15th, Niehoven surrendered the partnership estate of himself and his brother, and the horse was brought up in the schedules, which had been sworn to in March, as being the property of the partnership, and on this being brought to the notice of the defendant he released the horse. Plaintiff thereupon sued him in the Magistrate's Court, and the Magistrate found that plaintiff had not suffered any damage by reason of the defendant's action, which he held to be in good faith.

After hearing Mr. Graham in argument, the Court dismissed the appeal, with costs.

Buchanan, J.: One Alie Niehoven and his brother carried on farming operations together in partnership. Alie Niehoven bought from the appellant Cressy certain goods for the purposes of these farming operations. Cressy said he did not know the goods were being bought for the partnership, but that he sold them to Alie only. On the 24th March the two brothers drew up their schedules in surrender of their partnership estate. In these schedules is brought up, as an asset of the partnership, a certain horse. This horse was used in the partnership business and the finding of the Magistrate was that it belonged to the partnership estate. After the schedules were drawn up and sworn to by the debtors, the appellant took out a summons against Alie Niehoven, obtained judgment, and entrusted the defendant Shaw, the Messenger of the Magistrate's Court, with a writ of execution. He informed Shaw that there was a certain horse running at a certain farm about five miles from Richmond, which belonged to Alie Niehoven, and Shaw went out and attached this horse. Appellant clearly knew at this time that the horse was included in the schedules. The messenger attached the horse on the 12th April; on the 14th April, the schedules drawn up on the 24th March were accepted, and the estate declared insolvent. The messenger, as a Master's officer, not as Messenger of the Court, was instructed to attach all property belonging to the estate, which figured in the schedules, and in execution of that duty, he attached this horse as one of the assets of the partnership estate. The appellant complains that the messenger neglected his duty in not selling this horse in execution of his judgment, but I think the Magistrate has found quite correctly that it was not in the power of the Messenger of the Court in executing this writ to sell a horse which belonged to the partnership, and which had been attached by an officer of the Master. I do not think there was any neglect of duty on the part of the messenger, and it is neglect of duty which is the foundation of the claim against the defendant. The Magistrate, having all the facts before him, found that there was no neglect on the part of the messenger. We have had the records and the Magistrate's reasons read, and I must say that in this case I think the Magistrate took a very correct view of the true legal position in deciding in favour of the messenger. I can see no ground for interfering with the decision of the Magistrate, and for saying that the messenger has in any way neglected his duty in this case. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

Hopley, J., concurred.

MOTION.

ALEXANDER V. MUIR.

Mr. Upington moved on behalf of the defendant for the appointment of a commissioner to take the evidence of defendant on commission at Ceres. It was stated on affidavit that the defendant was suffering from chronic rheumatism, and would not be able to come to Cape Town.

The application was granted, the Resident Magistrate of Ceres being appointed to act as commissioner. Costs to be costs in the cause.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

LABE AND MEYEROWITZ V. { 1904.
June 28th.
PATERSON AND DE HETON. { 29th.
July 8th.

Insolvency—Assignment—Undue preference.

This was an action brought by Labe and Meyerowitz, contractors and builders, Cape Town, against Paterson and De Heton, brokers, Cape Town, for an order requiring the defendants to sign a certain deed of assignment executed by the plaintiff firm for the benefit of their creditors, and to account for and hand over to the nominated assignees all rents received by them in the estate of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs' declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiffs are a firm of contractors and builders, doing business in Cape Town.

2. The defendants are a firm of brokers, also doing business in Cape Town.

3. In or about the month of November last plaintiffs found that their estate was virtually insolvent, their liabilities being mortgage debts to the amount of £10,182 5s. 9d., besides interest thereon to the amount of about £600, and concurrent debts to the amount of £2,997 2s. 9d., and their assets being of the value of £11,460, and that the immediate sequestration of their estate should have to ensue unless some arrangement was arrived at with their creditors.

4. The plaintiffs had and have a substantial interest therein that such arrangement should be arrived at, and also therein that one creditor should not be preferred to another in a manner herein-after mentioned.

5. On the 27th November, 1903, a meeting of creditors of the plaintiffs was held in Cape Town, to take into consideration, together with the plaintiffs, the assignment of the said estate.

6. At that time the plaintiffs were indebted to the defendants in the amount of £125 11s. 6d., being the unpaid balance of a promissory note for £207 13s. 6d., due 15th December, 1903, and given by the plaintiffs to the defendants in consideration of money advanced to them by the latter. The amount of the note had been reduced to this extent through an arrangement made between the parties thereto that the defendants should collect the rents of certain houses belonging to the plaintiffs as such rents fell due and appropriate the same against the said advance.

7. It was to the knowledge of the defendants represented at the said meeting that defendants were collecting the rents beforementioned and appropriating the same against the said advance, and that they were being unduly preferred above other creditors; and as a matter of fact under the law relating to insolvency it was disadvantageous for creditors other than the defendants to agree to an assignment in case the defendants continued so to act.

8. In consideration of these circumstances it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the said creditors at the said meeting that provided the defendants agreed to such assignment the plaintiffs should make an assignment of their estate for the benefit of their creditors, and it was further agreed that the assignees should be the members of the firm of Chiappini Brothers, consisting of Alexander John Chiappini, Charles du Plessis Chiappini, and Francis William Cubitt Chiappini, the said firm being also a creditor of the said estate, and the said members being willing to be appointed as and to perform the duties of such assignees.

It was moreover resolved that failing the assent of defendants to such assignment the said estate should be sequestrated as insolvent.

9. The defendants thereupon agreed to this assignment, provided that they should be allowed to be employed for reward by the nominated assignees in the letting of the said houses and the collection of rents thereon on behalf of the creditors, pending the realisation of the properties, and that the amounts collected should be handed over to the nominated assignees, and the plaintiffs and the said nominated assignees, with the assent of the said creditors, agreed to the defendants being so employed by the said nominated assignees.

10. A second meeting of creditors being such creditors as had not attended at the first meeting beforementioned was thereafter held in order that the position of the estate might be explained to them, and thereafter all creditors, not including the defendants, signed a deed of assignment dated the 31st day of December, 1903, in due form.

11. The said deed of assignment (as will on reference thereto more fully appear) was substantially to the effect that the plaintiffs, of the first part, ceded and assigned to the before mentioned member of the firm Chiappini Brothers of the second part, with the consent of their creditors, of the third part all their assets and all books, accounts, and writings touching the same upon trust, to realise, and after deduction of expenses and preferent debts, to divide the balance ratably amongst concurrent creditors, with power to demand and recover by action all debts, and give acquittance for the same, and to pass transfer, and that the plaintiffs should be thereby released from their debts.

12. In consequence of the agreement of the defendants to the assignment, all the other parties concerned forbore from obtaining the sequestration of the said estate.

13. The deed of assignment was thereafter handed over for signature to the defendants, who retained the same in their possession until the 15th day of January last, when they refused, as they still refuse, to sign the same without assigning any reason for such refusal.

14. The defendants had meanwhile, since the date of the first-mentioned meeting of creditors, in accordance with the agreement in paragraph 9 mentioned, and on the understanding that they should sign the deed of assignment, been allowed by the other parties to such agreement to continue, and they continued, collecting the rents before-mentioned.

15. At the time of their refusal to sign the said deed of assignment, they moreover refused, as they still refuse, to hand over for the benefit of the plaintiffs' creditors the rents received by them, or any part thereof, to the abovementioned nominated assignees; and on the 22nd day of January following they rendered an account to the plaintiffs, in which the liability of the plaintiffs to them purports to have been at the time of such refusal, reduced to the sum of £26 2s. 9d., through the appropriation by them of rents received by them as aforesaid.

16. The plaintiffs and the nominated assignees have at all times been, and are still, willing, in accordance with their agreement with the said defendants, that the defendants should be employed by the nominated assignees for reward to let the said houses as occasion may require, and to collect the rents falling due thereon, on behalf of creditors, pending realisation.

17. The plaintiffs, by virtue of the premises, are entitled to claim that the defendants be forthwith ordered to sign the said deed of assignment, and in default thereof, by way of alternative relief, that the said deed of assignment shall have the same force and effect as if the same had been duly signed by them from the time that the same was handed over to them for signature, and that all rents received by them since the 27th day of November, 1903, and still to be received by them, shall be refunded to the plaintiffs, or the nominated assignees, for the benefit of all creditors, the defendants to receive due reward by way of usual commission thereon, in accordance with the said agreement.

18. The plaintiffs pray: (1) That the defendants be forthwith ordered to sign the said deed of assignment; (2) that the defendants be forthwith ordered to account for and hand over to the said nominated assignees all such rents received by them as aforesaid, for the benefit of the plaintiffs' creditors; (3) such alternative relief as to this Hon. Court may seem meet; and (4) costs of this suit.

The defendants' plea was as follows:

1. The allegations in paragraphs 1, 2, 5, and 6 of the declaration are admitted subject as to paragraph 6 to the next succeeding paragraph hereof.

2. Defendants have no knowledge of and do not admit the allegations in paragraphs 3 and 4.

3. (a) The allegation in paragraph 7 (the relevancy or materiality of which herein defendants do not admit) is denied.

3 (b). Defendants were not present at or bound by proceedings at the said meetings.

3 (c). The rents referred to in paragraphs 5 and 7 were duly and lawfully collected by the defendants under and in terms of an irrevocable power of attorney (hereunto annexed marked "A" to the terms whereof defendants respectfully crave leave to refer) granted by plaintiffs to defendants in February, 1903, in consideration of certain advances to be made, and which in fact were duly made by defendants to plaintiffs, the said power empowering the defendants to collect the rents accruing from the properties mentioned therein, being the rents referred to in the said paragraphs 6 and 7, and to apply the proceeds of the same in payment of plaintiffs' said indebtedness. The said power of attorney has never been withdrawn.

4. Paragraphs 8, 9, and 17 are denied.

5. The defendants at no time agreed to become parties to the assignment mentioned in paragraphs 8 and 9. Defendants admit that it was understood that if they at any time should for reasons thereunto moving agree to such assignment they should be employed by the assignees for reward in and about the letting of the said houses and the collecting of the said rents.

6. Paragraph 10 is admitted, save that defendants deny that all the creditors other than themselves signed the said deed of assignment.

7. As to paragraph 11, defendants respectfully refer this Honourable Court to the said deed for the meaning and effect of such portions thereof, if any, as may be material herein.

8. Paragraph 12 is denied. Defendants never agreed to such assignment nor were they parties to any agreement whereby the action of plaintiffs' creditors was affected.

9. As to paragraph 13, defendants admit that the said deed was handed to them on or about the 10th January, 1904, and returned by them on or about the 15th January with an intimation of their refusal to sign the same, and that they still refuse to sign the same.

10. Paragraph 14 is denied. Defendants duly and lawfully continued to collect the said rents by virtue of the aforesaid power hereto annexed and not otherwise.

11. Paragraph 15 is admitted save that defendants refer to the premises for the circumstances and the power under which and purpose for which they received the said rents and applied the proceeds, and say that the said account as rendered by them was correct.

12. Defendants have no knowledge of the allegations in paragraph 16 save that they again as aforesaid deny the said agreement.

Wherefore the defendants pray that the plaintiffs' claim may be dismissed with costs.

The plaintiffs' replication was general. Mr. M. de Villiers (with him Mr. De Waal) for plaintiffs; Mr. McGregor for defendants.

Alexander John Chiappini, of the firm of Chiappini Bros., Cape Town, said that he remembered a meeting of the plaintiffs' creditors in November last, at which it was represented that the plaintiffs were hopelessly insolvent. The plaintiffs submitted a list of their liabilities, which they could not meet, and said that they had several pressing creditors. Witness's firm were creditors against the estate, and they also represented certain bondholders. About a month later he knew that certain interest was becoming due, and he informed the plaintiffs that unless certain rents were paid to them, they would make the plaintiffs insolvent. At the meeting referred to it was put before the plaintiffs that unless they were prepared to assign their estate, it would have to be sequestrated, and that it would be necessary, in case of assignment, to have the consent of Paterson and De Heton. Paterson and De Heton were communicated with at the meeting, and they asked whether, in the event of an assignment, they would be allowed to continue to collect the rents for account of the assigned estate, and to charge their commission as before, and also whether they would be entitled to brokerage if they got a purchaser for the property. Witness and the other creditors at the meeting agreed to these terms. Mr. Paterson gave a direct reply that he agreed to the assignment, and witness then decided to draw up a deed of assignment.

All the creditors present at the meeting felt that Paterson and De Heton were getting undue preference from that date. They said definitely that in case the defendants did not agree to the assignment, they would petition the Court next day for compulsory sequestration. Witness, in December, sent the deed of assignment to the defendants for their signature, but the deed was returned to him unsigned. It was more beneficial to the creditors that the estate should be assigned, rather than sequestrated. The estate consisted largely of landed property, and in case of a forced sale, the proceeds were not likely to be so good.

By the Court: The whole of the amount due to the defendants was about £200. The estate was valued at from £10,000 to £12,000.

Cross-examined: Nothing was said in the assignment as to all the creditors signing. Paterson and De Heton did not say that witness might send the deed to them if the other creditors all signed. The chief topic at the meeting was as to whether the estate should be assigned or sequestrated. The defendants distinctly agreed to become parties to the assignment. In January he sent a note to the defendants asking them to pay out of the rents £54 interest due to one of the bondholders. The deed was not signed by one creditor, or perhaps two. One of the creditors, Mr. Bensill, obtained judgment in the Court against the plaintiffs. Mr. Jackson, a creditor for £130, did not sign the deed. He was aware that the defendants had sued the plaintiffs on the 9th February of this year in the Magistrate's Court. The case was allowed to go by default. Witness had before that time taken proceedings in the present case; he had placed the matter in the hands of his attorneys immediately after the second meeting of the creditors. He did not see any need to defend the action brought by the defendants. He sent all the creditors a notice to attend the second meeting on the 19th January. At that meeting they decided to give the defendants three days to render an account of the rents collected. He was told by the plaintiffs that a power of attorney had been in existence whereby the defendants were collecting the rents.

Re-examined by Mr. De Villiers: The bond debtors he represented were aware of the assignment. At the meeting no conditions were made by the defendants that all the creditors had to sign.

Petrus Jacobus Bosman said that he acted as chairman at the meeting of creditors. He told those present that he looked upon the position as hopelessly insolvent. Mr. Chiappini thought the best thing to do was to sequester the estate. Witness gave it as his opinion that, unless the defendants fell in with the other creditors, the best thing to do was to sequester. Mr. De Heton did not show any disposition to join in with the idea, but after a consultation with his partner, the meeting was informed that the defendants were quite willing to fall in with the other creditors in the assignment, on condition that they were allowed to collect the rents, take their commission, and hand over the surplus to Mr. Chiappini every month.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: The conversation was not of a powerful and convincing kind. It was merely pointed out to them, unless they agreed to the assignment, the estate would have to be sequestered. It was a standing rule that small creditors under £10 were paid out in full.

Joshua Kidney said that he was present at the meeting of creditors in November. A certain assignment was proposed, and ultimately the defendants agreed to the assignment.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: There was only the one point at issue, and that was the cessation of the rents. The meeting lasted from 3 to 5 o'clock, but Mr. De Heton did not say much. The defendants never said that they would join in the assignment if all the other creditors did. He was not present at the second meeting.

Joseph Black, another creditor of the plaintiffs, stated that he was present at the meeting, and corroborated the other witnesses as to what took place.

Abraham Meyerowitz, partner in the plaintiff firm, stated that towards the end of 1903 he found that he could not pay his debts, and he went to Mr. Chiappini, and explained the state of affairs. At the meeting in November he understood that it was agreed that the estate should be assigned.

Mr. Chiappini (recalled) said that the second meeting referred to was really not a second meeting, it was merely to settle small accounts with foreign workmen.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: He did not remember either of the defendants asking him if he was a creditor in the estate before he was appointed assignee.

Mr. De Villiers closed his case.

James Peterson, one of the partners in the defendant firm, stated that they received power of attorney from the plaintiffs in February, 1903, in order to collect their debts. In November the plaintiffs owed them £125. At the meeting the affairs of the plaintiff were being discussed. Mr. Chiappini asked him if he would sign the deed of assignment, and he replied that his firm might sign if all the creditors signed. It was agreed by Mr. Chiappini that if they signed the deed of assignment they might continue to take their commission on the rents. That was suggested to witness. He could not say if all the creditors that day agreed to sign. On several occasions Labe came to his office to get his signature. Each time Labe came he said in reply to questions that every creditor had not signed, and on the last occasion when he came Labe said that everybody wanted to be the last, and witness then said, "Well, there's no reason why we shouldn't be the last." He did not know until after the meeting that Mr. Chiappini was a creditor; in fact, previous to that he had told him that he was not.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: He did not know that the creditors were determined on sequestration or assignment. He was laid up between the 4th and 15th January, otherwise he would have replied to Mr. Chiappini's letter. During that period he collected some £115 in rent. He could not account for the omission in his pleadings of his assertion that he made it a condition that his firm would only sign if the other creditors did. He replied to Mr. Chiappini's letter of the 16th January, but in his reply there was no mention as to why they did not keep their promise, and sign the deed. He was under the impression that a power of attorney was irrevocable, and that was the reason he went on collecting the rents.

Reginald Charles de Heton stated that he attended the meeting on the 27th November, and afterwards went and fetched his partner.

By the Court: Witness had not in any way committed himself up to the time he went to fetch his partner. Afterwards the conversation was principally between his partner and Mr. Chiappini. He understood the meeting wanted his firm to sign a deed of assignment. Witness thought the reason that his firm was particularly wanted to sign was because they collected the rents.

In reply to counsel for the defence, the witness further stated that when Mr. Chiappini asked Mr. Paterson to sign, the latter said they might sign, if all the other creditors signed. Witness believed it was mentioned that they were getting 5 per cent. commission on the rents. It was suggested that they should continue to collect the rents and retain the commission. Witness and Mr. Paterson did not agree to become parties to the agreement, but said that if all the creditors signed, they might do so also. He recollected a clerk taking the deed to them, and asking them to attend to it. Witness said that his partner was away, and that he was busy, and that when his partner returned, the matter would be attended to. Mr. Chiappini ultimately took the deed away.

Cross-examined: Witness did not think it was said that, unless witness and his partner signed, the estate would be sequestered. The matter of the witness's firm collecting the rents and appropriating them was discussed, He did not understand that the creditors were dissatisfied.

This closed the evidence for the defence.

Counsel were then heard in argument.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 8th).

Hopley, J.: On the 27th November, 1903, the plaintiffs, who carried on business as contractors and builders in Cape Town, called a meeting of their creditors, and laid before them a statement showing that they were virtually insolvent. Their assets, which they valued at £11,460, consisted almost entirely of immovable property, which was mortgaged for £10,182, and there was a sum of about £600 due on the bonds as interest. The rest of their liabilities amounted to nearly £3,000 to creditors who held no security of any kind, with the exception of the defendants, who held an irrevocable power of attorney from the plaintiffs to collect the rents accruing from some of their immovable properties, and to apply the same in reduction of the liability to them until the whole amount had been paid. This power had been given on the 11th February, 1903, when the debt to the defendants secured by promissory notes was considerably larger, but by the 27th November it had been in this way reduced to £125. The meeting was called by the plaintiffs with a view to getting their creditors to agree to an assignment of their estate to the firm of Chiappini Bros. for the benefit of their creditors, and at that meeting the majority in value of the concurrent creditors were present, including Mr. Alexander Chiappini, of the said firm, who were unsecured creditors for over £500. Besides this interest, he also represented a Mr. Marais, who was a large bondholder in this estate. The interests of the mortgagees were, however, considered to be sufficiently safeguarded, and it was understood that no objections would be raised by any of them; so that the proceedings mainly concerned the unsecured creditors, and were carried on with a view to a fair adjustment of their claims.

It is clear that the unsecured creditors were dissatisfied that the defendants should, by virtue of the exercise of their irrevocable power, obtain a preference over the other concurrent creditors, and I am satisfied that it was the intention of the more influential and important among them—notably of Mr. Chiappini and Mr. Bosman—to force on a compulsory sequestration of the estate if the defendants did not consent to the assignment and abate their claim to receive payment in full, or, at all events, if it is going too far to say that such was their decided intention, I am quite satisfied that they threatened to take that course for the purpose of forcing the defendants to join the general body of creditors in the pro rata distribution that would take place under the assignment, and it may well be that they would have, as they say, taken the extreme step in case the defendants had proved obstinate. At the opening of the meeting, Mr. De Heton alone represented his firm, but when the position was explained to him, as I am sure it was—viz., that the choice lay between compulsory sequestration (which would put an end to the effect of the power held by them) and assignment, and that assignment would not be adopted unless his firm joined the other creditors, and assented thereto—he went out and brought his partner, Mr. Paterson, to the meeting. On his return, the position was made clear, and whatever it was that the defendants then undertook, I am satisfied that they quite understood what they were doing—for the attempt to persuade the Court that business men of the capacity of the defendants did not understand the nature or scope of an assignment, seems to me to be utterly futile. As to what was agreed to, there is a conflict of evidence. The defendants say that when the matter was put to them by Mr. Chiappini and Mr. Bosman, they said that they might agree to an assignment if all the other creditors did so. The two gentlemen in question, however, and Mr. Kidney and Mr. Black all swear that the defendants unequivocally agreed to the assignment, and to sign the deed of assignment when drawn up, only stipulating that they should be allowed to go on collecting the rents on commission, and that they should be paid a commission as brokers if they should introduce purchasers to the assignees for any of the properties, and they add that this was conceded to them. I have no doubt that the latter version is the correct one.

The really important matter under consideration at the meeting was the preference obtained under their power of attorney by the defendants, and it is not conceivable that business men like Messrs. Chiappini and Bosman, and the other creditors present, would have been satisfied with the vague and unsatisfactory undertaking which the defendants contend was the limit of the concession made by them. The meeting ended, and another was called early in December, to lay the matter before some other creditors who had not attended the first meeting. At the second meeting, the defendants were not present, but apparently no opposition was raised to the assignment, and since then Chiappini Bros. have acted as, and have been looked upon by the main body of the creditors as, the assignees of the estate; and all the creditors, with a few exceptions to be hereafter mentioned, have since then foreborne from pressing their rights against the plaintiffs. The defendants were allowed, as had been agreed upon, to go on collecting the rents, and a deed of assignment, tripartite in form, between the assignors, the assignees, and the consenting creditors, was drawn out in terms of the agreement at the creditors' meetings, which was sent round to the creditors for their signatures. The defendants, however, upon various pretexts, did not sign the deed; but apparently went on appropriating the moneys they received in reduction of the debt due to them until only about £26 of the amount was still outstanding in their books. When called upon by the assignees to account for the moneys so received by them, and to sign the deed as promised, they eventually, towards the end of January, took up the position that as all the creditors had not signed the deed they were not bound by it, and that they were consequently entitled to appropriate the moneys, as they had done, by virtue of their unrevoked power of attorney.

With regard to other creditors who had not signed the deed, it appears that in January Mr. Jackson summoned the present plaintiffs for the sum of £130, in the Magistrate's Court, on a promissory note—but this claim was withdrawn, and one Penkin, who became or was the real holder of this note, has signed the deed of assignment as a creditor for that amount. Another creditor, one Wentzel, sued them in the Magistrate's Court on the 19th January for £20, and recovered judgment for that amount, in execution whereof he attached a few movables of small value, and it was not considered worth while to raise any defence to his claim as in the result it was unimportant. Later on, on the 9th February, when it was obvious that proceedings were about to be instituted against the defendants in the present suit, they sued the plaintiffs in the Magistrate's Court, for £26 odd, the balance, as they alleged, still due to them by the present plaintiffs on the promissory note which they had been reducing in the manner above described. Neither the present plaintiffs nor the assignees took any notice of these proceedings, as there was no movable property upon which execution could be levied, and the defendants got judgment for the amount so claimed by them. These three are the only attempts that have been made to interfere with the working of the assignment, and apparently all the other creditors are content with the arrangement thereunder.

It was argued for the defendants that even if they had made a promise to sign the deed or to agree to the assignment, such arrangement was merely inchoate, and that they were entitled to withdraw therefrom. I cannot take this view. Their undertaking was a matter which the other creditors took seriously, and whereon they shaped their own course of conduct. Their position was affected, their legal remedies were allowed to rest in abeyance, and they had every reason to believe that the defendants were loyally carrying out what they had promised, and were collecting the rents for the joint benefit of them all. Several authorities were quoted, and especially the cases of J. O. Smith and Co. v. Standard Bank (Buch., 1868, 253), Juta, Thooft and Co. v. Glynn (1 Roscoe, 102), Hossack v. Lippert (3 Juta, 272), and Radcliffe v. Stanford (4 Juta, 1), and it seems to me that, on the principles laid down in these and other cases on the same lines, the defendants should be held bound by their undertaking. The Court will, therefore, order them to account for all moneys received by them on behalf of the plaintiffs, after the 27th of November, 1903, and to hand over such moneys, less the amounts to which they are entitled, as commission for collecting the same, to the assignees, Messrs. Chiappini Brothers, for the benefit of the creditors of the plaintiffs. The defendants must pay the costs of this action.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

LUCKIE V. OMAN. } 1904.
} June 28th.

Mr. Buchanan applied on behalf of the plaintiff for a commission to take evidence in this case.

Mr. M. de Villiers who appeared for the defence, opposed the motion.

Mr. Buchanan said the action was one in which plaintiff claimed £60 from defendant for a theodolite broken by a cow, the property of defendant. Mr. Robert G. Sullivan, who was an important witness in the case, was leaving for Eneland by the mail boat to-day, and the date of his return was uncertain. The facts attending the case were that a cow belonging to defendant, which was of a very vicious nature, was being driven along the road, when it ran into the theodolite and broke it.

Mr. De Villiers handed in the affidavit of Mr. Pearl, an articulated clerk in the employment of Messrs. Friedlander and Du Toit, who stated that, in reply to the allegations, the summons was issued on the 3rd February last, and the pleadings closed on the 7th April. Although the attorneys of the plaintiff were frequently asked to put the case down for trial, they had not done so.

Buchanan, J., granted the application, and made the costs costs in cause. Mr. P. S. Jones was appointed commissioner.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

TRIAL CAUSES.

OSBORNE V. OSBORNE. { 1901.
June 29th.

This was an action brought by Johanna Maria Sophia Osborne, of Salt River, against Edward Osborne, carpenter, Cape Town, for divorce, on the ground of his adultery with divers women, to the plaintiff unknown. Mr. W. P. Buchanan appeared for the plaintiff; the defendant was in default.

Wm. Thomas Birch, Colonial Office, produced duplicate register of the marriage.

Johanna Maria Sophia Osborne (the plaintiff) said she was married to the defendant in 1897, and had lived at Cape Town and Mossel Bay. There were three children of the marriage—two boys and a girl. Her husband had ill-treated her, and had given way to drink. He had been staying out late at night. She had reason to suspect that he had been going to the Locomotive Hotel in company with certain women. She had seen him drinking with a woman there. He had come out arm-in-arm with the woman, and had gone up Durham Avenue. He misconducted himself with the woman in a lane just by. Both her husband and the woman were under the influence of drink. The act was repeated later in the evening. She saw him again on the following night; he was in the company of three women at the Locomotive Hotel. She accused him of committing adultery on the previous night, and he admitted it and asked her forgiveness. He did not live with her afterwards. The defendant was a carpenter, in the employ of the Harbour Board. He had no property. She desired maintenance at the rate of £3 per month per child.

Mrs. Frederick Gie, of Salt River, gave corroborative evidence.

Decree of divorce granted, with costs, plaintiff to have custody of the minor children; defendant to pay £1 per month for the maintenance of each child of the marriage until attaining the age of sixteen years, with leave to the plaintiff to move the Court again for an increase of maintenance.

PIENNAAR V. EXECUTORS { 1901.
TESTAMENTARY ESTATE { June 29th.
SLUITER. " 30th.

Executor—Claims on estate—
Referee—Costs—Act 27 of 1895.

This was an action brought by Petrus Jacobus Pienaar, sen., farmer, Colesberg, against the Board of Executors, Cape Town, as executors testamentary in the estate of the late Herman van Loenen Sluiter, for an account as to certain transactions which plaintiff alleged that he had had with the testator.

Buchanan, J., said that he noticed in the list there were four actions against the defendant estate. Was it intended to take them separately?

Counsel said two of the actions might be consolidated, but as to the others, they would have to be taken separately.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is a farmer, residing in the district of Colesberg. The defendants are sued in their capacity as executors testamentary in the estate of the late Herman van Loenen Sluiter, in his lifetime an attorney and farm owner of Colesberg, who died on the 29th August, 1900. Letters of administration were issued to the defendants on the 17th September, 1900.

2. In the year 1896, the plaintiff and the said Sluiter entered into an agreement to trade jointly in horses, cattle, and other stock, and to share equally in the profits of the said joint trade, the plaintiff agreeing to do all the work of buying and selling, and the said Sluiter agreeing to keep the account books, and provide all the capital required for the said joint trade.

3. In pursuance of the said agreement, large numbers of horses, cattle, and other stock were bought and sold from time to time, until the 28th February, 1900, when the plaintiff left this colony, and did not return until April, 1901.

4. No account has ever been rendered to the plaintiff of the profits which accrued from the said joint trade, nor has the plaintiff ever received any payment in respect of his share of the said profits.

5. On or about the 28th December, 1899, the plaintiff, in pursuance of the said agreement, and at the special request of the said Sluiter, proceeded on a journey to Bloemfontein and Johannesburg, in order to collect out-standing debts in connection with the joint trade aforesaid.

6. The plaintiff defrayed his own expenses on the said journey, amounting to the sum of £36 1s., in respect whereof he is entitled to demand from the defendants the sum of £18 0s. 6d., being the share thereof payable by the said Sluiter under the aforesaid agreement.

7. On or about the 1st January, 1897, the said Sluiter employed the plaintiff to act as head overseer of all the farms of the said Sluiter at a salary of £10 per month.

8. The plaintiff duly fulfilled his duties as such overseer from the 1st January, 1897, until the 28th February, 1900, in respect whereof he is entitled to the sum of £380 for salary still remaining unpaid and due to him.

9. Throughout the year 1899, the plaintiff was contractor for the repair of roads to the Divisional Council of Colesberg, and the said Sluiter, from time to time, on behalf of the plaintiff, received payment from the said Divisional Council of several sums of money due to the plaintiff in respect of his work as such contractor.

10. During the period between the 1st July, 1899, and the 30th November, 1899, the sums so received by the said Sluiter amounted to a total of £288 15s., which has not been paid over to the plaintiff; of the sums so received by the said Sluiter before the 1st July, 1899, the plaintiff has received no account of payment.

11. In or about November, 1900, the defendants in their said capacity or their agents wrongfully took and sold certain furniture, the property of the plaintiff, in the house hired by him at Colesberg, and also certain furniture and implements the property of the plaintiff on the farm Droogrequest, altogether of the value of £49 14s.: the proceeds of the sale whereof have not been paid over to the plaintiff.

12. In or about April, 1899, the plaintiff and the defendant mutually agreed that the plaintiff should deliver to the said Sluiter a new buckwagon, and that the said Sluiter should deliver to the plaintiff an old buckwagon and pay to the plaintiff the sum of £30.

13. The said buckwagons were delivered as agreed, but the said sum of £30 has not been paid to the plaintiff.

14. In or about January, 1900, the plaintiff, on account of the insecurity created by the war, deposited for safe keeping with the said Sluiter the sum of £82, which has not yet been repaid to the plaintiff.

15. In or about February, 1900, the plaintiff sold and delivered to the said Sluiter a brown mare, for the sum of £19, which still remains wholly unpaid and due to the plaintiff.

16. On or about the 28th February, 1900, the plaintiff, on leaving this colony, deposited for safe keeping with the said Sluiter two trek oxen, two Scotch carts, and twenty-four kapater goats, the property of the plaintiff, which have not yet been restored to the plaintiff.

Wherefore the plaintiff prays—(a) That the defendants be ordered to render him a true account of the profits of the joint trade referred to in paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 hereof, and to pay to him one-half share of such profits. (b) The sum of £18 0s. 6d., in respect of paragraph 6 hereof. (c) The sum of £380 in respect of paragraph 8 hereof. (d) In respect of paragraph 10 hereof, the sum of £288 15s., and a true and proper account and payment of the other sums therein referred to. (e) Delivery of the furniture and implements referred to in paragraph 11; or, alternatively, the sum of £49 14s., the value thereof. (f) The sum of £30 in respect of paragraph 13. (g) The sum of £82 in respect of paragraph 14. (h) The sum of £19 in respect of paragraph 15. (i) Delivery of the oxen, Scotch carts, and goats referred to in paragraph 16; or, alternatively, the sum of £66 10s., the value thereof. (k) Interest on the said sums respectively a tempore morae. (l) Alternative relief. (m) Costs of suit.

Before pleading to the merits of the plaintiff's declaration, the defendants say:

1. The plaintiff's estate was, on the 1st August 1899, by order of the Hon. Sir J. D. Barry, of the Eastern Districts Court, placed under voluntary sequestration.

2. The plaintiff's estate has not been rehabilitated, nor has the final account and plan of distribution in the said estate been fulfilled.

3. By reason of the premises the rights, if any, which but for the said order of sequestration the plaintiff might have had against the defendants by reason of the matters set forth in the declaration, have become and are vested in the trustee of the plaintiff's estate, other than the right, if any, to such portion of his salary as overseer, as may have accrued since the 1st August, 1899, being portion of claim (c) of the plaintiff's declaration, and the plaintiff is not entitled to maintain any action in respect of such rights, other than the right, if any, to the said portion of the said salary.

Wherefore, save in respect of the said portion of claim (c), the defendants pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs, or, in the alternative, in case this Hon. Court should not grant the above prayer, that such portion of plaintiff's claims as accrued prior to the order of sequestration may be dismissed, with costs. And for a plea to the merits of the plaintiff's declaration, the defendants say:

1. They admit paragraph 1.

2. As to paragraph 2, they admit that the plaintiff and the said Sluiter entered into agreement to trade jointly in stock and to share equally in the profits of the said trade, but they have no knowledge of the date or the terms of the said agreement, and put the plaintiff to the proof thereof.

3. As to paragraph 3, they admit that stock was bought and sold from time to time, in pursuance of the said agreement, but they deny that such purchase and sale continued until the 28th February, 1900, and say that the said agreement was terminated on or before the 27th July 1899. They admit that the plaintiff left this colony in 1900, and returned thereto in 1901.

4. They deny the allegations in section 4, and say that accounts were from time to time rendered, and payments made to the plaintiff by the said Sluiter in respect of the said profits, and that there is nothing due to the plaintiff in respect of the said profits.

5. They say further, in case this Hon. Court should hold that an account is due from them, that they are unable to render such account without having in their possession a certain stock-book, containing a record of stock purchased or sold on behalf of the said joint trade, which book the plaintiff has in his possession or control, and refuses to deliver to them.

6. As to paragraphs 5 and 6, they say that if the plaintiff proceeded on a journey to Bloemfontein and Johannesburg in December, 1899, of which they have no knowledge, they deny that it was in pursuance of the said agreement or to collect debts in connection with the said joint trade, and deny that he is entitled to demand from them any sum in respect of his travelling expenses.

7. As to paragraphs 7 and 8, they deny the allegations therein contained, save that they admit that in terms of an agreement entered into on or about the 27th July, 1899, to which they crave leave to refer when produced at the trial, the plaintiff was employed by the said Sluiter to purchase live-stock at a salary of £10 per month, and say that the said salary was duly paid to the plaintiff by the said Sluiter.

8. As to paragraphs 9 and 10, they say they have no knowledge of the allegations therein contained, and put the plaintiff to the proof thereof.

9. As to paragraph 11, they admit that in or about November, 1900, they took and sold certain furniture in a house hired by plaintiff at Colesberg, and certain furniture and implements on the farm Droogrequest, but they deny that they acted wrongfully, and that the said furniture and implements were the property of the plaintiff, and say that they belonged to the estate of the late Sluiter. They admit that they have not paid over the proceeds to the plaintiff.

10. They have no knowledge of the allegations in paragraphs 12 and 13, and put the plaintiff to the proof thereof.

11. As to paragraph 14, they admit that in or about January, 1900, the plaintiff handed over to the said Sluiter the sum of £82, but they deny that it was deposited for safe-keeping. They say that the said sum was paid to the said Sluiter by the plaintiff on account of the plaintiff's indebtedness to him, and that the said Sluiter in proving his debt against the plaintiff's estate, as hereinafter set forth, credited the plaintiff with the payment of the said sum.

12. They have no knowledge of the allegations in paragraphs 15 and 16, and put the plaintiff to the proof thereof.

13. They say further that the said Sluiter at the second meeting in the estate of the plaintiff proved debts amounting in all, after deducting any amounts, which fell to be credited to the plaintiff by the said Sluiter, to £596 0s. 8d., for particulars whereof the defendants crave leave to refer to the proofs of debt when produced at the trial, and that the said proofs were admitted and have not been expunged.

They crave leave to set off the said amount against such amount, if any, which this Honourable Court may find to be due by them to the plaintiff, and with which the plaintiff has not already been credited by the said Sluiter in the said proofs. They say that the said amount of £596 0s. 8d. exceeds the amount of the claims whereof they have no knowledge, as hereinbefore set forth.

Wherefore they pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

The replication of the plaintiff was general.

Mr. Graham, K.C. (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) for the plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner) for defendant.

Mr. Graham intimated that he did not think they would trouble the Court with the claim for £18 expenses of journey to Pretoria. He also applied for an amendment of the replication to the effect that the plaintiff had been rehabilitated by order of this Court.

Sir H. Juta raised no objection, and the alteration was allowed.

Petrus Jacobus Pienaar, speculator, Colesberg (the plaintiff), said he knew the late Mr. Sluiter for many years. He had joint speculations in horses and cattle with Mr. Sluiter, commencing, he believed, in 1896. These continued until witness left the Colony in 1900. Witness became insolvent in 1899, but he continued his speculations until February, 1900, when he left the Colony with the Boers. In December, 1901, he was sentenced for trading with the enemy; he and Mr. Sluiter went to Pretoria with some stock, which they sold to the Boers, 403 hammels and 16 oxen. When the Boers left the Colony in February, 1900, witness went with them; he subsequently surrendered at Komatie Poort. He handed his stock-book to Sluiter when he left for the Transvaal, and had never seen it since.

Sir H. Juta took a formal objection to evidence being led as to any transaction prior to the insolvency.

Mr. Graham said that it would be very difficult to explain what happened after the insolvency without referring to what took place before.

Buchanan, J., said that perhaps it would be quite fair to lead evidence which would make the transaction after the insolvency more clear.

Witness (continuing) said he was overseer of Sluiter's farm between 1897 and 1900, receiving a salary of £10 a month. Sluiter never paid him any salary. He had power of attorney granted by Sluiter, but it was now lost, as it was taken when the British came on his farm. He received another power of attorney from Sluiter upon his (Mr. Pienaar's) return from the Transvaal. Before the war, he was a road contractor of the Divisional Council of Colesberg, of which Mr. Sluiter was secretary. Sluiter paid him by cheque, witness endorsed the cheques, and Sluiter kept them. He continued to be road contractor after his insolvency, and amounts became due which were retained by Mr. Sluiter. He obtained leave to trade again in October, 1899, from the trustee (Mr. Davis); he was also allowed to retain certain of his furniture. Certain parlour furniture was sold by auction, and was bought in for witness by his brother John. When he left with the Boers in February, 1900, he had this furniture, and that which had been allowed him by his creditors. He valued the furniture sold by auction during his absence in the Transvaal at about £49. In 1899, before his insolvency, the transaction as to the wagon took place. When he left for the Transvaal he gave Sluiter £70 for safe-keeping, money he had received for forage which he had sold. He also paid Sluiter £12 10s., with which he was to be credited. In February, 1900, he bought a brown mare from his nephew; he sold the animal to Mr. Sluiter for £19, for which he had never been paid. When he went with the Boers, he left on the farm a Scotch cart, and certain oxen and goats, of the total value of £66 10s. 6d. He produced inventories of his furniture at Colesberg and Droogerequest at the time he left for the Transvaal. He returned to Colesberg in March, 1901, and saw his attorney (Mr. Davis) with reference to proceeding against the estate. He waited until his treason trial, and was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment. On the 8th December, 1902, he returned to Colesberg, after undergoing imprisonment.

[Buchanan, J.: When did Sluiter die?] In August, 1900.

Witness (continuing his evidence) said that in April, 1901, he instructed his attorneys to write to the Board of Executors. At that time the Board returned a counter-claim for £4,000 as executors of Sluiter's estate. After undergoing his imprisonment, he instructed his attorneys in December, 1902, to again write to the Board of Executors. Considerable correspondence ensued between his attorneys and Mr. Roos, secretary of the Board of Executors. He had an interview in March, 1903, with Mr. Roos in Cape Town, but they could not arrive at a settlement. Subsequently he was asked to forward to the Board of Executors solemn declarations with reference to his own and his children's claims. These were sent, and further delay took place. When the Boers came on his farm, there were 157 horses and 42 head of cattle, belonging to Mr. Sluiter and himself. The Boers took 36 horses, and paid Sluiter for nine, at £20 each. They first took nine, and paid for them, and a month after they took 27 more, and gave Sluiter a "good-for." Oxen were sold for £15 to the Boers; this money also was paid to Sluiter.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He had seen the books containing the accounts. The special account, he knew, showed £600 to the bad; they had then 100 horses and 142 head of cattle. The Boers took the horses in November, 1899. They had 127 horses in February, 1900. He did not know what then became of the horses. Some of the horses were sold at Modderfontein after Mr. Sluiter's death. Witness was not there. He sold a number of horses to Homan; the special account got credit for that purchase of Homan's. Homan still owed some money; witness did not know how much, but he could ascertain from the special account. Homan disputed the account, and said that he did not receive the horses alleged. Roughly, he should say Homan paid £180. That was not in the account. Witness had a private account. He did not know whether in February he owed £30 3s. 5d. He had not been able to see the account. He received no salary for his services as overseer. When he became insolvent, he did not claim for the salary, although the amount due was £180. He first discovered that the salary was not paid to him from the books of the Board of Executors. In July, 1899, he entered into an agreement to give his services in connection with the joint speculations. He was at that time intending to surrender his estate. He obtained leave to trade in September of that year, and the agreement then dropped. Witness drew large sums of money on the speculations. He did not go on the brown horse with the Boers. He had never borne arms with the Boers. He was not with the Boers. He was convicted of selling hammals and oxen to the Boers, but on all the other charges he was acquitted.

By the Court: The agreement under which he was to receive £10 a month for services in the joint speculations was only a "blind," until he obtained leave to trade from his creditors.

Wm. Ernest Davis, attorney and secretary of the Divisional Council, Colesberg, said that he was trustee in the insolvent estate of Pienaar. He knew that there had been joint speculations by Pienaar and Sluiter. The men were on very friendly terms. He produced the Council's ledger, showing cheques drawn by Mr. Sluiter (as secretary of the Divisional Council), in favour of Mr. Pienaar, amounting to £288 15s., between the 14th July, 1899, and the 29th November, 1899. As trustee, he gave Pienaar leave to trade in September, 1899. He knew that Mr. Pienaar had been overseer of Mr. Sluiter's farms, and that he was to receive a salary of £10 a month. In April, 1901, Pienaar was lodged in gaol on his return from the Transvaal, and was released about a month afterwards. He then consulted witness as to writing to the Board of Executors. Witness, as trustee of Pienaar's estate, had an action against Mr. Dirk Slater. A settlement was arrived at, by which Dirk Slater was to pay the administrative expenses, and so on. That agreement was not fulfilled. He had understood that it had been paid, but he now believed it had not.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He gave the plaintiff leave to trade at the suggestion of Mr. Sluiter, who was the principal creditor. He did not report to the third meeting of creditors. He informed the creditors individually. There was no record of the fact in the minutes.

Johannes Jacobus Lichter, farmer, residing in the district of Colesberg, stated that he was appointed as sub-manager over a farm by the plaintiff in 1893, and Mr. Sluiter confirmed his appointment. Up to February, 1900, Pienaar was overseer on the farms. During that month the plaintiff fled up to the Transvaal, and joined the Boers. On instructions he received from Sluiter, he took over the plaintiff's furniture. The furniture was disposed of at the sale of Sluiter's estate. Mr. Clements, the auctioneer who was acting for the estate, was informed that the furniture belonged to Pienaar. In June, 1900, he brought eight oxen to Modderfontein, two of which belonged to Pienaar. The oxen were also sold in the estate.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He brought the oxen from Rietvlei, but he could not say how they got there. Mr. Sluiter spoke to him in April, and told him to keep the furniture safe for Pienaar. He could not explain why he made an entry in the book on the 1st April after an entry in June.

Re-examined by Mr. Graham: He handed the list to Mr. Pienaar a couple of weeks after the latter came back from the Transvaal.

Petrus Jacobus Pienaar, jun., stated that he was in the employ of plaintiff, who was his uncle. His uncle, up to the time he left for the Transvaal, was overseer for Mr. Sluiter. In February, 1900, he sold his uncle a brown mare, which was re-sold to Mr.

Sluiter. His uncle had three Scotch carts, one of which was drawn by the two black oxen to Rietvlei. In 1900 he saw the plaintiff superintending the shearing at Modderfontein.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He could not give a list of the furniture at Droogrequest. Witness took the mare from the English. He did not "steal" it, he "took" it. He shot the trooper in a fight, and took his horse. He did not murder the soldier, he killed him in a fair fight. He joined the Boers in November, and they were fighting all over the place, but in February he was in the house at Droogrequest, where he saw the furniture.

A coloured boy, in the employ of the plaintiff, stated that he was in Mr. Sluiter's employ during the war, and was there when the English troops came into Colesberg. The day before the English arrived Mr. Sluiter told him to bring the horse out of the plaintiff's stable, and put it on the farm at Droogrequest. The British troops took possession of the mare. The previous Monday the plaintiff handed him over 24 goats, which Mr. Sluiter sold with his own stock. On Mr. Sluiter's instructions he sent two loads of the plaintiff's furniture to Modderfontein.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: In February, 1900, when the Boers left Colesberg, witness was left in charge of the stock at Droogrequest, and he understood that the lot belonged to Mr. Sluiter.

Re-examined by Mr. Graham: He did not know who was the owner of the goats Mr. Pienaar handed over to him.

This closed the evidence for the plaintiff.

Johannes Roos, secretary of the Board of Executors, who were the executors in the estate of Sluiter, stated that Mr. Pienaar was given access to the books in March last. There was no single item that was objected to. The only question which the plaintiff raised was an item of a debt by Homan, but the latter repudiated any liability.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: Witness's attorneys wrote that after going through the books of the deceased they found that the plaintiff was indebted to the estate in the sum of £4,218, and he came that letter to be written on the strength of a letter he saw from Clements to Pienaar. The moment the plaintiff came back from the Transvaal he wrote about the account, and when he was released from Tokai he called on witness again, and subsequently he wrote that the stock-book, which was missing, had been handed over to Sluiter.

Gordon Clements stated that he was bookkeeper for Sluiter up to the time of his death. Pienaar kept a stock-book, but it was not among Sluiter's papers when witness returned in April, 1900. At no time when he was there was there any entry of £10 a month to Pienaar, but Pienaar was on the farm with Mr. Sluiter. On the compensation claim, £514 19s. 2d. was recovered for stock, and that should have gone to the joint account. He did not know of anything sold in the estate of Sluiter belonging to Pienaar.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: He knew that Pienaar and Sluiter had been speculating for years on a joint estate. If the plaintiff said that he was getting £10 a month for being overseer, witness thought it very likely to be the truth.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: Everything sold passed through the books.

H. Jacobus Sluiter said that he remembered going to a sale on the plaintiff's farm. He saw certain stock on the farm, which was pointed out as belonging to the late Mr. Sluiter. He went to a sale at the farm Vosloo, Rietvlei; he counted the stock on behalf of his late cousin. The stock was brought into the kraals. The sheep, horses, and cattle that they counted were taken to another farm, and sold subsequently at Modderfontein.

Mr. Clements, the auctioneer (re-called) said that no protest was entered when he sold the furniture in the estate of the late Mr. Sluiter.

This concluded the evidence, and counsel was heard in argument upon the facts.

Mr. Graham contended that it had been clearly shown on all hands that there had been a joint speculation between the plaintiff and the late Mr. Sluiter, and he urged that the plaintiff was clearly entitled to a debate of the partnership account. As to the suggestion that the account should be debated at Colesberg, he said his clients agreed that there might be partisanship in such a small place, and they would consent, if an account were submitted to them, to the debate taking place in Cape Town. Claim (b) for £18 expenses of a journey to Pretoria, they abandoned. As to the claim for salary as overseer of the late Mr. Sluiter's farm, he submitted that he would be entitled to salary after his insolvency, from August, 1899, for seven months, at £10 a month. The plaintiff had also shown that he was clearly entitled to judgment under prayer (g) for the moneys due to him as road contractor of the Colesberg Divisional Council. He submitted that they had conclusively proved their claim for delivery of furniture, or its value, £49 14s. In regard to (f), that part of the claim was abandoned. The defendants admitted that they had received £82 10s. from the plaintiff for safe custody. He contended that the plaintiff had clearly proved the claim (i) for delivery of oxen, carts, etc., or in the alternative, for £66 10s., their value.

Sir H. Juta pointed out that when this summons was issued, plaintiff was an unrehabilitated insolvent, and consequently it was impossible for the defendants to counter-claim. Therefore, if the plaintiff was entitled to credit on the trading account, and owed something on the private account, then those amounts would be adjusted as between each other. The plaintiff only got leave to trade in the middle of September, 1899, and he would be entitled to nothing as proceeds from trade prior to that date. Any such proceeds earned prior to insolvency would be the moneys of the creditors. It seemed to him that there would be three questions to be decided: (1) What rights the insolvent acquired up to the time he got leave to trade, and what afterwards? (2) What was the amount itself to be brought into the account? (3) The question of the private account, which could not now be ignored? In regard to the account, it was clear that there would have to be a reference, hence he would not address the Court at length on that subject.

Buchanan, J., said that some direction would have to be given to the referee on disputed points.

Sir H. Juta said that, in regard to the sale of stock, it was evident that the plaintiff would have a claim against the compensation paid by the Imperial Government for property taken belonging to the joint estate. Under the Act 27 of 1895, it was the duty of the plaintiff to supply the executors with proof of his claim, and none of this evidence, which was adduced in court, was sent up with his declaration. He submitted that it would be the duty of the referee to ascertain what the exact amount was. Plaintiff had not supplied any proofs to the executors. There was nothing ever said at any of the sales to show that the plaintiff had any rights in the property offered. The two disputed points were: (1) Whether the £240 which Mr. Clements said ought to belong to the agency account did belong to it, and whether he had proof of that at present, and (2) what amount of the stock which belonged to the agency account at the time that Pienaar left Colesberg were actually sold in the estate, and of which the estate had received the money. As to the claim for salary as overseer, he thought the evidence of the plaintiff himself showed that he was entitled to nothing before his insolvency, otherwise he would have brought up the item in his schedules in insolvency. This claim for salary he submitted could not be entertained for a moment. As to the claim (d), Divisional Council payments, counsel contended that it was clear the plaintiff had got credit for every penny under this head. Counsel submitted that no proof had been given as to the other parts of the claim. If anything was due on account of the furniture, it was very small indeed.

Mr. Graham, having been heard in reply,

Buchanan, J.: In this case the plaintiff and the late Mr. Sluiter were on very friendly terms, both socially and in business. They began transactions together as far back as 1896. On the 1st August, 1899, the plaintiff surrendered his estate; in August, 1900, Mr. Sluiter died. The action now is brought against Sluiter's executors, and I must say at the outset that it was certainly, under the circumstances disclosed in this case, the duty of the executors to put the plaintiff to proof of the claims, which he had made. The executors would not have been justified in paying these claims without full and thorough investigation of the accounts between the parties. The plaintiff claimed first an account of the transactions between the parties since 1896. But it is clear that all transactions between the parties and all claims that the plaintiff had against Sluiter, were on his sequestration vested in his trustee, and Pienaar cannot now sue for them. Plaintiff's claims must be limited to transactions after the date of sequestration. The insolvent did not get leave to trade until some time in September, but under the 49th section of the Insolvent Ordinance anything that an insolvent earns by his own labour is protected. If these claims did not arise out of the insolvent's own personal work, it might be necessary either to join the trustee or to bar the insolvent from recovering before he got leave to trade. In this case it is unnecessary to go beyond the date of the insolvency. But in passing, I must remark that the trustee's action in giving to the insolvent leave to trade seems most irregular. Trustees must remember that they are officers of the Court, and must act as officials should act. In this case, without any authorisation from the creditors, the trustee gave leave to trade. He never reported his having done so to the creditors, or asked their ratification. However, the conduct of the trustee will not be dealt with as affecting the plaintiff in this case. His lordship proceeded to review various aspects of the plaintiff's claim, and said that the order of the Court, in brief, would be as follows: Mr. Maynard Nash is appointed as referee, before whom the parties will debate the accounts between the parties of all transactions, which took place after the 1st August, 1899. Sluiter's books of special and individual accounts to be taken as the basis upon which the debate is to be had; under claim (a), the amount received as compensation from the Imperial Government, and the proceeds of any stock received by the estate, which the referee shall decide to be derived from the stock belonging to the joint venture to be credited; claims (b) and (f) not to be taken into consideration; under claim (c) plaintiff to be allowed £70; under claim (d), so much of the amount received from the Divisional Council since 1st August, 1899, to be taken into account, as the same appears in Mr. Sluiter's books; under claims (e) and (i), such amounts as may be traced by the referee as having been received by Sluiter's estate from the sale of the property therein mentioned; claim (g) to be taken into account; as to claim (h), interest not to be reckoned on either side. Referee to report to the Court as soon as he reasonably can, when judgment will be given.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

TRIAL CAUSES.

PIENAR V. ESTATE { 1904.
SLUITER. { June 30th.

Executor—Claims on estate.

This was an action brought by Hercules David Pienaar against the Board of Executors, Cape Town, in their capacity as executors testamentary of the estate of the late Herman van Loenen Sluiter, for the recovery of the sums of £53 2s. 6d., £60, and £45 over certain transactions in sheep.

The declaration was as follows: The plaintiff is a speculator, residing in Johannesburg, Transvaal; the defendants are sued in their capacity as executors testamentary in the estate of the late Herman van Loenen Sluiter, of Colesberg, who died on the 29th August, 1900. In or about April, 1899, Pietrus Jacobus Pienaar, sen., of Colesberg, on behalf of plaintiff, sold and delivered to the said Sluiter at Ventersfontein, Colesberg, 85 ewes, the property of the plaintiff, for the sum of £53 2s. 6d., which remains wholly unpaid and due to the plaintiff. In or about April, 1900, the said Sluiter, on behalf of the plaintiff, sold to one Alexander Robertson and Edward McMillan Little, for the sum of £60 sterling, 48 hamel sheep, the property of the plaintiff, then at pasture on the farm Rietvlei, Steynsburg. The said sum of £60 was duly paid to the said Sluiter, but still remains wholly unpaid and due to the plaintiff. In or about August, 1900, the said Sluiter, on behalf of the plaintiff, sold to the said Robertson and Little 36 hamel sheep, the property of the plaintiff, which were then pastured on the farm Rietvlei, Steynsburg, for the sum of £45. The said sum of £45 was duly paid to the defendants in their said capacity, but remain wholly unpaid and due to the plaintiff. Wherefore the plaintiff prays: (a) Judgment in the sum of £53 2s. 6d., £60, and £45 respectively; (b) interest a tempore mora; (c) alternative relief; (d) costs of suit.

The defendants' plea was as follows: They admit paragraph 1. As to paragraphs 2, 3, 4, and 5, they have no knowledge as to the allegations therein contained, and put the plaintiff to the proof thereof. As to paragraph 6, they admit that a certain sum of £45 was paid to them by one Little for certain sheep sold to him by the said Sluiter, and that they have not paid the said sum to the plaintiff, but they have no knowledge that the said sheep were the property of the plaintiff, and put him to the proof thereof. They say, further, that the plaintiff, though called upon to do so, has failed and neglected to furnish them with sufficient information and proof of his claims to enable them to admit the said claims. Wherefore, they submit to the judgment of this Hon. Court on the plaintiff's claims, but pray for costs of suit.

Mr. Graham, K.C. (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) for plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner) for defendants.

Hercules David Pienaar, plaintiff, stated that he left Colesberg for the Transvaal in 1896, and at that time he left his sheep in charge of his brother on the farm at Droogrequest. At the beginning of 1899 he authorised his brother to sell 600 sheep. He had never been paid for any of his sheep.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He supplied no proof to the executors, as required by the Ordinance.

Petrus Jacobus Pienaar, brother of the plaintiff, stated that he sold 100 sheep in 1899. The declaration was made before his attorney, who had been written to by Mr. Roos. Eighty-five sheep were sold to Mr. Sluiter for 12s. 6d. each. On his return from the Transvaal, in 1901, he identified 23 of the sheep by his brother's mark. He never received any request for further information from the executors. The stock book from Rietvlei was kept by Johannes Pienaar. In June there was an entry of 120 sheep. There was a further entry in the book about which he had some conversation with his brother.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He never showed the book produced to Mr. Roos. He had the book with him, but when Mr. Roos could not come to a settlement he kept the book. According to his statement in the insolvency examination in 1898 he had only 160 sheep belonging to his brother. He had a bad time of it from 1896 to 1897, when he lost 600 sheep from drought. If Mr. Sluiter bought the sheep it was unlikely, in wit-ness's opinion, that it would appear in his books.

Johannes J. Luttig said he was sub-manager for Mr. Sluiter in 1899, at Rietvlei, when he received certain sheep from Mr. Pienaar, from Droogrequest. This was in March, 1899. About 85 ewes and 20 lambs were received. The sheep bore Hercules Pienaar's mark. Sluiter asked him whether the sheep he had bought from Mr. Pienaar had arrived, and said, if they had they should go with the other sheep. At the Modderfontein sale he saw some of the sheep in question being offered. At a subsequent sale at Rietvlei in August, 1900, he saw certain sheep sold to Mr. Little that had Mr. Pienaar's mark.

Johannes Jacobus Pienaar, of Steynsburg, formerly manager for Mr. Sluiter, at Rietvlei; Pieter Badenhorst, farmer, Colesberg; and Edward MacMillan, farmer, Orange River Colony, also gave evidence for the plaintiff.

Johannes E. N. Roos, secretary of the Board of Executors, said he had the books of the estate, and he could find no account of Herklaas Pienaar. He found two amounts paid over to the executors by Little for sheep—£84 and £50. It was collected by the executors.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: He had examined the book to see whether Little had a folio.

This concluded the evidence, and counsel addressed the Court in argument on the facts.

Buchanan, J.: The plaintiff claims three amounts, viz., £53 2s. 6d. for 85 ewes, £60 for 48 hammels, and £45 for 36 sheep. The first question to decide is, has the plaintiff proved the contract and these sales alleged in the declaration? If this had been an ordinary case his Lordship thought the Court might have been justified in giving absolute from the instance, but as it is a case of executors being sued, having an estate to deal with, and the estate had to be wound up. His Lordship said he had carefully analysed the evidence to see if he could now settle the matter in dispute. The question whether a contract was entered into between plaintiff and Sluiter depends upon the evidence of the plaintiff's brother Jacobus. No fraud has been alleged, and he was not going to say that there has been any fraud proved in this case, but he was bound to say that where the case depends upon the recollection only of Jacobus Pienaar he could not accept his statement. After dealing with the corroborative evidence, he would give judgment for the plaintiff for £53 2s. 6d. for 85 sheep, and for £23 for the sheep sold to Little. On the question of costs, looking at the circumstances, and especially the inaccuracies in the declaration sent in by the plaintiff, which forced the executors to come into Court. His Lordship thought this was a case which was intended to come under section 9, of Act No. 27, 1895, which provided that it should be competent for the Court while adjudging in favour of a claimant against an estate, to decline to grant such claimant his costs in case the Court should deem that the information given by the claimant to the executor was insufficient, and that this executor acted with prudence and discretion in contesting the claim. Judgment would be given for the plaintiff for £76 2s. 6d., but there would be no order as to costs.

The application was granted.

MUIR V. ALEXANDER.

Mr. Close, on behalf of plaintiff, applied for attachment against the defendant for contempt of Court.

Mr. Alexander for defendant.

Mr. Close said an order was given by the Court for the recovery of certain papers, which had not been complied with.

Mr. Alexander raised the technical point that the notice applied for the attachment of the defendant's solicitors, and not for the defendant.

The Court granted the application, but stayed execution until Monday next, to allow the defendant to comply with the order of Court.

ELIASON V. ELIASON.

Mr. Alexander, on behalf of the plaintiff, applied for an order to sue the defendant in forma pauperis, and also by edictal citation, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce. He said the plaintiff, who was present in court, was too poor to conduct the proceedings herself.

The plaintiff stated she was married to the defendant, who was a Swedish sailor, in 1894. Two years afterwards he sent her on a holiday, and when she returned home, she found he had gone. She had not heard from him since. She was too poor to sue him in the ordinary manner.

Hopley, J., granted the application, and said that, as the defendant seemed to be a wanderer, they would allow him a lengthy return day. He fixed it for November 14.

Ex parte GINSBERG.

Mr. Jones applied for an order authorising the registration of a certain antenuptial contract, entered into in Germany in March, 1904.

The application was granted.

Ex parte DE BLEQUEY.

Mr. Buchanan, who appeared for the applicant, said he was a minor, and a carpenter by trade. The Master had a certain sum of money, which was left to him. He had recently been supporting his mother and sisters. He wished now to start business as a butcher, and for that purpose wished to get the money he was entitled to (£106). He had been promised plenty of support in his venture.

The Master's report stated that the applicant would be unable to carry on a remunerative business in the manner he started with the capital at his disposal, and therefore he did not recommend handing over the money.

Hopley, J., inquired what the age of the applicant was.

Mr. Buchanan replied that he was 20 years and 6 months.

Hopley, J., said he thought they might as well let the applicant have the money. He would be entitled to it in six months.

ESTATE CLAASSENS V. FOURIE AND OTHERS.

Mr. Buchanan applied for leave to change the venue of the trial of this case to the Oudtshoorn Circuit Court. The applicant's affidavit stated that, owing to the illness of one of the witnesses, who would be unable to stand the strain of a journey to Cape Town, he had made the application.

Mr. Close, on behalf of the defendant, opposed, and read an affidavit made by defendant, in which he stated that if the case should be tried at the Circuit Court at Oudtshoorn, it would not be heard until September or October, and would entail big expense, as witnesses had been subpoenaed from the Transkei to Cape Town, and they would have to be brought down to Oudtshoorn later on. The case was set down for hearing at Cape Town for Wednesday next.

Mr. Buchanan said all the parties were resident in the Oudtshoorn and George districts. The claim was only for £70, and no important legal point was concerned. It was partly a question as to the construction of an agreement.

Hopley, J., said he thought there was very little business at either Mossel Bay or Oudtshoorn, and therefore the hearing of the case would not be long delayed.

The application was granted, trial being removed to Mossel Bay, the costs being reserved.

VAN DER MERWE V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. W. P. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Howel Jones, K.C.), applied on behalf of defendants for the postponement of this trial. He explained that the action was a claim for salary and allowances due. The plaintiff was a scab inspector, and was suspended during the recent war. He claimed between £300 and £400. Mr. W. G. Davidson, the chief of the plaintiff's department, had gone to England, and would not return until August 24. He was an important witness in the case, consequently the case could not be proceeded with.

Mr. Close, who appeared for applicant, said he did not oppose the postponement of the trial, if the defendants agreed to pay the costs entailed thereby.

Mr. Schreiner said they had offered before the case came into court to let the costs be costs in the cause, but the plaintiff would not agree to that. The plaintiff acknowledged that Mr. Davidson was an important witness. If the plaintiff intended to press the costs against his client, then he (Mr. Schreiner) would press them against him.

Mr. Close said the case closed in April last, and the Government had had plenty of time to apply for a postponement if they wanted it.

Hopley, J.: Why did you wait to put the case down for trial until Davidson had left the country?

Mr. Close: We did not know he was leaving.

The case was put down for trial for August 30.

Ex parte MOODY.

Marriage — Deceased brother's widow—Act 40 of 1892.

A man may not marry his deceased brother's widow.

Mr. W. P. Schreiner, K.C., applied for an order authorising the issue of a special marriage licence. He explained that the applicant lived at Somerset East. His brother, Jacob Moody, died some years ago, and left a widow and one child. The child died six months afterwards. The widow had since remained single, and was now desirous of marrying applicant. They had applied to the Acting Resident Magistrate, but he refused to grant the licence, as he held the marriage would be contrary to law.

Hopley, J., said the law allowed a man to marry the sister of his deceased wife, but it did not say anything about a man marrying his brother's widow.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for applicant). In the case of Mills v. The Acting R.M. (Cape), (11 C.T.R., 438), the Court held that a nephew may marry his aunt, provided that the relationship between them be that of affinity only. In this case the applicant asks for an order authorising the Magistrate to issue a special licence for his marriage with the widow of his deceased brother. Now, a deceased wife's sister and a deceased brother's wife are both related to the surviving husband of the wife's sister and to the wife of the deceased brother respectively in precisely the same degree of affinity. Section 2 of Act 40 of 1892 not only sanctions marriage with a deceased wife's sister, "provided such sister be not the widow of a deceased brother of such widower," but also allows the widower "to marry any female related to him in any more remote degree of affinity than the sister of his deceased wife, save and except any ancestor of, or descendant from such deceased wife."

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 15th).

De Villiers, C.J., read the judgment of Mr. Justice Hopley in this matter: In this case Mr. Daniel Moody, of Chunise, in the district of Victoria East, asks for an order authorising the Magistrate of King William's Town to grant a special licence for his marriage with Rose Margaret Moody, who is the widow of the petitioner's deceased brother. The petitioner is a bachelor, and it is urged on his behalf that the Court should interpret the 2nd section of Act 40, 1892, as sanctioning such marriage, which, under the common law, it is admitted would be illegal. That section is as follows: "It shall be lawful for any widower to marry the sister of his deceased wife, provided such sister be not the widow of a deceased brother of such widower, etc." It was argued that there was no reason or justice in not construing this to mean that it should be equally lawful for any widow to marry the brother of her deceased husband. But nothing would have been easier than for the Legislature to have said so if such had been their intention. They, however, specially prohibit a widower from marrying his deceased brother's wife, if she were also his deceased's wife's sister, and I can see no social or physiological reason applying in his case that would not equally apply in the case of a bachelor brother. Why should a widower be allowed to marry any sister of his deceased wife except his deceased brother's widow? Simply, it seems to me, because she had been his brother's wife. I think the Legislature intended to retain the common law prohibiting a widow from marrying her deceased husband's brother, and, in my opinion, this petition should be refused.

Ex parte THE TUTORS DATIVE IN THE ESTATE OF THE LATE GEORGE FIGOTT MOODIE.

Mr. Struben applied for an order authorising the payment of certain money. He stated that £4,000 was left to the applicant and his brother. The brother who was dead had received his share, and the applicant, who was studying for an engineer, required some money to proceed with his studies.

An order in accordance with the terms of the application was made.

Ex parte LOMBARD.

Mr. Alexander, for the applicant, applied for leave to amend a certain transfer. He explained that the applicant, who was a widow, was married in community of property. When her husband died, he left her sole heiress as long as she remained a widow, and on condition that she was not allowed to mortgage or alienate the property. In 1897 the executors passed transfer of all the land to her. As she married in community of property, she was entitled to half the property, and wished to mortgage that, but as all the land had been passed in transfer to her, she could not now do so. Therefore she applied for permission to amend the transfer.

The application was granted.

SYME v. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. J. T. Molteno moved upon notice of motion to have a certain award of the arbitrators made a rule of Court.

Mr. Howel Jones consented on behalf of the Government.

Award made a rule of Court, the respondents to pay the costs of the application.

BLIGNAULT v. WAPENAAAR AND OTHERS.

Mr. Burton moved to have an award of arbitrators made a rule of Court, with costs.

Order granted.

MARTENS v. MARTENS.

Dr. Greer moved for leave to sue the defendant for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce. The defendant left her husband in February, 1904, and refused to return to him. It was believed she was at present resident in Edenburg, O.R.C.

Leave granted, intendit to be served with notice of trial, returnable August 1.

Ex parte MANN.

Mr. De Waal moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to cancel a certain bond, the payment of which was not disputed.

Order granted.

APPENDIX.

Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the Appeal of the South African Breweries, Limited, v. Hodgson, from the Supreme Court of the Cape of Good Hope; delivered the 18th May, 1904.

Present at the Hearing:

The Lord Chancellor.

Lord Lidley.

Lord Kinross.

Sir Arthur Wilson.

[Delivered by Lord Lindley.]

The plaintiffs in this action seek to recover from the defendant, who is the executor of a Mr. Martienssen, a sum of £1,250. The claim is based upon a contract dated 4th April, 1899, and made between Martienssen and the plaintiffs.

Martienssen was the owner of an extensive brewery business in the Cape Colony, and was entitled to a brewery and several houses, hotels, and stores, which the plaintiff Company agreed to buy of him. One of these hotels was the Princess Royal Hotel, which Martienssen had agreed to buy from one Flanagan. The agreement for the purchase of this property by Martienssen is dated the 15th February, 1899. The transfer was to be given and taken on 1st July, 1899. The purchase money was £9,500, which was to be paid as follows: £2,500 on the 1st July, and £7,500, with interest at 6 per cent., from that date was to be secured. Possession was to be given as a licensed premises, and as then licensed, on the 15th March, 1899.

Shortly after this agreement was signed, viz., on the 23rd February, 1899, Martienssen offered this hotel to a person named Corlett, on the following terms: "A goodwill £1,500 to be paid on taking possession, a rental of £30 a month." This rental was to be increased if Corlett took some cottages and stores, and he was to sign the usual agreement relating to the purchase of Colonial beers, etc. What is called "goodwill" in the document would in this country be called a "premium." Corlett verbally accepted the offer so made, but the premium was reduced to £1,250. It will be observed that although this was an offer to grant a lease of the Princess Royal Hotel for a premium and a monthly rent, the duration of the lease was not specified. Moreover, no time was mentioned for delivery of possession or for payment of the premium. Corlett did not obtain any lease until after the 4th April, nor did he enter into possession until after that date. In the meantime Flanagan was in possession of the Royal Hotel, and he held the license of it, but subject to his agreement to transfer it to Martienssen as already mentioned. The £1,250 which Corlett was to pay was plainly not payable by him to Martienssen before he agreed to sell the property to the plaintiff Company. This is an important fact to remember, as one of the main controversies in the case turns upon it.

The conveyance of the 4th April, 1899, was based upon a less formal agreement entered into between the plaintiff Company and Martienssen by their respective brokers, and dated 1st March, 1899. There is no discrepancy between the two documents; but the broker's document shows what is not so plain from the formal conveyance, viz., what outstanding debts had been valued at that date. A knowledge of this circumstance throws considerable light on the meaning of one passage in the conveyance.

The formal conveyance is set out on pages 5 to 7 of the Record. As already stated, it is dated 4th April, 1899. It conveys to the plaintiff Company in general terms, Martienssen's brewery business in the Colony with the stock-in-trade, outstanding debts, land, and houses; then follow particulars, and these include the Princess Royal Hotel. "at present under option to the sellers." Then come the following clauses:

"(a) The plant, stock-in-trade, and goodwill, including all outstanding debts, assets, and rights appertaining to the business, at present carried on by the sellers, of every nature and description.

"(1) And generally all the tied houses belonging to the sellers' business as breweries, including the stock-in-trade of such supported or tied houses, the goodwill thereof, and all rights appertaining to the leases and options to purchase.

"(2) The purchase price shall be the sum of £75,000 sterling, payable as to £10,000 in cash on signing this agreement, and as to the balance of £65,000 upon the passing of transfer of the land and the taking possession of the premises and business.

"(3) The sellers shall be entitled to remain in possession of the premises, and to carry on the business until the 31st July, 1899, on their own account and on their own behalf, and shall pay interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum from the date 4th April, 1899, upon the £10,000, until the business be taken over by the purchasing Company.

"(4) The sum of £65,000, referred to above, is subject to adjustment upon the following lines:

"In arriving at this figure the plant and stock-in-trade have been put in at £7,500, and the good outstanding debts at £8,000. If it should be found that these figures are not correct when the property and business is taken over, then the purchase price shall be amended accordingly.

"(5) The sellers shall guarantee all good outstanding book debts and be responsible for them, six months being allowed to the purchasing Company for the collection thereof.

"(6.) Should there be any variance or dispute between the parties to this agreement regarding the value of any plant or stock-in-trade, or with reference to any outstanding debts, such dispute shall be referred to arbitration under the Act of 1898, if not adjusted before the 31st August, 1899.

"(7.) The sellers shall carry on the business until the 31st July, 1899, with due regard to the handing over thereof as a going concern to the purchasing Company on the 1st August, 1899; and they further undertake and bind themselves not to engage in or be interested in, directly or indirectly, any brewery or any similar business within this Colony of the Cape of Good Hope, and promise and undertake to use their influence and their best endeavours towards advancing the interests of the purchasing Company and the securing to the said Company to its fullest extent the goodwill of their business.

"(9.) Seeing that the purchasing Company has agreed to pay over the sum of £10,000 on account of the purchase consideration, the sellers, as an earnest on their behalf, do hereby cede to the purchasing Company all their rights in, to, and under an agreement dated the 15th February, 1899, with one John Flanagan, regarding the purchase of certain block of buildings comprising the 'Princess Royal' Hotel, with all accessories, and do hereby dispose thereof to the said purchasing Company for the amount aforesaid and authorise the said Company to take transfer thereof into its own name as soon as shall be convenient."

Then follows the witnessing part with this—

"Addendum.

"(Clause 9 of this Agreement is not intended to cast upon the purchasing Company the onus of paying Flanagan the £9,500 due to him, but required that this liability be discharged by the said sellers (Martienssen) and the purchasing Company be at liberty to take transfer from the said Martienssen simultaneously with the passing of transfer into his name of the 'Princess Royal' property, without payment of any further sum than the £10,000 already deposited."

The short effect of this document appears to their Lordships to be as follows: First, the plaintiff Company acquired all the property described in the document, including all Martienssen's interest in the Princess Royal Hotel, which again included all his interest in the lease arranged to be given to Corlett. But Martienssen was to pay Flanagan. Secondly, the Company were to pay for all the property so acquired £75,000, but as the property was not to be handed over at once, and the stock-in-trade and business debts would vary, £15,500, part of this sum, was to be subject to adjustment on completion. In other words £59,500, i.e., £75,000, less £15,500, was the price fixed for everything except what was liable to fluctuation, and £15,500 was an estimate left open to be adjusted when the fluctuating assets were actually taken over. The £15,500 was arrived at in this way: the plant and stock-in-trade had been valued by the brokers on the 1st March at £7,500, and the "outstanding book debts" at £8,000. These sums are mentioned in the conveyance, but the expression "outstanding debts" is used, and this possibly may have a wider meaning than "outstanding book debts." It appears, however, to their Lordships that the fixed premium of £1,250, which Corlett was to pay to Martienssen, cannot be regarded as an outstanding debt of the same class as those left open to adjustment. It was included in the general words of the conveyance "all rights appertaining to the leases and options of purchase," and was part of the non-fluctuating property taken over, and was not included in the fluctuating assets left open to future adjustment.

Shortly after the conveyance of 4th April, 1899, viz., on the 8th April, Martienssen granted Corlett a lease of the Princess Royal hotel and a few days later Corlett paid him £400 cash on account of the £1,250 premium, and gave him promissory notes for £850 in payment of the balance.

In May, 1899, the Company and Martienssen were desirous of expediting the completion of their purchase in order to prevent any breach in the continuity of the business taken over by the Company. Mr. Chidell on behalf of the Company, and Mr. Hodgson on behalf of Martienssen, met to adjust the stock-in-trade and outstanding debts.

A list was prepared by Hodgson, and Corlett's premium of £850 was inserted in it, and Chidell, misunderstanding the state of affairs, wrote Martienssen's name against this entry in order to indicate that the Company would not take this sum over. The consequence was that this sum was omitted from the schedules annexed to the formal agreement of 16th June, 1899, signed by Chidell for the Company, and by another gentleman for Martienssen, and specifying what outstanding debts and loans were to be taken over by the Company, and what was to be paid for them.

This mode of dealing with the premium has created the difficulty which has led to this litigation. The final adjustment was made on the footing of the agreement of the 16th June, 1899. The defendants contend that the Company rejected this item of £850, and are now trying to obtain the premium without paying for it. The Company contend that there was a manifest blunder in putting this premium into the list of items requiring adjustment, and that the blunder ought not to have the effect of depriving the Company of their right to the premium. The first view commended itself to the Supreme Court in the Colony, but their Lordships are unable to adopt it.

The evidence of Chidell and Hodgson satisfies their Lordships that both parties made a mistake in treating the unpaid balance of Corlett's premium as an outstanding debt with which they had to deal. In their Lordships' view they had nothing to do with it. The premium of £1,250 would properly appear in a list of the Company's assets; but the unpaid balance of £850 had no place in a list of the items left for adjustment. It was properly left out of the schedules to the agreement of the 16th June, 1899, although Chidell's reasons for leaving it out were attributable to the mistake already noticed. The mistake was a mutual mistake and does not affect the rights of the parties under the conveyance of 4th April, 1899.

It only remains to consider what ought now to be done. The premium passed by the conveyance, but Martienssen never received more than £400 on account of it. The balance, as already stated, was secured by promissory notes. It is stated in the appellants' case that in the middle of 1900 Martienssen brought an action against Corlett on these notes, and that the action stood over to enable Corlett to recover the amount from one Gourlay, to whom he had assigned the lease. The respondent states in his case that Corlett recovered judgment against Gourlay for £750, and Martienssen claimed this and it was paid into Court. Martienssen has since died, and the respondent is his executor. Their Lordships have no further information about the unpaid balance of the premium in question in these proceedings. All, therefore, that their Lordships can do is humbly to advise His Majesty to allow the Appeal and to reverse the judgment of the Supreme Court, so far as it relates to this premium of £1,250, and to order the defendant to pay the costs of the action up to and including the trial thereof, as far as it relates to this premium, and there must be the usual set off of costs; and to declare that under and by virtue of the conveyance of the 4th April, 1899, Martienssen became a trustee for the Company of the premium of £1,250, payable by Corlett under his lease of the 8th April, 1899, and became accountable to the plaintiff Company for all sums received in respect of such premium and of interest thereon as and when received by him, and with this declaration to remit the action to the Supreme Court, with liberty to both parties to make such application to that Court or to take such other proceedings as they may be advised.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly give this advice to His Majesty, and the respondent must pay the costs of this Appeal.

Judgment of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on the Petition of the Attorney-General for the Cape of Good Hope for special leave to appeal to His Majesty in Council in the matter of Rex v. Lowe, from the Supreme Court of the Cape of Good Hope; delivered the 8th June 1904.

Present:

The Lord Chancellor.
Lord Macnaghten.
Lord Davey.
Lord Robertson.
Sir Arthur Wilson.

[Delivered by the Lord Chancellor.]

Their lordships are of opinion that this is not a case in which there should be leave to appeal.

Their Lordships are asked, in the exercise of their constitutional function, to advise His Majesty, under the terms of Section 51 of the Charter of Justice for the Colony, to admit an appeal from a "judgment or determination" of the Supreme Court with a view to the same being reversed, corrected, or varied. There has, however, been no "judgment or determination" in this case which can be, or which indeed is sought to be, either reversed, corrected, or varied. It is admitted by the petitioner that the judgment of the Supreme Court is to stand, and the object of the petition is to have an abstract point of law which did not arise in the case, and never ought to have been reserved at all, determined now by way of appeal. It would be extremely inconvenient, and wholly unprecedented, to pick out of a trial some observation of the learned Judge, and to ask to have an appeal upon it, although the facts at the trial, and the determination of the trial, did not raise the question at all.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise His Majesty that the petition ought to be dismissed.

CASES DECIDED IN THE SUPREME COURT, CAPE COLONY.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE]

P. J. PIENAAR, JUN., v. { 1901.
ESTATE SLUITER. July 1st.
MARTHA M. PIENAAR v. { .. 2nd.
ESTATE SLUITER.

Cattle—Illegal sale by messenger.

For the purposes of trial, these actions were consolidated. Already two actions, brought by the Pienaar family—P. J. Pienaar, sen., and his brother, who belong to the Colesberg district—against the estate of the late Herman van Leonen Sluiter, had been disposed of. In the present action the plaintiffs were Petrus Jacobus Pienaar's son and daughter—Petrus Jacobus and Martha Maria—and the defendants, as before, were the Board of Executors, Cape Town, in their capacity of executors testamentary in the estate Sluiter.

The declarations in the respective actions set out that in February, 1900, and at all times material to the action, the two plaintiffs were joint and equal owners of certain thirty-eight head of cattle, then pastured on the farm Droogrequest, district of Colesberg. Plaintiffs' father left the Colony on the 28th February, 1900, and did not return until April, 1901. On leaving he placed the said cattle in the charge of one Fortuin Erens, a native herd, by whom the cattle were shortly afterwards removed to the adjoining farm, Groenfontein, by reason of scarcity of water at Droogrequest. Thereafter, in September, 1900, plaintiffs' mother, Susannah Maria Pienaar, sold six of the cattle to one S. Smit for £40. Thereafter the defendants or their agents wrongfully demanded from plaintiffs' mother the said sum, representing to her that the said six head of cattle so sold by her were the property of the said Sluiter. Plaintiffs and their mother were misled and intimidated by the said demand, and, in the absence of the father, the mother paid to the defendants, on behalf of the plaintiffs, the said sum of £40. The payment was made by the plaintiffs' mother through her agent, one Norval Hobkirk. In September or October, 1900, defendants unlawfully took possession of the remainder of the said cattle, to wit, thirty-two, then pastured on the farm Groenfontein, and removed the same to the farm Modderfontein, had then sold by public auction as an asset in the estate of Sluiter, and had retained the proceeds of the sale. The plaintiffs, in their respective declarations, prayed for judgment in the sum of £20 each, on account of the payment made by their mother of £40 to the defendants; the sum of £192 each, the value of the plaintiffs' shares in the said thirty-two head of cattle; interest a tempore moræ; alternative relief; costs of suit. An additional claim was made Jacobus, in respect of a brown pony, which was his property. This animal, was wrongfully taken possession of by the defendants or their agents, and had been sold to some person unknown, and the proceeds of the sale had been retained by the defendants. Plaintiff prayed for delivery of the said pony or, alternatively, the said sum of £20, the value thereof.

The defendants, in their plea, said that they did not know whether the plaintiffs owned any cattle; they admitted that plaintiffs' father was absent from the Colony between 1900 and 1901; they had no knowledge of the alleged handing over of cattle to Fortuin Erens; they admitted the sale to Smit for £40 by plaintiffs' mother of the six cattle in question, but said that the cattle belonged to the estate of Sluiter; they admitted having demanded the £40 and having received it, but denied having acted wrongfully; they admitted taking possession of thirty-two head of cattle on Groenfontein and selling them, but said that the cattle belonged to the estate Sluiter; they denied the allegation as to taking possession of and sell a horse belonging to the plaintiff, P. J. Pienaar, jun.; and they prayed, in each of their pleas, that the claim may be dismissed with costs.

The replication was general.

Mr. Graham, K.C. (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) for plaintiffs; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner) for defendants.

Petrus Jacobus Pienaar, of Colesberg, said he was the father of the two plaintiffs in this case. On the 28th February, 1900, he left for the Transvaal, returning in March or April, 1901. He was sentenced to twelve months' imprisonment for trading with the Boers. Sluiter was also concerned in the sale of stock to the Boers, but he died before proceedings could be taken against him. Witness farmed at Droogrequest. He had three children—Martha (23), Petrus Jacobus (21), and a minor. He knew the cattle he was claiming for his children. His daughter got a heifer from her uncle on her birthday; his son got a mare and a heifer from witness's father. Witness exchanged the mare for a heifer. The herd witness was now claiming for his children was raised from the three heifers he had described. It had been his habit to sell any oxen that were bred, and replace them with heifers. Witness had had a separate mark for the cattle of his son and daughter. In 1894, however, he had all the cattle dealt with by one mark. His son and daughter had thirty-eight cattle when witness left for the Transvaal. He handed them over to Fortuin Erens, a boy, who was working for Mr. Sluiter. He also handed over Mr. Sluiter's stock to the boy, who was at Droogrequest. Fortuin stayed at Colesberg, and had been in the employ of Mr. Sluiter for some years. It was arranged between witness and Mr. Sluiter that the cattle should be handed over in this way. Witness bought a dark chestnut pony from Mr. Kemper at Colesberg for the partnership account. He handed Kemper a good-for for £4. Witness kept the pony in his stable for a few days, and then he went out to Modderfontein, one of the farms he managed for Mr. Sluiter. He found that all the riding horses on the farm had been taken by the Imperial forces, and he said he would send one of his son's riding horses to the farm, and give him the chestnut pony. The pony was in poor condition. Mr. Sluiter consented to this arrangement. The riding horse, a brown gelding, was worth £20. This took place in February, 1900, about a fortnight before he left for the Transvaal.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He knew that his son had been charged with the theft of the pony. Witness was not present at the trial. His son stated at the trial that his father had promised him a pony when he was commandeered by the Boers. Witness in February, 1900, owed his son two horses. He had sold one to another man, and he had sent the other over to Modderfontein. The cattle belonging to his children in December, 1898, numbered thirty or forty head. His intention had been to equally divide the stock between his two children. His daughter bought a piano for £75 in December, 1898. Witness paid for the instrument out of the proceeds of cattle sales. The £75 was the daughter's half share of the proceeds; the son's share he invested in other heifers. Witness had a bad time during his farming life. His oxen became diseased. When witness surrendered his estate he had only four oxen, three cows, and two calves. He had lost heavily by disease amongst his cattle and by drought.

Re-examined: As far as he knew, his creditors had received 20s. in the £, with interest. If the Board of Executors had not been paid, they would be paid.

By the Court: The money in discharge of his debts was to be paid by Dirk Sluiter, who had bought the farm Droogrequest.

Fortuin Erens, now in the employ of P. J. Pienaar, said that during the war he was in Mr. Sluiter's employ. Mr. Pienaar handed to him some cattle belonging to himself and the late Mr. Sluiter. He also spoke to the sale of the cows to Smith. He said that the riding horse in question was brought to the farm Modderfontein. Witness heard that the horse afterwards died at Groenfontein.

Johannes Jacobus Petrus Luttig stated that he had received furniture from Droogrequest, and also cattle after Mr. Pienaar fled to the Transvaal. Some of the cows belonged to Mr. Pienaar's children.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He knew the children's cattle by their distinctive mark. The last time he saw the cattle previous to 1900 was 1895. When he left the farm in 1895 he could not say how many cattle the children had. Rinderpest was very bad in 1897, but although he was only two hours from Droogrequest he could not say if it was very bad there. He was present at the sale, but he did not raise any protest.

Adam Norval Hopkirk stated he was a farmer, near Colesberg, and knew Mr. Pienaar, sen., prior to his insolvency. He had often been to the farm Droogrequest. He saw several cattle there which belonged to Mr. Pienaar's children.

By the Court: He knew they belonged to the children, because he made inquiries. He was present at a sale of cows during the war, and while Mr. Pienaar was in the Transvaal the mother of the plaintiff sold the cows to Mr. Smidt. Witness was to receive the money and to deliver the cows at the farm Grootefontein. There were three cows, which were sold for £40. One of the cows was one that he had seen on the farm Droogrequest, and which belonged to the children. Each of the cows had a calf. Witness handed the money to Mrs. Pienaar, and subsequently he handed it to Mr. Hofman, who was bookkeeper to the Board of Executors. That was a few days after he gave Mrs. Pienaar the money. He advised her to hand it back. Mr. Hofman told Mrs. Pienaar that if she did not hand the money back he would make further investigations into the matter. She refused to do so, but eventually witness persuaded her to do so. Witness was present at the Modderfontein sale, and saw some of the cattle, the property of the children, being sold. When Mr. Pienaar returned, witness told him what had occurred. Witness lent the money to Mr. Pienaar to purchase a piano for Miss Pienaar. He paid it back in small instalments. Witness knew that Mr. Pienaar purchased cattle for his children prior to his insolvency.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: Witness stated he made a statement to defendant's attorney, in which he stated that Mrs. Pienaar said the cattle belonged to her husband. He meant they belonged to the children. He told the attorney that he advised Mrs. Pienaar to return the money and wait until Mr. Pienaar came back, when he could recover it from the estate. It was prior to 1897 that Mr. Pienaar purchased the cattle for his children. Witness was engaged to Miss Pienaar, but it was broken off before the war.

William Ernest Gordon Davis, examined, stated he was an attorney, and resided at Colesberg. Mr. Pienaar and Mr. Sluiter were on very friendly terms. Witness was appointed trustee in the insolvent estate of Mr. Pienaar, sen. All the cattle taken up to Modderfontein were sold. Mr. Pienaar consulted witness about the case.

P. J. Pienaar, jun., in reply to Mr. Graham, stated he was 21 years of age, and was still at Bloemfontein College. He and his sister owned cattle, which were running on Droogrequest. Witness did not take any interest in January. At the outbreak of the war he and his sister had about 30 or 40 cattle between them. They had them after his father's insolvency. All the cattle were at Droogrequest when they went to the Transvaal. Witness was on commando about three weeks.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: Witness said his cattle were marked, so were his sister's.

Jaanje, a servant boy in the employment of the late Mr. Sluiter, stated he had charge of the cattle, and ten of them belonged to Mr. Pienaar's children. At the time Sluiter's cattle were sold, they were mixed up with them.

Givcet Waterboor, a shepherd in the employ of the plaintiff, stated he went to the Transvaal with his master, and remained with him to the end of the war. His master had 38 head of cattle grazing with Sluiter's.

In reply to Sir Henry Juta, witness stated he could not count. His master told him there were 38 cattle belonging to the "young baas." He could not say how many of these Miss Pienaar owned. The plaintiff had no cattle. During the rinderpest, a number of the cattle died.

Pieter Jacobus Pienaar, jun., cousin to plaintiff, stated he went to live at Droogrequest about three years before the war, which was prior to Mr. Pienaar's insolvency. He saw the cattle on the farm before he and Mr. Pienaar went to the Transvaal.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: The cattle belonged to the Pienaar juniors. There were between 30 and 40 before the war.

Miss Pienaar, one of the plaintiffs, stated she was living at Droogrequest up to the outbreak of the war. She and her brother had cattle there. Her father had charge of them. She believed they were on the farm after his insolvency. Witness's father bought a piano for her. The money for it was derived from the sale of her cattle at Malmesbury.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: She did not know how many cattle were sold at Malmesbury. She did not know the value of cattle.

Re-examined by Mr. Graham: Witness had been at a boarding school for a considerable time, and consequently did not know much about farming.

Mr. Graham closed his case.

James Edward Bradfield stated he had a list of the prices of stock sold at Modderfontein, and the average price was between £9 5s. and £9 10s.

Karl Clements stated he was an auctioneer, and sold the stock at Modderfontein. He advertised it extensively. No objection was raised to the sale of stock.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: All sorts of stock were sold. Cows in calf were sold at £13 each. This was during martial law, when it was difficult to get permits. Mrs. Pienaar would have had difficulty in doing so. Witness was bookkeeper to the late Mr. Sluiter for fourteen years. Mr. Pienaar and Mr. Sluiter were on very good terms. Witness could not identify the cattle sold at Modderfontein.

Sir H. Juta closed his case, and counsel were heard in argument on the facts.

Cur. Adv. Vult.
Postea (July 2nd.

Kotzé, J., said that he thought that the Board of Executors had acted wisely in putting the plaintiffs to the proof of their claim. The plaintiffs had accordingly come into Court and submitted evidence in support of their claim for the value of certain 32 head of cattle, which they say belong to them, and were sold in the estate of the late Mr. Sluiter, and for the return of £40, being the price of certain six head of cattle sold, which were claimed by the estate of Sluiter, and for the value of a certain house, put down at the sum of £20. Looking at the case as a whole, he thought that his judgment ought to be for the plaintiffs. Had the evidence of Mr. Pienaar, sen., the father of the two plaintiffs, stood alone, it would not have been altogether satisfactory to his mind, because they had the very important circumstance that when he surrendered his estate in August, 1899, he said that he only had four oxen and three cows remaining, and that forty out of seventy head of cattle had died on account of rinderpest and lung-sickness. It seemed somewhat strange that the stock of the two plaintiffs should have increased to the number of 38 about the year 1899, and should have escaped the ravages of rinderpest and lung-sickness, and, therefore, if that evidence of Mr. Pienaar stood alone, he should have been very slow in acting upon it. But his evidence was confirmed materially by other witnesses. The father had stated that he left for the Transvaal in 1900, and before he left he called Fortuin Erens to the farm Droogrequest, and handed over to him 38 head of cattle, and stated that these 38 belonged to his children. Mr. Pienaar also says that he informed Mr. Sluiter of the fact. Fortuin Erens, although he personally had no knowledge whatever as to whether the children had cattle of their own, and how they were marked, said that Pienaar told him that the cattle belonged to the children. It had been said that Fortuin Erens's statement was not reliable, because he made two contradictory statements, but I accept his evidence, because, if he came to bolster up a statement of Mr. Pienaar, the father, he would not have made the statement that Mr. Slater told him that the cattle belonged to him. There is also the evidence of Mr. Luttig, which shows that Mr. Sluiter was anxious to protect Pienaar's property in his absence in the Transvaal, and of Mr. Hobkerk, who said that he was aware that the cattle on Droogrequest belonged to the children, and he was also positive that some of the cattle was sold at the sale at Modderfontein. I can see no reason to doubt the evidence for the plaintiffs, and the Court must give judgment for them. Taking the average of £9 10s.

from the venous roll, the plaintiffs would be entitled to £304, together with the sum of £40, the value of the six head of cattle, and £11 to the male plaintiff, being the sworn value of the pony. Although the executors have acted wisely in putting the plaintiffs to the proof of their claim, I am not prepared to say that this is a case where the plaintiffs should be wholly deprived of their costs, and under the circumstances of the case, the plaintiffs will be entitled to their costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

MAISEL BROS. V. ARONSTAIN. { 1904.
{ July 1st.

Foreign Company—Jurisdiction.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved to have a certain interdict discharged.

Mr. Alexander appeared on behalf of the respondent to oppose.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

Hopley, J.: The applicant in this case is either manager or sole managing director of a certain alleged company, Maisel Bros. and Co., Ltd., registered, it is said, under the Imperial Acts, but certainly not registered or domiciled in this colony. He has been for a very short time residing in this country, and certainly he has not established himself in a firm way of business, so as to make it possible to say that he has an established business in this country. He has not been here long, and during that time he has become involved with the present respondent in an action against him. I have been looking at the pleadings to a limited extent, and I gather that while the plaintiff sues both Maisel and the company, after getting leave to sue them by edictal citation, the defendant's plea is that he never dealt on his own behalf, but on behalf of the company. This company is really a foreign company. The only question is whether the Court has jurisdiction over the company, without attaching some goods. I don't know that everything was set before the Judge in Chambers in the first instance, but I do not think any important material was left out. The fact that there was this partnership was before him, and the allegation was that it was a foreign company, and that the man who represented the company was a person of uncertain domicile. I do not think that I should accede to the present application, because more facts may come out at the trial, and moreover, I do not think that any inconvenience will result to the parties from maintaining the order. Of course, if the plaintiff was such a person as the present applicant would like to make out, he might make away with the property; but in the hands of the bank there can be no particular harm to the present applicant. The application will be refused with costs; but the matter should be brought to a conclusion without further delay, and the applicant will be ordered to file his rejoinder forthwith, so that the plaintiff may set down the case for trial this term.

IRWIN V. THOMSON.

Mr. P. Jones moved for leave to attach certain furniture, or the proceeds of a certain sale, in order to found jurisdiction on a debt for £36 6s. 1d. and £10 13s.

Rule nisi restraining the Cape Auctions Company, or any other persons, into whose hands it might come, from parting with the proceeds of the sale of the furniture of the respondent pending an action to be forthwith instituted by the applicant against William Thomson, with leave to sue by edictal citation, personal service to be effected, the process returnable on the 1st August.

FINDLAY AND CO. V. HEMPELL.

This was an action to recover £33 2s. 10d. and £12 16s., for goods sold and delivered and for work and labour done. The matter had been postponed, in view of a settlement. The settlement had not been effected.

Mr. Close for plaintiffs; Defendant in default.

Charles Ernest Dunnott, manager of the hardware department of Messrs. Findlay and Co. deposed that the defendant arranged for certain goods to be sent out to the electric light works at Claremont. The firm was merely to supply the panneling, but when witness heard that the defendant had not properly fixed up the work, witness went out and had it done through a sub-contractor.

Judgment was granted as prayed.

MCKENZIE V. TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD.	{	1904.
		July 4th.
		" 5th.
		Aug. 29th.

Dock agent—Purchase of plant by Harbour Board.

This was an action brought by A. R. McKenzie, of Cape Town, against the Table Bay Harbour Board, to recover certain sums alleged to be due on the transfer of the landing and delivery business at the Docks from the plaintiff to the Board.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff was, at the dates hereinafter mentioned, carrying on the business of a dock agent and of landing, shipping, and delivering cargo at the Alfred Docks, Cape Town. The defendant is the Table Bay Harbour Board.

2. Prior to and in the month of October, 1901, the defendant resolved to take over and perform all the duties of dock agents and the landing, shipping, and delivery of cargo at the Docks, Cape Town, and it was agreed between the parties that the defendant would buy and the plaintiff sell the whole of the plaintiff's plant, including that which was already landed and in use in this colony, that which was on indent and that which was in course of construction, and the parties agreed that the plant already landed and in use should be paid for at a valuation, and that the plant on indent and in course of construction should be paid for on arrival here and on completion. An inventory of the plant landed and in use was drawn up and the defendant paid the plaintiff therefor.

3. There were at the said time two road locomotives on indent and five Colonial box trailers in course of construction. The said locomotives have been landed and delivered, the trailers have been constructed and delivered all to defendant. The price of the former is £1,831 4s. 5d., and of the latter £362 10s. or £2,193 14s. 5d. in all.

4. At the aforementioned date the plaintiff was engaged in the landing and delivery of certain cargoes, and the plaintiff proposed that he should be allowed to complete the said deliveries in order to facilitate the delivery and the adjustment of claims by consignees and others in respect thereto, but the defendant refused the said offer, and thereupon it was agreed between the parties that on and from the 14th of October, 1901, the plaintiff should cease to act as dock agent and to land and deliver goods, and that the defendant should take over and perform the same, and that the defendant should become responsible for all liabilities in connection with cargo for which the plaintiff had been appointed dock agent, and in regard to which the plaintiff had already had the handling, whether the same had been partially delivered by the plaintiff and completed by the defendant or otherwise.

5. Liabilities to the extent of £3,544 7s. 4d. have been incurred and paid by the plaintiff in respect of the matters set forth in paragraph 4 hereof, and under and by virtue of the agreement in the said paragraph set forth the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for the amount thereof (copy of particulars thereof is hereunto annexed). Of this amount the defendant has admitted liability for £684 6s. 2d., but has not paid same.

6. All things have happened, all times have elapsed, and all conditions have been fulfilled entitling the plaintiff to the two sums of £2,193 14s. 5d. and £3,544 7s. 4d.; but the defendant, though requested so to do, refuses to pay the same or any part thereof.

Wherefore, the plaintiff claims: (a) Payment of the two sums of £2,193 14s. 5d. and £3,544 7s. 4d., with interest a tempore morae. (b) Alternative relief. (c) Costs of suit.

The defendant's plea was:

1. The defendant admits paragraph 1 of the declaration.

2. On the 13th October, 1901, the defendant took in hand the landing, shipping, and delivery of cargo at the Docks, Cape Town, and with that object in view agreed with the plaintiff to purchase and take over, and did purchase and take over, all the horses, mules, harnesses, wagons, carts, buggies, trailers, traction engines, donkey engines, tugs, lighters, machinery, tarpaulins, coal bags, and all other plant and articles used by him in connection with his business as a dock agent, and a deed of submission to arbitration was executed between the parties to determine the price to be paid by the defendant.

3. The price was so determined and paid and included a sum of £362 10s. for certain Colonial box trailers, which include the box trailers referred to in paragraph 3 of the declaration.

4. As to the two road locomotives referred to in the said paragraph, they were never taken over or purchased by the Harbour Board, and the Board does not intend to purchase them. An offer was made in July, 1903, to purchase them, but the offer was not accepted and is no longer open.

5. Save as aforesaid the defendant denies the allegations in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the declaration.

6. Up to and including the 12th October the plaintiff was engaged in the landing and delivering of cargoes, and the plaintiff proposed that he should be allowed to complete the said deliveries in order to facilitate the delivery and the adjustment of claims by consignees and others in respect thereto, but the defendant refused the said offer.

7. Save as aforesaid the defendant does not admit the allegations in paragraph 4, and says that no agreement was entered into in the terms therein alleged; and the defendant specially denies that any contract such as is contemplated by the Act No. 36 of 1896, section 30, sub-section (c) was entered into relative to the matters alleged in that paragraph so as legally to bind the Board, which has no power to contract save in so far as it is authorised by the said Act.

8. The Board was willing after refusing the plaintiff's offer, referred to in paragraph 6, to accept responsibility and answer claims for any loss or damage to goods landed from certain ships, the discharge of which the plaintiff had commenced before the 15th October, 1901, and subsequently the Board completed on or after the 15th October, 1901, in so far as such loss or damage was found to be not caused during the time when the plaintiff was effecting discharge, and in so far as the amount of such loss or damage should be reported and recommended for payment to the Board by one J. E. P. Close, to whom the Board entrusted the inquiry as to the amount, if any, to be paid to the plaintiff in respect of such claims for loss or damage which he might be called upon to pay and might have paid.

9. The said Close instituted and held a full and comprehensive inquiry into various claims against the Board or the plaintiff made by sundry merchants, including all such claims as aforesaid which were advanced or communicated by the plaintiff or on his behalf and including all the claims amounting to £4,628 16s. 4d., now claimed in the declaration, and the said Close thereafter reported to the Board and recommended that the Board should accept liability to a certain extent in respect of certain of the said claims, and should pay to the plaintiff the sum of £684 6s. 2d., which amount the defendant tenders to pay together with taxed costs to this date. The plaintiff has had full particulars of the details comprising the sum of £684 6s. 2d.

11. Save as aforesaid the defendant denies the allegations in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the declaration, specially denying that the plaintiff has incurred or paid liabilities to the extent alleged, and specially denying that the Board agreed at any time to pay to the plaintiff such sums as he might pay to claimants, or any sum other than those for which the Board after inquiry as aforesaid accepted the responsibility.

Wherefore the defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. W. P. Buchanan), for the plaintiff. Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Sutton), for defendant.

Sir H. Juta said that, in the replication, exception was taken to such of the paragraphs in the plea as referred to a report and recommendation of one J. E. P. Close, on the ground that the references were embarrassing, irrelevant, and bad in law. There was no allegation that it was an agreement between the Board and the plaintiff, that they on the plaintiff's side were bound by anything that Mr. Close reported or recommended. There was no allegation of any such contract or agreement, consequently what the Board may have done or may have been willing to do in regard to Mr. Close's report could affect the plaintiff. He therefore submitted that the report and recommendation were not relevant to the case, and could not be brought in in order to try and fix the plaintiff with any liability.

Mr. Schreiner said that his learned friend was quite right in saying that they (the defendants) did not admit the alleged agreement, which was set out in paragraph 4 of the declaration; they wholly denied that agreement, and said there was no such agreement. There was a sum of £684 that the Board were willing to pay to McKenzie, and had been willing to pay as a result of Mr. Close's investigation into the measure of liability which the Board should accept and recognise in relation to certain goods. It was not a tender upon the plaintiff's agreement at all; but simply a tender of the sum which the Board were advised by Mr. Close they should pay to certain persons who had claims upon Mr. McKenzie. He thought it would be quite premature until his lordship had heard the evidence to decide whether the report of Mr. Close was embarrassing.

Sir H. Juta having been heard in reply.

Hopley, J. said that he did not think that any embarrassment arose in the matter, and the exception could not be upheld.

Evidence was then called.

Andrew R. McKenzie (the plaintiff) said that in 1901 he was carrying on business as landing, shipping, and delivery agent in Cape Town. The Harbour Board determined to take over the work. He had several interviews with the Board in regard to the matter, and finally the Board intimated that they would take over such portion of his plant as they thought would be suitable for the work. Mr. Wiener was chairman of the Board at that time. Mr. Wiener said that they would take over everything the plaintiff had connected with the dock work, both on the land, water, under indent, and what they were finishing at their different places; and what they (the Board) did not require, they would dispose of, so as to relieve plaintiff. "They were giving us," said Mr. McKenzie, "nothing for the goodwill of the business, which I had carried on for thirty odd years." Mr. Wiener, as the mouthpiece of the Board, made this communication to him after the Board had deliberated in private. Witness had six locomotives under indent; the engines commenced arriving in the latter part of October, 1901, and went on each month. He used one of the locomotives himself, the Board took one for use, and they had others about the Docks lying for use. In July, 1903, there were three engines at the Docks, and one in his (witness's) yard. He subsequently received an offer from the General Manager for certain engines lying at the Docks. Witness told Mr. Mellish (representing the Board) that they could have the engines; the Board ultimately agreed to take a 10-h.p. engine and a 6-h.p. engine. He afterwards saw the General Manager about the cheque in 1903, and he asked Mr. Heenan to take over the other engines. Mr. Heenan said he had no money. The other engines had been lying at the Docks since they were landed, and were still there in their cases. The Board had debited witness with rent, but he had paid nothing. Witness had attempted to sell the engines, but he had not taken over liability. He treated the Board as gentlemen when he first went to them. The Board kicked him clean out of the Docks. The engines were under indent on the 28th May, 1901. Rather than come to law, he would have sold the engines at a reduction. Unfortunately, Municipal regulations were made in regard to the weight and use of the engines; the regulations prohibited the use of one of the engines which was fitted with a jib to enable her to remove packages at the Docks. Engines of that type were used in the town before the regulations came into force. As to the trailers in dispute, the arbitrators branded the box trailers just as they did other things. A man also went round on behalf of the Harbour Board, and painted the letters "T.B.H.B." on everything belonging to A. R. McKenzie and Co. that he could lay his hands on, no matter what it was or where it was. Witness had a contract with the Railway Department, and wagons used for that work came under the attention of the painter. The wagons had never been taken into account by the Harbour Board. Correspondence ensued, and two men went round and put on a third mark. There were five box trailers in construction at that time; these trailers had not been branded by the arbitrators. No receipts were given by the Harbour Board for anything that the arbitrators took over. On the 14th October, 1901, some of the ships had been partially discharged. The war was proceeding at the time, and the Docks were very congested and great confusion prevailed. Goods were moved to various places by the Board, and some were found six months afterwards. It was arranged at first that witness's firm should work till the end of December, and then all at once the Board decided to take over the work immediately, on Monday morning, the 14th October. When they left the business on Saturday night, they left everything just in the same position as if they themselves had been continuing on Monday morning, instead of the Harbour Board. They had a claim from Mr. Wiener; this was compromised. He had settled with Mr. Wiener for the amounts he was now claiming. The usual practice when he was with the Harbour Board was that when potatoes were condemned by the Harbour Board officials, they had them put into a lighter, taken into sea, and thrown overboard. The claim of Philip Bros. for £684 was exactly on all fours with all the rest.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: His current arrangement at the beginning was that it might terminate annually at the end of the 31st December. On the 24th August the Board, by a majority of one, decided to work the cartage department. The Harbour Board, through Mr. Wiener, said that they agreed to take over all the goods under indent and all the plant coming forward. He denied it point-blank that Mr. Wiener said that they would take it over if it were suitable. He had tried himself to sell the engines, and he never tried to make the Board pay for the storage of the plant. He would not swear that there were not ten or twelve trailers under construction for the Board. He never had a single claim against the Board; it was plant right through. He was bound to pay Strasburger the greater part of the £1,000 claimed. Witness signed the deeds of arbitration. A lot of things that were not in the arbitration award were painted. The box trailers in course of construction were not stamped. Witness met a full meeting of the Harbour Board early in October. Other dock agents were present. The meeting was called to decide what would be done with the goods at the Docks.

Re-examined: When approached by the Harbour Board to retire, witness refused to do so. None of the goods that were dumped down in the store were removed after the 14th October.

L. Wiener stated that at the time of the negotiations with Mr. McKenzie, he was chairman of the Harbour Board. Mr. Underwood was superintendent. There were several meetings between the Board and the dock agents. At one meeting in October, the General Manager of the Harbour Board gave a list of certain plant they would take over. The dock agents wanted it all taken over. As a decision could not be arrived at, the agents were asked to retire, and the Board decided, after discussing the matter, to take over all the plant at a valuation that would be arrived at. They were then called in, and the matter agreed to. The agreement was reduced to writing and signed. McKenzie mentioned that he had some material on order, and said he was being treated rather badly. The question as to the delivery of goods by the Harbour Board was then discussed.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He thought it was the bounden duty of the Board under the agreement to take over all goods ordered by Mr. McKenzie prior to the Board taking the work over. Witness was chairman of the Harbour Board meeting the day the dock agents attended the meeting. As a result of that meeting, arbitrators were appointed. If the minutes stated that the agents withdrew, and did not return, it was not correct.

Mr. Schreiner: How can you, as chairman of that meeting, sign the minutes when you knew that they were not correct? Is that business?

Witness: What was done was business. Continuing, a document was drawn up, and the terms were agreed to. Witness was not quite clear as to whether the document was drawn up at the meeting or not. No stock was taken before the things were taken over. Witness did not take any steps to have that done. It was the duty of the officials of the Harbour Board to do so. The work at the Docks at the time was in a state of chaos. The decision of the Board to take over the work was rushed against the wishes of a few members of the Board.

The course of action in those days was that the Port Captain rushed a ship into the Docks. He felt sorry for the ship's captain, and rushed all the cargo off and rushed the ship out again. In order to manage delivery, the agents had to get more plant. Goods in hospital meant goods that were damaged or "sick." Witness knew nothing about the advertisement that appeared in the newspapers. The proposal that McKenzie should finish the vessels discharging was never acted on. Witness did not agree to be responsible for all liabilities in which the plaintiff was concerned, but the sequence would be that.

Re-examined: That would be the sequence, because at a moment's notice the Board undertook the delivery of thousands of packages, and how could they prove their non-liability? Witness sent in a claim to McKenzie for shortage of delivery of goods. The account had been settled between them.

To the Court: If it was proved that plaintiff had overpaid witness, he would be glad to refund it.

Joseph William Herbert stated he was a member of the Harbour Board in 1901. He recollected the meeting between the members of the Harbour Board and the dock agents. The former, first of all, offered to take over the plant belonging to the agents. The agents left the room, and were called back, and the final conclusion was that the Harbour Board would take over all the plant landed and on the water, and also that indented for. Witness was quite clear on that point. Witness did not recollect a meeting of the Finance Committee, when it was decided to take over from McKenzie the material for dock work only. The Board had to satisfy itself that the goods were on indent at the time the work was taken over. The state of things at the Docks at that time were chaotic. Witness computed that there were 30,000 tons of goods to be delivered. Hundreds of tons of material were stolen. Witness lost 400 bales of hay in one night. The military just took everything they wished at the time. Mr. Underwood consequently had a difficult task. It was decided at a meeting of the Board to leave everything in his hands, as he came out as an expert. Underwood undertook to deliver all the goods on McKenzie's account. The minutes did not account for what was done.

[Hopley, J.: How is that?]

I believe it was caused through pressure of work. We had meetings of the Board nearly every day.

[Hopley, J.: That is all the more reason why you should have proper minutes.]

The agreement was that the Board should deliver all cargo prior to October 14, on account of the agent, and accept all claims. The Board had paid numbers of claims since.

[Hopley, J.: On what principle did you accept responsibility for other people's negligence?]

That I can't say. The Board did very many foolish things. The majority of McKenzie's staff were taken over by the Board.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness went over the minutes to ascertain a certain letter written from Mr. Robb to Underwood. Witness looked over them cursorily to freshen his memory. Witness was a member of the Finance Committee. Witness objected to the Board taking over the work. Had they complied with his wishes, they would have been better off, as subsequent results showed. It may have startled witness to hear that stock had not been taken, but did not injure his health. He had not then got over the effects of the Harbour Board taking over the work. He thought Mr. Underwood would have made every arrangement. Witness was aware that the military had control of the Docks at the time. Mr. Underwood could not have stopped them working to take stock. Witness lost the hay in 1902, which was after the Board took over the work. The loss of goods was worse after the Board took the delivery over. There was theft during McKenzie's time, but it was not very great. Anterior to the Board taking over the work, they would not have returns of the missing goods. The organisation of the Docks was worse after the Harbour Board took up the work.

Re-examined: He did not know of the letter until it was read to him by Mr.

Reid. The goods on the water were to be taken by the Harbour Board at cost price, invoice price, not on valuation.

Warren B. Sexton, joint managing director of McKenzie and Co., Ltd., said that before the company was formed he looked after the claims department of Mr. McKenzie's business. After the Board took over, McKenzies continued to act as stevedores. When the Board took over, a large number of ships were partially discharged, others had been delivered, and some were lying at the docks. Witness went to Mr. Underwood to try to arrange about delivery of the rest of the goods. They had a considerable discussion. For McKenzie's, he proposed to finish what they had already begun, but Mr. Underwood thought that would lead to conflict, with two sets of men at the docks. He also made another proposition as regarded tallies, but Mr. Underwood said they would take over the whole lot, in fact, he did not want McKenzie's about the docks at all. The final result was that Mr. Underwood took the responsibility for all ships discharging, or to be discharged. Witness gave instructions for the whole of the tickets, records, and so on to be handed over to the Table Bay Harbour Board. They handed over to the Harbour Board everything that was necessary for the delivery of the goods. Witness told Mr. Underwood that it would be very difficult to adjust all the claims, and that it would be better that McKenzie's should finish what they had begun, but Mr. Underwood dissented, and said that the Harbour Board wanted to take all over. Witness afterwards saw the general manager, Mr. Heenan, and asked him to take over all the traction engines on hand. It seemed to be understood that whatever engines Mr. Heenan wanted he was entitled to take over at cost price; witness regarded them as part of the plant to be taken over by the Harbour Board. Mr. Heenan said that he would only take the lighter engines; he could not take the heavier ones, as they were too heavy for their purpose and against the city regulations. Witness simply understood that the Board would take them over at cost price as part of the arrangement. Mr. Heenan took over two engines.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: There were three engines in the docks at that time. He had not the details as to the arrival of the engines. He had not the indents in his possession. He did not know whether the big engine that was shipped by the S.S. Gascon was built according to specification of May 5, 1902. He could not say whether the specification was the indent. Witness did not tell Mr. Heenan that the Board were bound to take over the engines. Mr. McKenzie afterwards went and told Mr. Heenan that the Board were under an obligation to take the engines under indent. Witness was present at the time.

The engines were stacked at the Docks, and a rent had been charged. After the Board took over, McKenzies did not continue to deliver goods, as far as witness's knowledge went. He knew there was a conference between Mr. Close and Mr. Cowell (representing Mr. McKenzie), and that the claims were under investigation.

William Beattie said that in 1901 he was manager for McKenzie at the Docks, and he was now with McKenzie and Co., Limited. He remembered Mr. Underwood being at the Docks, and his taking over the whole working of the Docks on behalf of the Harbour Board. Mr. Underwood said that he would take the responsibility of the whole thing.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He knew nothing of the capabilities of the engines coming forward.

Henry Montgomery, in the employ of McKenzie and Co., when the Harbour Board took over the contract, said that he remembered the box trailers, some of which generally wanted repairing.

William Henry Cowell stated that the engines indented were ordered from London in connection with the carrying on of their business in the Docks. There was some trouble at the time of shipping the engines, but, ultimately, they were shipped after a deal of trouble.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He was certain that one of the engines arrived at the beginning of August, and the others at the end of August.

Sir Henry Juta said he would close his case subject to his being allowed at a later stage to call witnesses to prove details of claims.

This course was agreed to.

The first witness called for the defence was

J. W. Jagger, M.L.A., who stated that in 1901 he was a member of the Harbour Board. He took considerable interest in the changes that took place. He was present at the meeting of the Board when a resolution was adopted by a majority of one to take over the dock agents' duties. At that meeting the amount of plant to be taken over was not discussed. Mr. Underwood was selected by Mr. Hammersley-Heenan as traffic manager at the Docks, and brought out from England for that purpose. He commenced his duties not long before this time. A roving commission was not given to Mr. Underwood; everything he contemplated had to be submitted in writing to the Board. On the 9th September a proposal was received from plaintiff to sell his plant for £98,500, and on the 12th it was resolved to proceed to arbitration as to the plant that was to be taken over by the Board. The minutes recording the resolutions were absolutely correct.

Mr. Schreiner: At that time was an unrecorded communication made by Mr. Wiener, the chairman of the Harbour Board, to the dock agents, to the effect that all their plant under indent would be taken over?

Witness: I heard Mr. Wiener say so in the witness-box yesterday, and I believe he was quite conscientious in doing so; but he was absolutely wrong. At the meeting of the Finance Committee, it was never said by members that the Board should take over the plant on indent, because at that time the Board had already promised to take it over. There was no reservation in any shape or form. The Board never gave any pledge or considered itself pledged to take over the plant that was coming forward. If there had been any such pledge I would have remembered it. When matters like the one under consideration were brought under the notice of the Board, they were always taken on their merits. There was no such record in the minutes of such an agreement as that alleged by the plaintiff. It was never mentioned at any meetings of the Board that Mr. Underwood had made such an agreement on behalf of the Board. There was no reference in the minutes as to taking over the plant, or any reference to accept responsibility on behalf of the plaintiff. To do so would be against the general policy of the Board. Witness ceased to be a member of the Harbour Board in September, 1903. Witness remembered Mr. Close being appointed to investigate the scheme between Mr. McKenzie and the Board. If ships had been cleared and had left the Docks before the Harbour Board took over the work, they would certainly repudiate any claims that might be made against them.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: If McKenzie had refused to sell his plant it would be awkward for the Harbour Board. He only sold the plant he was using at the time. They required a lot more at the Docks. They took his offers into consideration, and used what they could of the plant that was coming forward. They did not want to take it all over, because they did not want to buy a pig in a poke. They could have seen what was coming out by consulting the indents. It took a considerable time to get plant out from England. Everything that was in use at the time had to be taken over. He could not say if they took over plant in course of construction. The Board did not go into details, that was left to their officials. He could not say if the Harbour Board under the agreement were to take over engines that were unpacked. Arrangements had to be made for dealing with cargo that was partly discharged or partly delivered up to the 14th October. That was left to the Board's officers. That decision was arrived at on October 4. The Board did not give Underwood a "free hand," but advised him to facilitate work as much as possible. Witness did not find in the minutes any report from Underwood consequent upon those instructions. He had a free hand as regarded details. They were not so anxious to get McKenzie out, as to get the new system into order. The Board made no arrangement with the Dock agents as to liability with regard to claims. He did not recollect it being discussed at the Board.

Sir H. Juta: Do you contradict the statement made by Mr. Wiener that McKenzie attended the meeting of the Harbour Board and discussed that point?

Witness: Certainly I do. Such an important matter as that would be put on the minutes.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: If there was any question as to the Board accepting liability, the secretary would have reported it to the Board.

Frank Robb stated he was secretary and Assistant General Manager of the Harbour Board. In 1901 he was only secretary. There were long discussions as to the advisability of the Board taking over the delivery work. It was eventually decided to do so. It had been the idea to have the delivery work done by a contractor, but none of the tenders received were satisfactory. McKenzie offered his plant for £98,500. On the 12th September, on the motion of Mr. Price, it was agreed to proceed to arbitration on the amount to be allowed for the plant. The Dock agents were present at a special meeting of the Board on the 13th. The minutes were carefully kept throughout. The chief clerk used to attend the meetings with witness, and take notes. He drafted out the minutes and copies of them were sent to the commissioners, who confirmed them at the next meeting. The arbitrators met, and witness wrote their findings to McKenzie, and McKenzie was paid out in full, in the following January. Witness did not offer any evidence with regard to the engines at the Docks, or the box-trailers. Pursuant to the arbitrators award they paid for seven box trailers in course of construction. He knew nothing about a claim for five new box trailers. On the 11th October he wrote to Underwood, and handed the letter to Sexton, but there was nothing in the letter excepting instructions with regard to vessels then discharging. In writing that letter he had no idea of conferring authority on Underwood in regard to goods landed or vessels partly discharged.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: There was a deal of discussion when the dock agents met the Board in September. The Board decided to take over what would be of service, but when the dock agents were present, the plaintiff objected, and said: "Well, gentlemen, if that's what you are going to do, I have nothing to sell you," and then it was ultimately decided to take over everything that the dock agents were using. There was no discussion about taking over plant in course of construction, but there was no minute authorising the valuator to value such. He was acting in the spirit of the resolution when he gave authority to include things in the course of construction. There was a letter from the plaintiff on the 18th October asking the Board if they would take over the plant that was coming forward. He did not know why Mr. Sexton should go to him and intimate that a traction-engine was coming forward. The Board was wanting plant, and they were extremely anxious to buy it if it were suitable. He could not say what use a dock agent could make of plant that he had specially ordered for dock work, if he were giving such work up. According to the minute of the 1st September, the plaintiff must have handed in invoices. Witness would not write a letter and say that the Board wished a certain thing done without the Board's authority, but when he wrote to Underwood on the 11th October, "the Board would be glad," etc., it was merely an expression of opinion. He could not say why, when Underwood wrote asking for authority, he did not refer him to the minute of the Board on the 4th October. McKenzie kept some of the plant for the Government contract. The Board took over all the plant for dock work.

How, if you had taken all the plant, could you expect these dock agents to go on delivering from the depositing stores?—They could have arranged with us, or they could have hired carts or used their own wagons, as McKenzie's did.

Robert Henry Hammersley-Heenan, general manager and engineer-in-chief of the Table Bay Harbour Board, said that he submitted a memorandum at the request of several private members of the Board on the question of taking over delivery. Mr. Underwood was the manager of the traffic department up to November, 1901, when witness was appointed general manager. Mr. Underwood resigned when he became aware of witness's appointment. Witness was present at the Board meeting at which the dock agents attended. The impression then conveyed to witness's mind was that it was the intention of the Board to take over all the dock agents' plant used legitimately in dock work. Witness acted as arbitrator in connection with all the engineering plants. It was never suggested to witness by McKenzie that the Board had to take over the engines due to arrive, but witness and his brother arbitrator agreed to take over duplicate parts of engines which were then ready for the use of the port. Nothing was said to witness from McKenzie's side as to engines being ordered which the Board would have to take over. It was not the case that any pressure was brought to bear on witness to take over these engines. He had no recollection of anything being said on the matter until the letter of the 24th July. The following day Mr. Sexton came to see witness, and said, "We have three engines in the Docks; we can't let you have the two you want; but we will let you have one, and another engine which we have running on the streets." Witness wanted two ten-horse-power engines, which were the biggest engines the Town Council would then permit to go on the streets. Mr. Sexton told him that the reason he could not have the two engines asked for was because one was already under offer. Eventually witness took one of these two engines, and secured another in town. A few days later Mr. Sexton and Mr. McKenzie came to his office, and made a similar statement. Witness had no recollection of their ever having stated to him that they considered it was the Board's duty to take over the engines. The street plant trailers and so on—was not good; but the Board took it, the bargain being that they should take over the whole plant. It never came to witness's knowledge that any arrangement had been made between the Board and McKenzie's that the former should take over all McKenzie's liabilities. In February, 1902, the Board appointed Mr. Close to investigate claims against the Board which could not be settled by the ordinary staff.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He could not recollect if he was consulted as to whether the Board required the engines. It would be Mr. Underwood's duty to say whether the engines were required or not. The Board at that time would not buy new engines without consulting him, but with regard to those imported by plaintiff, he could not say what they would do. He remembered the meeting at which McKenzie offered to sell his plant, and when Mr. Jagger said he advocated purchasing only what was necessary for the work, Mr. McKenzie declined to sell anything. He understood that the resolve to take over the plant included everything in course of construction for dock work. He could not say how it came about that McKenzie handed in invoices for plant on the water. They would not know that there was a shortage in stock until it was all cleared away. It would be a difficult thing to say if cargo had been partly delivered by McKenzie and partly by the Harbour Board, and any portion was lost, as to whether they were lost by McKenzie or the Harbour Board. If the "tallies" were properly kept it would be possible, but would be difficult.

John King, of Durbanville, examined by Mr. Schreiner, said he was a partner in the firm of King Bros. He was one of the arbitrators between McKenzie and the Harbour Board. He was a nominee of the Harbour Board. Witness was accompanied by Mr. Penny, and gave his decision in favour of the Harbour Board paying £12,000. Mr. McKenzie did not go round with them, but his representative, Mr. Boyd, did so, and got everything "marshalled" for inspection. There were seven box trailers in course of construction, which he also valued. There were also box trailers which were finished, and he valued them at £72 10s. each. He valued all the box trailers at the same price.

Henry de Smidt stated he was a member of the Harbour Board between April, 1901, and August, 1902. Mr. Underwood was appointed before he (witness) took office. He recollected the decision of the Board to do the delivery work themselves. He was not present at the meeting at which Mr. Underwood said that Mr. McKenzie had agreed to hand over the delivery work. He did not recollect deputing to Mr. Wiener the right to settle with Mr. McKenzie with regard to the claims to be paid. Witness was chairman of the meeting of the Harbour Board on the 11th October. Witness considered the minutes of the various meetings were well kept—rather too elaborately, he thought. Before the taking over of the work from McKenzie he found the most complex accounts in existence.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: The Board took over the work on the 14th October, but he could give no information as to the individual claims before that date.

Captain Lee, Dock Superintendent in 1902, stated that he had seen the warrant in connection with the engines that arrived in August, 1902. There was never any intimation to him from the plaintiff that the engines were for the Harbour Board. McKenzie and Co. instructed him to store the engines on the spare ground pending further advice.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He could not say whether certain duplicate parts of engines were stored at the docks.

Herbert Penny, Chief Inspector of the Table Bay Harbour Board, stated that he accompanied the arbitrators on their work. From the book that he kept the award of £12,000 was made out. Two of the trailers were shown, and the arbitrators decided that they were equally worth £72 10s. with the other working trailers. He was positive that seven trailers, and seven only, were mentioned that were in the course of construction.

Joseph Brodie McGregor, outdoor superintendent at the Docks, stated that in 1901 he was chief wharfinger. On October 11 he was summoned to Mr. Underwood's office to meet Mr. Sexton and Mr. Beattie, to advise as to the proposal to take over Mr. McKenzie's business of dock agent. It was arranged that the plaintiffs should finish the ships that they were discharging—this to include discharging to the stores as well as stevedoring—with the exception of the Clan McIntyre, which arrived on the 9th, and had only just begun to discharge. Nothing was said about taking over all liabilities. All the plaintiffs' books were not handed over to the Board; their cargo delivery books and receipts were not handed over. If they had been, witness would have known of it. Mr. Sexton was incorrect in stating that witness was opposed to the plaintiffs' men continuing to discharge.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: The services of some of the tally clerks were transferred to the Board, with all their documents and books. The Board had not a record of the amount of stuff which the plaintiffs had handled in the ships, the discharge of which the Board completed.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Mr. McKenzie had still got heavy contracts with the military, and he continued to occupy his office at the Docks. He was not driven out of the Docks, as had been suggested, but continued to discharge certain vessels.

By Hopley, J.: The actual delivery was performed by the Board, because the Board had taken over the plaintiffs' plant.

Mr. J. E. P. Close stated that in 1902 he was appointed to investigate a very large number of claims made both by the Board on McKenzie's, and by McKenzie's on the Board. The outcome of the discussions and consultations which witness had with Mr. Cowell was that the sum of £4,500 odd was given in favour of McKenzie. The total amount involved on both sides was £50,000. This amount included the present claims for short delivery, which they agreed to put on one side. He repeatedly asked for all claims that McKenzie's had to be filed. During the whole of the time no claim was made by the plaintiffs in respect of the engines. The first that witness heard about this matter was when Mr. Reid handed him the declaration in this case. Two accounts were filed for two and five new trailers respectively, dated July, 1902. This claim was hotly contested between witness and Mr. Cowell. In the account initiated by Mr. Cowell, these items appeared under the head "Accounts disallowed, and disallowances accepted by McKenzie and Co." Witness said that it was impossible for him to pass that account, which was a clear double charge. Witness actually disallowed claims for over £4,000 for amounts which had previously been paid to McKenzie, one item alone amounting to £2,295.

Knowles Stanley Wood, clerk in the employment of Mr. Close, stated that he checked all items in the claim with Mr. Cowell, and it was distinctly understood that the account was full and complete. Witness, in further evidence, corroborated the statements made by Mr. Close.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case, and counsel were heard in argument on the facts.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte CLOSE AND { 1904.
OTHERS. { July 7th.

Mr. McGregor moved to make absolute a rule nisi granted by the Court calling on respondents to show cause why applicants should not be appointed liquidators.

Rule made absolute.

Ex parte MOUAT.

Mr. Russell moved for leave to pass transfer of certain property. It appeared that one of the trustees appointed in 1884 was now in England, and his address could not be ascertained.

Granted.

Ex parte PAULING.

Mr. Joubert applied for an order for the appointment of Mr. W. A. Currey as trustee under an ante-nuptial contract entered into in 1890.

Granted.

Ex parte VAN DER VYVER.

Mr. Struben moved for authority to raise a mortgage of £500 on certain property belonging to minors. Counsel said the Master's report was not entirely favourable.

Buchanan, J., said there was money in the guardian's fund to the amount of about £450, and it seemed to him it would be better to take that money than to raise a mortgage. The matter would be referred back to the Master, with power to act if satisfied it was for the benefit of the minors.

SHACKELL V. SHACKELL.

This was an application by Lucy E. Shackell against her husband, J. H. Shackell, for the custody of the two minor children.

Mr. Burton, for petitioner, said she was the defendant in an action in the Transvaal for divorce. The Court dismissed the action for divorce, but granted leave to apply for an order for separation, the parties, if possible, to come to an amicable arrangement as to the custody of the children. On January 20, 1904, the husband left Kimberley, taking the children with him. Through her solicitors applicant sent a registered letter to respondent at Cape Town saying that she was willing that he should have the custody of the girl if she should have the boy. The husband, not having employment, was not in a position to support them, while applicant was earning an income of £30 per month as a dressmaker. There was immediate danger that the husband, who was talking of taking the children to Australia, would leave the country, and applicant therefore asked for an interdict against the husband restraining him from taking the children out of the jurisdiction of the Court until an action could be brought in respect of their custody.

An interdict was granted restraining respondent from removing the children out of the jurisdiction of the Court, the interdict to be dissolved on August 31, unless applicant took action.

Ex parte "YE MECCA CAFE," LTD.

Mr. Struben moved for confirmation of the liquidator's report. The liquidator stated that in his opinion the failure of the company was due to gross mismanagement and neglect.

Buchanan, J.: I suppose if any creditor likes to take action on that he can do so.

Order granted.

Ex parte LUYT.

Mr. Russell moved for an order declaring one Fatima Gabil, a minor, entitled to certain money in the hands of the Master, and for leave to pay part of the money to a third person to defray the cost of the maintenance of the minor. The Master recommended that the money be applied to the maintenance of the minor, and that he be authorised to pay a sum less than that asked for to the person who maintained the minor.

Order granted in terms of Master's report.

Ex parte THE ESTATE OF VAN COLLER.

Mr. Russell moved for confirmation of partition of certain properties. The Master reported favourably.

Granted.

Ex parte PROUDFOOT.

Mr. Russell moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to cancel the entry of a certain bond. The Registrar recommended that a rule in the usual terms be granted.

Rule granted in terms of the Registrar's report, the Registrar being authorised to cancel the Bond if no objection were made.

Ex parte THE STAR AERATED WATER FACTORY.

Mr. Gardiner moved for a rule nisi operating as an interdict restraining the vendor of the business from parting with certain promissory notes, given in respect of the purchase price by applicants, pending action to be brought by applicants in respect of certain goods not delivered.

His Lordship said the applicants would be amply protected by setting off this claim against the last of these promissory notes, but it was not right that the applicants should come with this application just as the first of the notes was maturing.

A rule nisi was granted interdicting respondent from parting with the third and fourth of the notes pending action to be forthwith instituted.

STEER V. CHETTY.

Mr. Russell moved for leave to sue by edictal citation, and to attach certain goods, consisting of two rings, eight small jewels, and a gold watch, to found jurisdiction.

Application granted, personal service to be effected, the citation being returnable on the 15th August.

Ex parte THE APPLICATION OF NANGO HASNIEM.

Dr. Greer moved for an order compelling the Acting Resident Magistrate of Cape Town, to issue a writ of execution on a judgment given by him in a case in which the applicant summoned one Dala. Applicant alleged that the Magistrate gave judgment for him, and at the end of the notes of evidence entered: "Judgment for plaintiff, with costs." He afterwards erased plaintiff, and substituted "defendant."

Mr. Graham, K.C., for the respondents, read affidavits to show that the Magistrate made an error in saying and writing: "Judgment for plaintiff," and that he intended to give judgment for defendant. When the Magistrate discovered his mistake he altered the record.

Dr. Greer argued that the Magistrate acted beyond his authority in altering the record, and that the judgment given in the first instance must stand.

Without calling upon Mr. Graham, the Court refused the application.

Buchanan, J., in giving judgment, said that the applicant sued Dala in the Magistrate's Court on a dishonoured cheque. On the defendant admitting his signature he was required to prove non-liability, and he thereupon put his witnesses into the box. The plaintiff and his witnesses afterwards went into the box to answer defendant's case. The Magistrate, through inadvertence, as defendant had given his evidence first, gave judgment for the plaintiff, but, as a fact, he said that the judgment he intended to pronounce in Court was for the defendant, and he stated that he entered this judgment on the record, which now showed judgment for defendant instead of for plaintiff. He had at once informed the parties of these facts. Under these circumstances, no order would be made, but by consent, leave would be reserved to the applicant to appeal on the merits if so advised, such appeal to be noted within three days.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

HONIBALL V. CAPE CENTRAL RAILWAY. 1904. July 8th.

Damnum injuriarum — Measure of damages.

This was an action brought by Henry Edward Honiball, farmer, division of Mossel Bay, against the Cape Central Railway, to recover £250 in respect of damage alleged to have been done to the plaintiff's farm Bon Avontuur.

The plaintiff, in his declaration, stated that he was a farmer living in the division of Mossel Bay. The defendant company were authorised to extend and had been extending their line of railway from Riversdale to Mossel Bay. The said line of railway passed over the farm of the plaintiff, Bon Avontuur. A route was laid out but this was subsequently abandoned in favour of a deviation to the route now followed. In laying out the original route, the defendants destroyed 1,800 valuable aloe trees and bush, the value thereof being £250. Plaintiff prayed for: (1) Judgment for £250; (2) alternative relief; and (3) costs of suit.

The defendants in their plea admitted the formal allegations, and also that, as authorised by the Act of Parliament, they entered upon the plaintiff's land and felled certain aloe and other trees, but they denied that they had acted wrongfully and unlawfully. They admitted that they were liable to pay compensation for any damage that was done, but denied that the plaintiff had sustained damages in the sum of £250, and said that £20 was a sufficient sum to pay. They paid into court a sum of £20 in sufficient discharge of the plaintiff's claim.

The replication was general.

Mr. M. de Villiers was for the plaintiff; Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Struben) was for the defendants.

[Hopley, J.: It comes, then, to a question of what is the value of the trees?]

Mr. De Villiers: Yes.

Henry L. Honiball, son of the plaintiff, said he knew the old route that was laid out by the railway, but abandoned afterwards, over his father's farm. The old route went partly over red and black soil, covered with aloes and black olives. The ground was closely planted with aloes. In making the clearance for the route, about 1,800 aloes were destroyed; he counted that number. The flowers and seeds of the aloe were used as ostrich food. The aloe was considered very valuable for that purpose. It was, in fact, the principal food of the ostrich during drought. After the drug had been extracted, the leaf was good for goats, and greatly eaten by them. The value of the aloes at the time of the destruction of the trees was £1 per 100 lb. The stems of the aloe trees were also useful as poles for wire fencing. He estimated the value at 1s. 6d. per pole. Only a portion of the trees cut down could be used for poles, as they were too short. Other trees were also felled that were suitable for cattle food. He reckoned the value of an aloe tree at 2s. 6d.

By the Court: He regarded the value of the olive and other trees that were knocked down, apart from the aloes, as £25.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: As a rule, the tapping of the aloe trees was done by poor people. The farmer usually took one-third of the price, and the person who tapped took two-thirds. He repeated: that an aloe was worth 2s. 6d. Ground containing aloes was worth a good deal more than any other ordinary ground. He had never heard of anybody buying or selling an aloe tree. He had never bought one. The presence of aloes would improve the value of ground about 25 times over.

Hopley, J., asked witness if he considered that a piece of ordinary ground of 100 morgen worth, say, £100, would be worth £2,500 if covered with aloes.

Witness said that that was so. They got about half a pound of sap from each aloe tree; that was the quantity when it had been boiled. Witness was the general agent of his father, who was too ill to travel. The portion on which the damage was done was about 850 morgen; the whole extent of the farm was about 2,000 morgen.

By the Court: The ground on which the damage took place was a large ostrich camp.

A farmer in the Riversdale district gave corroborative evidence as to the number of aloe trees destroyed and their value as ostrich food. Aloes were especially valuable as food for breeding birds, and the presence of a patch of aloe trees on a farm increased its value.

Daniel J. Pienaar, farmer, gave similar evidence.

By Mr. Upington: Witness had bought 500 morgen of aloe trees from his brother for £100, but he thought his brother sold too cheaply.

Mr. De Villiers closed his case.

Cyril P. White, engineer, on the Mossel Bay Railway, said that all the work done on the line was within the limits of deviation allowed by the Act as shown in the plan. The line had to be cleared, and certain trees cut down. Messrs. Muller and Meyer accompanied witness to the place where this had been done.

Cross-examined: The ground was not thickly clustered, and witness thought it impossible that there could have been 1,800 trees.

George Frederick Muller, farmer, stated that he considered the value of aloes to be on an average 3d. each. He had a lot of aloes on his farm, and would be glad to sell them at that price. To a man who farmed ostriches, a morgen of ground with aloes on would be more valuable than ground without aloes. £1 or £1 10s. more valuable. Witness would not say the whole of the clearing had been occupied thickly by aloes. He went over the ground carefully last Sunday with Mr. Meyer, and taking the ground adjoining, and assuming that this ground was of a similar nature previously, he estimated the damage done at £22 10s. The farm was not damaged, and if £22 10s. were given the plaintiff would be a gainer. They had counted 975 aloes on the ground.

Henry Oswald Meyer gave similar evidence, estimating the value of the aloes to be 4d., and the damage to the bush about 2s.

Elgard A. Muller, farmer, estimated the ground to be worth £10 per morgen. There were plenty of other aloes on this farm to use as food for ostriches.

Mr. Upington closed his case, and counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

Hopley, J.: The only point in the case is the amount of damages to be awarded to the plaintiff. This portion of the claim must rest on the value of the aloes, and it was news to him that they were of considerable value for food, and that the dried leaves were also of value. Perhaps it was as Mr. Pienaar said, that some people did not appreciate the value of the aloe trees on their farm. He could understand the plaintiff's valuation if the trees were taken away permanently, but here it was not exactly the case. What the Court had to consider was that after a partial diminution there would be just as many aloes inside of six or eight years. Taking the number of aloes at 1,800, he thought that the plaintiff was entitled to £45, counting each tree at 6d. a head. Outside out of the damage to the aloes he assessed the damages at £15, and gave judgment for £60, with costs.

GENERAL MOTION.

Ex parte THE TRUSTEES OF DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH OF HANOVER.

Mr. Sutton said that this matter had previously been before the Court, and he now produced the regulations of the Dutch Reformed Church.

The Registrar was authorized to register the transfer in trust for the Mission Church, Hanover, and also to pass a mortgage bond for £150.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

TRIAL CAUSE.

GOURLAY, CAVANAGH AND s 1904.
CO. V. DAVIS. { July 11th.

Debtor and creditor—Liability for debts of predeceased spouse.

This was an action brought by William Gourlay and Co., at present trading as Gourlay, Cavanagh, and Co., to recover £219 on a guarantee in which the defendant undertook to meet her late husband's liability.

The declaration set out that the plaintiffs were carrying on business as Wm. Gourlay and Co., at the time a certain agreement was signed between the defendant's late husband, and the firm, whereby the former, for the consideration of £150 advanced on a promissory note, undertook to exclusively sell imported goods from the plaintiffs. The defendant's husband died in March, 1902, and the defendant undertook if she was allowed to carry on the business at the Clyde Hotel, to carry out the conditions of the original contract. Subsequently, the defendant continued the business at the Clyde Hotel for her own benefit. About November, 1903, the defendant broke the terms of the contract by failing to purchase goods from the plaintiff, and thereafter plaintiffs claimed £89 18s. 9d. for goods sold and delivered, and £219, the amount of the indebtedness at the time of her husband's death. The defendant paid the £89 18s. 9d., but she refused to pay the £219, and plaintiffs claimed that amount with costs.

The defendant, in her plea, stated that she had no knowledge of the correct amount of the indebtedness of her husband at the time of his death, and while admitting the formal allegations, she refused to pay the sum of £219, an indebtedness which she set out she had not taken over.

Mr. McGregor (with him Mr. M. Bisset) was for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Graham, K.C. (with him Mr. Russell) was for the defendant.

William Dixon Gourlay, plaintiff, stated that the defendant's husband, in her presence, bound himself on consideration of the advance of £150 to purchase all imported goods from witness. Something was paid off the account, and before his death Davis gave him a note for the balance, in addition to the amount of the running account, which totalled £249. The defendant was present when the note was given; in fact, she took the principal part in all negotiations. Mr. Forsyth tried to get something substantial paid off the account, and witness instructed him to place the matter in the hands of an attorney. Shortly after the death of Mr. Davis, the defendant called with two children, and placed her position before him, saying that if she was allowed to stay on, as Ohlssons had agreed upon, she would be able to pay off the whole of her husband's indebtedness. It was quite clearly understood that she should fulfil her husband's engagements. There was nothing in writing to that effect; we accepted it in good faith.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: It must have been an error in the date that he sued on an agreement entered into after the defendant's husband's death, which was put down as September, 1901, whereas he did not die until March, 1902. He was certain, however, that the agreement was after her husband's death.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He did not think it necessary to file his claim against the estate of Davis. He admitted it was an unbusinesslike transaction to take over a fresh arrangement without any fresh document. He did so because he had such absolute faith in the defendant.

Frederick Skipper stated that he was present in Gourlay's office when the defendant called. Mr. and Mrs. Davis were present when the advance of £150 was being discussed. The defendant took the principal part in all the transactions.

Never to his knowledge did she deny any liability as to the second bill. During her husband's lifetime the defendant generally gave the orders.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: As there was no definite arrangement made about the bill, it was understood that the defendant was to have time to pay the debt off.

Wm. Forsyth, proprietor of the Welcome Hotel, Maitland, said that in September, 1901, he was the plaintiffs' manager. While he was manager the plaintiff handed him the promissory note for collection, and on the 11th August he called at the Clyde Hotel to see about the goods account and the bill. Mrs. Davis asked him to send a traveller a few days later to collect the money, and with regard to the bill she said that she would call and see the plaintiff the following Thursday. He called again on the 15th September, and the defendant agreed to pay £10 quarterly if the plaintiff would agree. She paid £10 on September 15, and witness gave her a receipt. Witness entered the payment in two cash-books, from which the accountant transferred it. Witness reduced the interest, and allowed discount as a concession, these not being strictly due. Witness wrote the receipt for the £10 as being on the bill account. A balance was left of £222 17s. 2d. Afterwards, witness saw Mrs. Davis and asked her to sign a bill payable on demand, but Mrs. Davis said she would prefer the arrangement to pay £10 quarterly.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: Witness never discussed with Mrs. Davis. When he took the bill Mrs. Davis never demurred to it; she only pleaded for time.

By the Court: The £10 was placed to the credit of the bill account in the ledger.

Stephen W. Cavanagh said the account sent in for £309 0s. 7d. was made up of the bill and the open account.

Cross-examined by Mr. Graham: Witness never discussed with Mrs. Davis her late husband's responsibility. Witness did not remember Mrs. Davis sending him a letter on the 5th January which he handed back to her.

Mr. Graham read the letter, in which Mrs. Davis stated that she knew the reason why she had not been treated in the same manner as previously, and that the reason was that some time ago they sent a servant to ask her to sign a certain bill, which she absolutely refused to sign, as she was not liable for her husband's debts.

In further cross-examination, witness said he did not remember the letter.

Re-examined: Witness had no interest in the old account, as the debt was contracted before he entered the firm as a partner.

Thomas Masterton, accountant and auditor to Gourlay and Co., deposed that he had had conversations with Mrs. Davis about the account, in which the latter never denied liability. On the 30th December, 1902, she paid him £10. The balance of the bill, together with interest at 8 per cent., amounted to £249. In the account sent for £219 no interest was charged.

Cross-examined: The £10 paid in December was paid to witness personally, and not to a man, named Ainsworth.

Mr. McGregor closed his case.

Mr. F. Kinsley, clerk in Mr. Steer's office, said he had charge of the defendant's case. In January, 1904, he accompanied Mrs. Davis to the office of Mr. Cavanagh. This was after receipt of the letter of demand. He saw Mr. Cavanagh hand back to Mrs. Gourlay the letter of the 5th January, saying that he did not want his clerks to see it, and that he supposed she had written it in a moment of annoyance.

Emily H. Davis, the defendant, said her husband died on March 15, 1902. Witness was present when the contract was entered into between her husband and Gourlay. At her husband's death she knew he owed something on the bill, but did not know the exact amount. She determined to keep on the hotel, and she paid an account for goods supplied during her husband's lifetime. She never told Gourlay that if she were allowed to continue at the hotel she would take over her husband's liability. She had not talked with Gourlay since her husband's death. Witness always kept copies of her letters. She produced the letter books. Until the 18th September witness was not asked to sign any bills. When she paid the £10 on the 15th September she had a receipt, which had, however, been destroyed with other papers by a flood. The receipt was simply an acknowledgment for £10, and there was no statement of the items in the receipt. Witness made a note of the payment of the £10 in a small book which she kept in the bar for the purpose of making such entries. Witness never remembered seeing Mr. Masterton before to-day. Witness did not at any time understand what her husband's liabilities were under this bill, and she did not take over the liabilities.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: Witness knew her husband's liability to Gourlay at the time of his death was something like £200. Her husband left a will, in which he appointed her his sole heir. She understood her husband's estate was insolvent. She got £800 from a policy on her husband's life. She paid the whole of the amount owing by her husband at the time of his death to Ohlsson's.

Alfred E. Crase, brother of the defendant, deposed that he was present when Mrs. Davis paid £10 to a man, named Ainsworth, who was connected with Gourlay's firm, in December.

Mr. Graham closed his case, and counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

Mr. Graham put in the original of the will of the defendant's late husband, which he stated had not been filed, and in which Mr. James Brittain had been appointed executor.

The Chief Justice: And he has done nothing?

Mr. Graham: He seems to have done nothing.

De Villiers, C.J.: There is considerable conflict in the evidence in this case, but the weight of the evidence and the probabilities of the case seem to me to be entirely in favour of the plaintiffs. There is no doubt that there was some laxity in this arrangement, which is sworn to by the plaintiffs, but I am of opinion that all the facts of the case point to the evidence given by the plaintiffs as being correct. After the death of the defendant's husband, it is clear to me that the defendant was desirous of having the same facilities for the conduct of the business as had been enjoyed by her husband. It made very little difference to her—in fact, practically no difference—whether she took over the liabilities of her husband or not—because she is the sole heiress in her husband's estate, and there is no proof whatever that the husband's estate is insolvent. The defendant admits that she received a large sum by way of insurance from the estate of her husband, and yet the executor never took out letters of administration. Mr. Brittain had been appointed by the will, but he never took out letters of administration. And yet we find that in the letter of the 18th September, 1902—the letter upon which so much reliance has been placed on behalf of the defendant, and which the defendant is said to have returned—she says: "If this was owing by my late husband, he has been dead over six months. You had your remedy to have claimed the sum in my husband's estate." This seems to me a most disingenuous statement on her part. She surely must have known that no letters of administration had been taken out, that there was no one against whom the plaintiff could proceed in respect of the money excepting herself; and, as far as the plaintiff was concerned, if he had received a letter in these terms, if he had known that defendant repudiated it, surely he would at once have seen the absolute necessity either of having the estate sequestrated or of having an executor appointed in terms of the will. But it appears to me that the plaintiff was satisfied to accept the assurance of the defendant that she would be liable for the debts, and that in consequence of that assurance he gave her the same facilities as he had given to her deceased husband. He allowed her to purchase goods from time to time on credit. He allowed this bill to stand over, and I am quite satisfied he never would have done it if he did not have this assurance from her. Of course, if the estate of her husband is insolvent, then the arrangement might be to her disadvantage, but there is no proof whatever of the insolvency of the estate. Her admission of the receipt of this large sum by way of insurance money shows that the estate could hardly have been insolvent, and if it was insolvent, there was a gross neglect on her part and on the part of the executor in not seeing that this estate was at once sequestrated for the benefit of all creditors. She preferred to sit there in possession of this estate, hoping to work it all out for her own benefit, she herself being sole heir in the estate, and I think it would be well that the attention of the Master should be called to the fact that here Mr. Brittain was nominated as executor, that the will has been in his possession for several months, and that not a single step has been taken to have this estate realised in the manner in which it ought to be realised. She surely must have been sufficient of a business woman to know that this was not the way in which the estate was to be realised, and the only manner in which her conduct can possibly be explained is by assuming that she did intend that this estate of her husband's should not be realised at all, that the business should go on, that she should have the benefit of the business in her individual capacity, and that she should hold herself liable for all the debts of the estate. It is not necessary to go into all the further details. This is the general impression on my mind, and the minor details I need not discuss. It is quite possible that Mr. Cavanagh did receive the letter about which so much has been said, but even supposing that letter had been received, it would not prove that ten days after the husband's death the arrangement was not entered into between the defendant and plaintiffs in the terms alleged. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs' case has been proved, and judgment will be given in terms of the declaration. As to the interest, however, Mr. McGregor consents to a reduction from 8 per cent. to 5 per cent. There will be judgment in terms of prayers (a) and (b), but interest will be at the rate of 5 per cent., instead of 8 per cent., the defendant to pay the costs. His lordship added that it would be simpler to declare the plaintiffs entitled to the sum of £219 0s. 10d., at the rate of 5 per cent.

SUPREME COURT

DEBENTURE HOLDERS OF GRAND JUNCTION RAIL- WAYS AND OTHERS V. HILLS AND OTHERS.	} 1904. July 12th. " 18th. " 26th.
LIQUDATOR OF GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS V. HILLS AND OTHERS.

Debentures—Company—Partnership—Preference—General bond.

A Company acting under the powers of its trust deed passed a bond in favour of certain trustees for debenture-holders, charging the whole property and assets of the Company (without describing any of such assets), with the condition that the Company reserved the power to deal with any property and assets, provided that the proceeds be placed to credit of capital and not to that of revenue account. Thereafter the Company ceded its assets to a partnership, which took over its liabilities. The Company was ordered to be wound up and receivers were appointed to realize and distribute the assets of the partnership.

Held, that the debenture-holders had no greater rights in respect of the assets of the Company than those of the holder of a general bond, and that their rights under the debentures did not include a preference against the assets of the partnership.

These were two actions for a declaration of rights, account and interdict—one brought by the London and Westminster Bank and others against the receivers of the Grand Junction Railways and others; and the other brought by the official liquidator of the Grand Junction Railways and others against the receivers of the said company and others. The plaintiffs in the former action were John Walker and George Morrison Palmer, in their capacity as trustees for the holders of debentures issued by the Grand Junction Railways, Limited, and the London and Westminster Bank, Limited, while the defendants were Edward Ridge Syfret and John Edwin Paul Close, in their capacity as receivers of the Grand Junction Railways, Arnold Frank Hills, John Walker, John Walker, jun., and Thomas Moutat Cameron Walker, now, or lately carrying on business in co-partnership at Cape Town or elsewhere under the style or firm of the Grand Junction Railways, Arnold Frank Hills personally and also in his capacity as receiver (in England) of the said co-partnership, and Edward Ridge Syfret in his capacity as official liquidator of the Grand Junction Railways, Limited. In the other case the plaintiff was Edward Ridge Syfret, in his capacity as official liquidator of the Grand Junction Railways, Limited, and the defendants, Edward Ridge Syfret and John Edwin Paul Close, in their capacity as receivers of the Grand Junction Railways, Arnold Frank Hills, John Walker, John Walker, jun., and Thomas Moutat Cameron Walker, now or lately carrying on business in co-partnership at Cape Town or elsewhere under the style or firm of the Grand Junction Railways, and Arnold Frank Hills, personally, and also in his capacity as receiver (in England) of the said co-partnership.

It was agreed that the actions should be heard together.

The pleadings in the first case were as follow:

The plaintiffs' declaration set out:

1. The first named plaintiffs, hereinafter termed "the trustees," are the trusand as against the first-named defendants:

(e) Interest a tempore morae;

(f) As against the defendants other than the liquidator, costs of suit.

The plea of the defendants, Edward Ridge Syfret and John Edwin Paul Close, in their capacity as receivers of the Grand Junction Railways, said:

1. The said defendants admit the allegations in paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 (a), of the declaration, but say that the construction referred to in paragraph 4 was done by the firm of John Walker and Sons, under contract with the Company, and that the company issued to John Walker and Sons or their nominee by way of payment for work done by that firm under such contract, 1,700 debentures of £100 each before the said 1,000 debentures were issued duly 20th July, 1898, and 1,000 debentures of £100 each after that date, which comprises the total issue of debentures, and includes those now held by the plaintiff bank, and they do not admit that the said debentures are held bona fide or for value received.

2. As to paragraphs 5 (b) and (c), the said defendants crave leave to refer to the said debentures and bond, and to the order of Court dated the 2nd March, 1904, for the true meaning and effect thereof.

3. They admit the allegations in paragraph 6, but say that the principal agreements constituting the partnership styled the Grand Junction Railways, whereof they are receivers, were entered into in May, and in August, 1898, and they beg to refer to the said agreements at the trial of this cause.

4. They admit the allegations in paragraph 7 (a), (b), (c), and (d), save that they say that the debentures in respect of which the parties mentioned in (c) took over the company's liability were the debentures theretofore issued, amounting to 1,700 as aforesaid, and they crave leave to refer to the terms of the undertaking of the 20th July, 1898, copy whereof is hereunto annexed and marked D.

5. As to paragraph 7 (b), they do not admit the meaning and intent therein alleged, they deny that the plaintiffs, or either of them, are entitled to the preference therein claimed against the assets of the partnership styled the Grand Junction Railways before or in competition with the creditors of the paid partnership, and they say that the said partnership at no time agreed or undertook to be liable for all debentures issued by the company either before or after the 20th July, 1898.

6. They say further that they are willing and ready to admit the holders of debentures to prove as concurrent creditors of the said partnership not as such holders, but to the extent to which such holders may after proper inquiry satisfy this honourable Court that the said partnership has had value in respect of the consideration given for the issue of such debentures, or in respect of moneys or other valuable consideration given by the holders of such debentures; but they deny that said partnership has had such value to the extent of the face value of the debentures issued as aforesaid; and they are willing that an inquiry should, if deemed necessary by this Honourable Court, be directed, and an account framed accordingly.

7. As to paragraph 8, they beg to refer to the terms of the Act No. 19 of 1900, and the Schedules thereof embodying the contracts therein referred to.

8. As to paragraph 9, they do not admit that the Government consented to any cession and assignment as therein alleged to the said Hills acting for and on behalf of the said partnership, but they say that the cession and assignment to the said Hills was by him and the other members of the said partnership treated as a cession and assignment on behalf of the said partnerships, they deny that the partnership became subject to the liabilities of the company in respect of the said debentures; and they deny the allegations and contentions in paragraphs 9 after the words "subject to all the liabilities of the said company."

9. They admit that the said Hills, acting as set forth in the foregoing paragraph of this plea, proceeded with the further construction of the railways until the 20th June, 1902, but otherwise deny the allegations in paragraph 10 of the declaration.

10. They admit the allegations in paragraphs 11 and 14 save that for greater certainty they crave leave to refer to such proof as may be adduced of the correctness of the figure £254,769 13s. 6d., and of the amount of costs and expenses incurred after the 20th July, 1898; and they admit paragraph 12, except that they do not admit that the company has any assets other than its claims against the parties to the undertaking set forth in annexure D hereto.

12. They deny the contention set forth in paragraph 16.

Wherefore, subject to paragraph 6 of this plea, they pray that the plaintiffs' claim may be dismissed with costs.

The plea of defendant Hills personally and as a member of the co-partnership and as Receiver thereof was:

1. The defendant Hills admits in his above-mentioned capacities paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 5 (a), 7 (a), and 7 (d), in so far as the allegations therein concern him in his said capacities, and subject to what is hereinafter stated, and save especially that he says as to paragraph 5 (a), that the holders of certain of the debentures are not entitled to claim payment thereof, and have no valid title thereto, having obtained possession thereof improperly mala fide and without valuable consideration.

2. The defendant does not admit paragraph 5 (b) and especially denies the allegations therein that the undertaking authorised by the Acts of Parliament subsequent to Act 28 of 1895 was charged with payment as in paragraph 5 (b) set forth. The defendant craves leave to refer this Honourable Court to clauses 2 and 3 of Annexure B to the Declaration.

3. As to paragraph 5 (c), the defendant craves to refer this Honourable Court to the proceedings and orders of record in this Court for the true statement thereof.

4. The co-partnership referred to in paragraph 6 was not entered into until the month of August, 1898: paragraph 6 is otherwise admitted.

5. Paragraph 7 (b) is admitted save as to the words "acting personally and for and on behalf of the partnership" at the end thereof. The defendant annexes as part hereof a copy of the said cession marked A. The said cession was never registered in the Deeds Office of this Colony.

6. The defendant admits paragraph 7 (c), save that for the correct terms of the undertaking to pay the debts of the company, the defendant refers to the copy of the undertaking of the 20th July, 1898, annexed hereto as part hereof marked B.

7. The defendant denies paragraph 7 (c), and says that the signatories to the said undertaking agreed to pay the debentures as debts, not as preferent debentures.

8. The undertaking of the 20th July, 1898, was not an undertaking of the partnership which was not yet entered into at the said date. The Thames Iron-Works and Shipbuilding Company (hereinafter called the Thames Company) one of the signatories to the undertaking was not and at no time became a member of the partnership.

9. At the time of the said undertaking the Company, owing to financial and other difficulties, had ceased business, and was unable to proceed with the railway contracts, or to pay the debenture holders or other creditors.

10. By the said undertaking, the signatories neither intended to give nor by a reasonable construction of the contract did they give any rights of preference to or in favour of the debenture holders.

11. With regard to the first part of paragraph 8, the defendant admits the same save that as to the liabilities to which the Thames Company were subject defendant refers to Annexure B, and to the foregoing.

12. As to the second part of paragraph

8, the defendant says that the Acts rights and liabilities were preserved and kept intact by the Acts of Parliament referred to in so far only as concerned the parties to the contracts confirmed by the said Acts of Parliament.

13. The defendant admits the first part of paragraph 9 down to the full stop in line 7 thereof, save that he says that, though the Colonial Government recognised only the cession to the defendant Hills personally, the said Hills held and acquired for the partnership all rights obtained by him in respect of the contracts made after the formation of the co-partnership in August, 1898.

14. The defendant, subject to the foregoing, denies all the allegations in paragraph 9 after the said full stop.

15. The defendant says that the co-partnership proceeded with the construction of the Railways until 20th June, 1902, and that large sums of money were expended thereon, otherwise he denies paragraphs 10 and 11.

16. The allegations in paragraph 12 are not in defendant's knowledge, and he does not admit the same.

17. Paragraphs 13 and 14 are admitted save that all moneys due under the judgments became thereafter payable to the Receivers in this Colony, and the defendant Hills has no control over the said money.

18. The defendant denies paragraph 16.

19. The greater part of the debentures issued are held by the plaintiff Bank (and other Banks or persons) pledged as collateral security for advances made to the partnership. So far as regards debentures so held the defendant says that the present action is premature, the pledges not being entitled to sue now by virtue of any prior action brought or of execution issued or of any claim made in insolvency in respect of any of the debentures.

20. Without prejudice to his right to challenge (on claim being made thereunder) the validity of the claims which may be put forward by the holders of such of the debentures as are held improperly, mala fide or without valuable consideration (as set forth in paragraph 1 hereof) the defendant says generally that the claim of the plaintiff is not one that avails against the partnership, but is one on which the signatories aforesaid are jointly liable personally and individually, and that therefore the amounts paid to the Receivers are not subject to the said claim, and that whether the claim be one which is valid against the partnership or the signatories as aforesaid, it is not a preferent one.

Wherefore, subject to the above the defendant Mills prays that the claim against him in his said capacities may be dismissed with costs.

The plea of the defendant, Edward Ridge Syfret in his capacity as Official Liquidator of the Grand Junction Railways, Limited, was as follows:

For a plea the defendant Edward Ridge Syfret, in his capacity as Official Liquidator of the Grand Junction Railways, Limited, says:

1. That he submits to the judgment of this Honourable Court herein.

2. That in case this Honourable Court see fit to grant any relief to the plaintiffs or one or more of them under prayer (a) of the Declaration then the said defendant prays that his costs may be paid out of the moneys paid over to the above-named Receivers by the above-named defendant Hills, in accordance with the order of this Honourable Court made on the 2nd day of March, 1904, on the application of the London and Westminster Bank.

3. That in case this Honourable Court should not see fit to grant such relief to the plaintiffs as in paragraph 2 hereof set forth, then the defendant prays that his costs may be paid by the plaintiffs.

The pleadings in the second case were:

The plaintiff's declaration set out:

1. The plaintiff, Edward Ridge Syfret, sues in his capacity as the official liquidator of a duly registered company in this colony, styled the Grand Junction Railways, Limited, and hereinafter styled "the company," the said plaintiff being hereinafter styled "the liquidator."

2. The defendants are Arnold Frank Hills, who is sued in his personal capacity and as the receiver (duly appointed in England) of the co-partnership herein next described and hereinafter termed "the partnership"; Arnold Frank Hills, John Walker, John Walker, jun., and Thomas Mouat Cameron Walker, trading in co-partnership at Cape Town and elsewhere as the Grand Junction Railways; and Edward Ridge Syfret and John Edwin Paul Close, who are sued in their capacity as the receivers (duly appointed in this colony) of the said partnership, and are hereinafter termed "the receivers."

3. On or about the 19th May, 1896, as regards the first three lines of railway to be hereinafter specified, and on or about the 13th October, 1896, as regards the last line, the company entered into a contract with the Government of this colony, for the construction of four lines of railway within this colony, to wit, from Oudtshoorn to Klipplaat, from Somerset East to Fort Beaufort, from Fort Beaufort to King William's Town, and from Mossel Bay to Oudtshoorn—the said lines being hereinafter termed "the railway." The construction of the railway was authorised under Act 28 of 1895.

4. The company thereupon proceeded with the construction of the railway and expended money and incurred liabilities in and about the same.

5. On divers occasions between the 31st October, 1896, and the 29th August, 1899, the company in terms of Act 43 of 1896, and for value received duly issued debentures in due form of law secured by a bond duly registered in the Deeds Registry of this colony on the 23rd October, 1896. The debentures so issued number 2,700 of £100 each, making together the sum of £270,000. Of the said debentures, 1,000 were issued after the agreement set out in paragraph 7 hereof, but with the knowledge, consent, and sanction of the partnership. Copies of such debentures and bond are hereunto annexed marked respectively "A" and "B."

6. Prior to the month of July, 1898, the said Arnold Frank Hills and a firm of John Walker and Sons, consisting of the said John Walker, John Walker, jun., and Thomas Mouat Cameron Walker, carrying on business in this colony and elsewhere, entered into partnership for the purpose of constructing the railway and carrying out the said contract of 1896. The members of the partnership were and are those set out in paragraph 2.

7. (a) On or about the 2nd day of August, 1898, a certain further contract, annexed as schedule A to Act 40 of 1896, was (in so far as the construction of the said railway was still to be executed) entered into between the Colonial Government and a company registered in England and known as the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company for the further construction and completion of the said railway. The said contract was thereafter superseded by a later contract entered into on the 18th March, 1899, between the same parties and for the like purposes.

(b) For the purpose of and in connection with the said contracts which were entered into with the consent and approval of the Grand Junction Railways, Limited, the latter company on or about the 20th July, 1898, ceded and assigned all its right and title and interest in and to the contracts of the 19th May, 1896, and the 13th October, 1896, to the said Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company, and (or) to the defendant Hills acting personally and for and on behalf of the partnership.

(c) On the same day, to wit, the said 20th July, 1898, and in consideration of the said cession the said Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company, the said Hills and the said firm of John Walker and Sons agreed with the company to pay all its debts, including the said debentures theretofore issued by it and took over all the liabilities and engagements of the company.

(d) The amount of the said debentures, and all of them, is still wholly unpaid.

8. Hereafter the said Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company, having vested in it the rights, and being in possession of the undertaking, and being subject to all liabilities, of the company, proceeded with the execution of the contracts of 18th March 1899, until the month of July, 1900, when fresh contracts (set forth in the schedules G and H annexed to and incorporated in Act 19 of 1900) were entered into with the said Government in lieu of the said contract of 1899, in so far as such last-named contract still remained to be executed. The plaintiff specially craves leave to refer this Honourable Court to the recitals in the preambles to the contracts and to section 10 of Act 19 of 1900, whereby all acts done, rights acquired, or liabilities incurred in connection with the contracts therein referred to are preserved and kept intact, and craves leave to refer to section 3 of the said Act 40 of 1886, for a similar preservation and keeping intact of acts, rights, and liabilities.

9. The said Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company proceeded with the execution of the said contracts until December, 1900, when it ceded and assigned with the consent of the Government all its right, title, and interest in respect of the said contracts of 1900, and also further ceded and assigned all its right, title, and interest in respect of the said contracts of 1896, 1893, and 1899 to the defendant Hills, acting personally and for and on behalf of the partnership. The said Hills acting for himself and the partnership thereby became vested with the rights, possessed of the whole undertaking and subject to all the liabilities of the company.

10. By reason of the premises the liquidator is entitled to prove and claim, as a debt owing by the partnership and payable out of any funds belonging or accruing to it or the receivers, the amounts of the various debentures hereinbefore in paragraph 5 set out.

11. The moneys received from time to time from the Colonial Government in respect of the said contracts were expended upon the construction of the railway. The amount of actual cost incurred and so expended up to the 20th July, 1898, amounted to £254,769 13s. 6d.; and further costs and expenses amounting to a large sum were thereafter incurred up to the 20th June, 1902.

12. The company was placed in liquidation on the 15th July, 1902, and there are no assets thereof, other than those appearing from the foregoing paragraphs hereof, to satisfy the claims of the holders of the said debentures.

13. In November, 1902, and again thereafter in February, 1904, the said Hills, suing both personally and in his capacity as trustee in the first, and as receiver in the second action, for and on behalf of the partnership, instituted an action against the said Government, in which it was decided by judgment of this Honourable Court that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the actual cost of the construction of the railway, and the Honourable Court thereafter gave judgment on the 3rd August, 1903, in favour of the plaintiff therein in the sum of £76,225 9s. 4d., together with certain other amounts which might be found due to him, and on the 29th February, 1904, gave judgment for the said plaintiff for the sum of £73,500 12s. 7d., together with certain other and further amounts. The plaintiff craves leave to refer to the terms of the judgments of record in this Honourable Court, and annexes copies hereto marked "C" and "D" respectively.

14. On the 2nd day of March, 1904, this Honourable Court granted an order directing that all moneys received by the said Hills from the Colonial Government should be paid to the receivers, pending an action to be brought by the proper parties to decide upon the claims of the debenture holders to a preference in respect of the moneys thus paid over to the receivers. The debentures, for the benefit of whose holders payment is claimed in this action, are the debentures referred to in the said order.

15. By reason of the premises the plaintiff claims that he is entitled to claim the amount of the said debentures from the defendants herein.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims:

(a) An order declaring that the liquidator is entitled to prove against the partnership and claim payment from the receivers out of the said moneys in their hands of the amounts of the said debentures.

(b) An account of the amount due by way of interest on the said debentures.

(c) An order restraining the paying out by the receivers of any portion of the said amounts until the plaintiff's claim on behalf of the debenture-holders, with interest and costs (as hereinafter claimed) be fully satisfied.

(d) Alternative relief.

(e) Interest a tempore morae, together with costs of suit.

The plea of the defendants Edward Ridge Syfret and John Edwin Paul Close, in their capacity as receivers of the Grand Junction Railways, was:

1. The defendants admit paragraphs 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the declaration, but say that the construction referred to in paragraph 4 was done by the firm of John Walker and Sons under contract with the company.

2. They admit paragraph 5, except that they are not aware and do not admit that 1,000 debentures issued after the 20th July, 1898, by the company were issued with the knowledge, consent, and sanction of the partnership styled the Grand Junction Railways.

3. They admit the allegations in paragraphs 6 and 7 of the declaration save that they crave leave to refer to

(a) The two principal agreements entered into in May and August, 1898, constituting the said partnership of which they are receivers, and

(b) The undertaking of the 20th July, 1898, copy whereof is hereunto annexed and marked E.

4. As to paragraph 8, they beg to refer to the terms of Act No. 19 of 1900, and the schedules thereof, embodying the contracts therein referred to.

5. As to paragraph 9, they do not admit that the Government consented to any cession or assignment as therein alleged to the said Hills acting for and on behalf of the said partnership, but they say that the cession and assignment to the said Hills was by him and the other members of the partnership treated as a cession and assignment on behalf of the said partnership; and they deny that the partnership became subject to the liabilities of the company in respect of the said debentures.

6. They deny paragraph 10 of the declaration, and say specially that the plaintiff as liquidator of the Grand Junction Railways, Limited, has no title to prove, and claim the amounts of the debentures or any claim to which, after proper inquiry, persons holding such debentures may be entitled.

7. They admit paragraphs 11 and 14, save that for greater certainty they crave leave to refer to the proofs which may be adduced of the correctness of the figure of £254,769 13s. 6d., and of the amount of costs and expenses incurred after the 20th July, 1898.

8. As to paragraph 12, they crave leave to refer to the records of the actions instituted in November, 1902, and February, 1904, referred to in that paragraph and to the orders made therein for greater certainty as to the capacity wherein the said Hills sued in each action, and as to the capacity wherein he obtained the judgments.

9. They deny the plaintiff's contention in paragraph 15.

Wherefore they pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

The plea of defendant Hills, personally and as a member of the co-partnership and as receiver thereof, was:

1. The defendant admits paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, 7 (a), 7 (d) in so far as the allegations therein concern the said defendant in his capacities aforesaid, and subject to what is hereinafter stated.

2. As to paragraph 5 the defendant says specially that certain 400 of the debentures are held by persons who are in possession thereof improperly malafide, and without having given value therefor. The defendant otherwise admits paragraph 5.

3. The co-partnership was not entered into until August, 1898; paragraph 6 is otherwise admitted.

4. Paragraph 7 (b) is admitted save as to the words "acting personally and for and on behalf of the partnership" at the end of paragraph 7 (b). The defendant craves leave to refer to the document of cession when produced at the trial for the true terms thereof.

5. The defendant admits paragraph 7 (c) save that for the correct terms of the undertaking the defendant craves leave to refer to the agreement when produced at the trial.

6. The defendant says that the partnership was not a party to the agreement or cession aforesaid.

7. At the time of the said agreement and cession the company, owing to financial and other difficulties, had ceased business, and was unable to proceed with the railway contracts or to pay the debenture holders or other creditors.

8. As to paragraph 8 down to the full stop in line 8, the defendant admits the same save that as to the liabilities, to which the Thames Company was subject, defendant refers to the terms of the agreement aforesaid.

9. With regard to the remaining portion of paragraph 8, the defendant says that the debts, rights, and liabilities were preserved and kept intact by the Acts of Parliament referred to in so far only as concerned the parties to the contracts confirmed by the said Acts of Parliament.

10. The defendant admits the first part of paragraph 9 down to the full stop in line 7, save that he says that though the Colonial Government recognised only the cession to the defendant Hills personally, the said Hills held and acquired for the partnership all rights obtained by him in respect of the contracts made after the formation of the co-partnership in August, 1898.

11. The defendant, subject to the foregoing, denies all the allegations in paragraph 9 after the said full stop.

12. The defendant says that the co-partnership proceeded with the construction of the railways until 20th June, 1902, and that large sums of money were expended thereon; otherwise he denies paragraphs 10 and 11. He denies specially that the debentures are or were a debt of the partnership, and says that the partnership never undertook liability for the debentures or any part thereof. He denies that the funds of the partnership whether in the hands of the receiver or otherwise are liable to the claim of the plaintiff.

13. The allegations in paragraph 12 are not in defendant's knowledge, and he does not admit the same.

14. Paragraphs 13 and 14 are admitted save that all the moneys due under the judgments became thereafter payable to the receivers in this colony, and the defendant Hills has no control over the said money.

15. Defendant denies paragraph 15.

16. A number of the debentures issued were pledged to and are held by creditors as collateral security for the indebtedness of the partnership. So far as regards debentures so held, the defendant says that the present action is premature, the pledges not being represented by the present plaintiff, and neither the pledgees nor the plaintiff in any case being entitled to sue now in respect of any debentures by virtue of any prior action brought, or of execution issued, or of any claim made in insolvency in respect of any of the debentures.

17. Without prejudice to his right to challenge (on claim being made hereunder), the validity of the claims which may be put forward by the holders of such of the debentures as are held improperly malà fide or without valuable consideration (as in paragraph 1 set forth) the defendant says generally that the plaintiff's claim is not one that avails against the partnership, but is one on which the signatories to the agreement of 20th July, 1898, are jointly liable personally and individually, and that therefore the amounts paid to the receivers are not subject to the present claim.

Wherefore, subject to the above, the defendant Hills, in his capacities as aforesaid, prays that the claim against him may be dismissed, with costs.

In the first case: Mr. W. P. Buchanan for Plaintiffs; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington) for Grand Junction Railways; Mr. Close (with him Mr. Biset) for Hills; Mr. Russell for official liquidator of Grand Junction Railways.

In the second case: Mr. McGregor for the official liquidator.

Other counsel as in the first case.

De Villiers, C.J., stated that a letter had been received from the attorney of T. M. Cameron Walker, intimating that he was not interested in the co-partnership, and that he should not have been cited as one of the defendants. His Lordship added that it was now too late in the day to come forward with this objection.

Mr. McGregor said that, with the permission of the Court, he would briefly enter into the history of these matters. In August, 1895, Parliament passed the Act 28 of 1895, to provide for the construction of certain lines of railway. There was a schedule to that Act, which specified the lines that were to be constructed, and were to be constructed under a subsidy. Previously, in September, 1894, a company had been incorporated called the Grand Junction Railways, Ltd., whose affairs were now under consideration. In May, 1896, the Government granted to this company a cession to build on subsidy the lines mentioned in the Act of Parliament, viz., Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat, Somerset East-Fort Beaufort, and Fort Beaufort-King William's Town. This agreement was set out in 13 Shiel, p. 106. In October of the same year a similar agreement was concluded in regard to the Mossel Bay line. The construction was proceeded with, the Government paid subsidies, money was put into the lines. Then, not unnaturally, debentures were issued, the ordinary commercial expedients for providing the finances wherewith to construct such lines. In August, 1898, a further agreement was entered into for the construction of these lines of railway, and that agreement was annexed to the Act 40 of 1898, passed in the month of January, 1899, the parties to the agreement being Sir James Sive-wright, then Commissioner of Works, and David Urquhart, as representing the Thames Ironworks Company. The recital was important, because it pointed out that the Thames Ironworks Company, the new company now coming in, had agreed to take over the Government contracts for the construction of these lines of railways. Some difficulty was introduced into the case at the very outset by the shape that affairs took, because it certainly was a curious position to find that a limited company got a concession to build certain railways on certain lines and routes authorised by Parliament, that on the strength of that, they raised money by debentures—one could quite understand that such debentures furnished the finances for building the line—and after they had done that there was another agreement by which the alleged cessionary got the right further to construct the said railway. The exact position of the new cessionary on that line he should prefer not to discuss now, but would merely point out the fact that there was a curious turn given to the circumstances under which the railway was being built.

Mr. McGregor said he would confine himself to the facts. In March, 1899, an agreement was entered into which was annexed to the pleadings in the case of Hills v. Colonial Government (13 C.T.R., 106). Instructions proceeded, and debentures were issued. They found in the meantime that certain arrangements were made between Hills and Walter in May and August, 1898, under which the Grand Junction Railways partnership came into being. A cession was given by the limited company to the Thames Ironworks Company; on the same date a undertaking was given, under which Arnold Frank Hills and John Walker Bros. were to take over all liabilities of the limited company, including debentures already issued to the value of £170,000. There was also on the same date a cession by John Walker Bros of all their rights under the contract. In July, 1900, further agreements were entered into that were annexed to Act 19 of 1900. The construction thereupon proceeded until the month of June, 1902, when the Government intervened as by Statute authorised, and they got an order of Government taking the whole of the construction of these lines out of the hands of the parties then engaged upon the construction. Thereupon Mr. Hills, suing for himself and in his capacities, brought an action against the Government, and there was a fund of money now payable by the Government.

Mr. Schreiner and Mr. Close briefly stated the position of their clients in relation to the plaintiffs' claims.

Mr. Buchanan having read a number of documents on behalf of the plaintiffs, Mr. McGregor intimated that he did not propose to lead any evidence.

Mr. Schreiner said that he proposed to call Mr. J. E. P. Close on the position taken up by the receivers appointed by the Court in regard to the debentures.

John Edwin Paul Close, accountant, Cape Town, said that he was one of the receivers appointed by the Court in the matter of the Grand Junction Railways. They found that 60,000 debentures were given to the London and Westminster Bank as security for £50,000 paid to Mr. A. F. Hills to recoup him for the deposit that he had had to make with the Agent-General. This was not money required by the joint venture contract. According to the books, the London and Westminster Bank made those advances to Mr. Hills, and the amount formed part of his capital account. Mr. Hills advanced considerable sums to the partnership from time to time, both before and after he joined the partnership. The books showed that the partnership was indebted to Mr. Hills for £52,000, and for subsequent advances, £41,000. The attitude Mr. Hills took up was to pay everything into the partnership, so as to pay creditors as much as possible. The position the receivers took up was that they would be prepared to regard the London and Westminster Bank as concurrent creditors to the extent of the value received by the partnership. If the Court thought fit to appoint him to conduct the inquiry he would do so.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: The first amount of £50,000 was, he understood, given to Mr. Hills, and that was supposed to be handed over to the bank. The partnership, as between themselves would be responsible for it. The interest was charged to Mr. Hills, by the bank. Witness could not say who paid it.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Mr. Hills took up his own securities, and lodged them with the Government.

Gerald Edward Darcy Orpen stated he was a partner with Mr. Syfret. He had been working in this case, and was familiar with all the particulars. He agreed with what Mr. Close had said. He knew that the bank now had 9,250 £100 debentures. He found that only 827 debentures constituted the partnership. He did not know how the bank had got hold of the 60,000 debentures. Witness had never had any communication admitting liability from Mr. Hills. A circular was issued with regard to claims.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: He believed John Walker and Co. did about £173,000 worth of work. He did not care to speak definitely on that point, as Mr. Roy, the company's engineer, would be able to give evidence on it.

Thomas Roy stated he was engineer in charge of the Grand Junction Railway venture from 1886. In 1897, when he was refused "sinews of war," the work was at an end; but it began again when Mr. Hills undertook it. He had prepared a list of the debentures issued. Walker never did any work after October, 1897. Any work done after that date was put through by Mr. Hills. The certificates were passed by both the company and railway engineers. He was one of the referees to whom the Court referred the matter.

This closed the case for the plaintiff. No witnesses for the defence were called.

Mr. McGregor contended that the debentures gave a certain legal interest in the property. It would be idle to deny that the question was a difficult one, or that the circumstances were peculiar. They had the fact, however, that the holders were people who had advanced money on security, and they had no prior mortgages here. Counsel could not see by what right the Grand Junction partnership could be put in possession of the funds. In the first place, the cession was made to the Thames Ironworks Company, and after that to Hills, and they found after a general collapse of the whole undertaking, strangely enough, not Hills but the Grand Junction Railway coming forward as the owner of the funds to which they could only have possession as trustees. It was a very ingenious method to get out of paying debentures, and counsel submitted that the scheme could not succeed. To make the cession of '98 a good cession it was necessary to construe it as one in which the cessionaries were holders under and for the ceding company. If it were a cession in the ordinary sense, then, although he had no authority on the point, he submitted that the new company must be subject to the liabilities of the old company.

Mr. Schreiner (for the Receivers) argued that as the bank had signed the consent paper under which the receivers were appointed, he held that they were appointed as if there had been sequestration of the estate. The receivers were authorised by the bank to receive such amounts as were due from the Colonial Government and others, and also to sell any further assets, and as soon as possible frame a distribution account, and distribute the assets in accordance with the order of preference in insolvency. Therefore the principles governing this case would be the principles that would govern the estate, if it had been sequestrated. That placed the receivers in the position of trustees in insolvency. In a previous case of the kind the Chief Justice had overruled the claim, and held that an action must be brought by the proper parties to settle the point. The sums of money which formed the assets in the present case were sums of money recovered by Hills in his own name, but Hills had always dealt with the matter as if he was acting for the partnership.

De Villiers, C.J., inquired if there was any difference between the case now being heard and one in which the African Banking Corporation were concerned.

Mr. Schreiner replied that the difference was caused by the appointment of the receivers.

De Villiers, C.J., said he had not been able to find any cases under English law where debentures affected any property other than that in the possession of the company at the time. It seemed to the Court that the liquidators could not be kept out of the money owing to them any longer.

Mr. Schreiner contended that the receivers did not hold that they were liable to the debenture holders at all. The debenture holders could come in as soon as concurrent creditors, and prove not for the face value of the debentures only, but for the consideration actually received. If a man held £15,000 debentures, and had only advanced £3,000, the face value of the debentures was not £15,000, but £3,000. Counsel said he would leave that point and addressed himself to the case of the liquidators. It was difficult to understand how the liquidator could claim in face of the fact that he was only a successor to the directors, and the only asset that he possessed in law was that he himself had admitted it in the undertaking dated July 20, 1898, signed by the Thames Ironworks, John Walker and Sons, and A. Hills. These three persons in July, 1898, took over a concession to the Thames Ironworks of all property, and undertook all liability, and gave an undertaking in their own proper persons that they would pay the liability of the works, including the £170,000 debentures already issued, but this only applied to those three persons. It was true that in August, 1898, a partnership was formed, but as a partnership they never took any liability of the sort. As individuals they bound themselves, but the Thames Ironworks had nothing to do with the partnership of the other two parties. All the Thames Ironworks wanted was to be sure that it would get its money, and then it was willing that the money should be handed over to this shell of a company.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If two individuals take up an undertaking and afterwards enter into a partnership with another person, why should not the partnership be liable?]

No agreement had been entered into between the Grand Junction Railway and the partnership.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It may be that no preference could be claimed, but how can they be prevented from claiming as concurrent creditors?]

Mr. Schreiner said they objected to the last 1,000 debentures, representing £100,000 altogether. Was it fair to have those who had advanced that amount having persons who held perhaps £15,000 worth of debentures for £3,000 coming in? The minute of the 14th February, 1899, stated that at the 31st January, 1898, the amount of work done by Walker and Sons entitled them to 3,870 debentures, and thereupon it was resolved to issue 2,170 debentures. Counsel suggested an inquiry into the whole issue of debentures, in order that justice might be done.

Mr. Close contended that the liabilities on account of the debentures were not debts of the partnership, but were of private persons who signed the documents on the 20th July, 1896. At the same time, he was prepared to accept the course proposed by the Court as to the proof of the amount of the debentures as a concurrent claim against the partnership assets, subject to the bona fides of the other claims.

Mr. McGregor said that if the debentures were negotiable instruments, then they had a character of their own, and he contended nothing should be done, if the Court held that, to infringe upon their right. There was no reason in law why the same privileges and the same rights should not be accorded to these debentures as those accorded to the prior ones.

Cur. Adv. Volt.

Postea (July 26th).

De Villiers, C.J.: The substantial question raised by the first case is whether the holders of certain debentures issued by a company known as the Grand Junction Railways (Limited) are entitled to rank as preferent creditors against the assets of a partnership known as the Grand Junction Railways. The substantial question raised by the second case is whether the official liquidator of the company is entitled to prove and claim the amounts of certain debentures issued by the company as a charge upon certain sums of money paid to the receivers of the partnership by virtue of certain judgments given by this Court in favour of the partnership. It is an extraordinary circumstance in both cases that the Court is asked to declare a preference against an estate which has never yet been finally sequestrated as insolvent. A provisional order had been made against the partnership but the order was discharged by consent of the plaintiffs and defendants in that suit as well as of the other principal creditors upon certain conditions. One of the conditions was that Syfret and Close be appointed as receivers with power forthwith to issue a notice calling on creditors to file their claims and with power to receive the amounts of certain judgments awarded or to be awarded by this Court in certain suits brought by Hills, one of the present defendants and a member of the partnership against the Colonial Government, for the amount of the actual cost of several lines of railway constructed by him. Another condition was that the receivers should so soon as conveniently possible frame a distribution account of all moneys available and should distribute the same according to the legal order of preference in insolvency. The amounts awarded by the Court have been placed to the credit of the Registrar of this Court, and the main question to be decided is whether the debentures in question constitute a first charge against these amounts. The second section of Act 43 of 1895 authorises registered companies, acting within their powers, to issue debentures and cause them to be registered, and enacts that such debentures shall as from the date of their registration operate as a first or preferential charge in respect of so much of the property of the company as shall be mentioned and described in such debenture as bound by way of security for the fulfilment of the obligation undertaken by the company under such debenture. The debentures now in question do not describe any of the property of the company beyond stating that "the whole property and assets of the company subject only to the reservation in the next clause are hereby pledged and given as a first charge in security for the due payment of this bond and all debentures issued under it." The reservation in the next clause is as follows: "The company reserves power and right to deal with any property and assets provided the proceeds of such shall be placed to credit of capital and not to that of revenue account." I have already, in the African Banking Corporation case, indicated my views in regard to these provisions, and I will here only add that the debenture-holders in my opinion acquire no greater rights under the bond than are enjoyed by the holder of a duly registered general bond. There are no ear-marked assets, movable or immovable, upon which the charge can operate, and the only preference which the debenture-holders can claim in the winding-up of the company is that they shall be paid before any of the unsecured creditors can share in the distribution of its assets as they existed at the date of the order for winding up. By a series of cessions, some of which almost have the appearance of juggles, the construction of the railways passed out of the hands of the company to a partnership having the same title as the company and from the partnership to the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company, and then again from the last-named company to the defendant Hills. On the 20th of July, 1898, Hills and the firm of John Walker and Sons agreed with the company to pay all its debts including the debentures theretofore issued by it. At that time £170,000 worth had been issued. On the 15th of August, 1898, the members of the partnership, viz., Hills and John Walker and Sons, entered into a formal agreement whereby it was agreed, inter alia, that the partnership should be entitled to all subsidies due to John Walker and Sons from the company and to the debentures, 827 in number, of £100 each, of the company subject to any existing charges thereon. It is now contended that by reason of the partnership having taken over the liabilities of the company, the preference which would have been awarded to the debenture-holders as against the company should be extended to the assets of the partnership. No fresh bond was passed by the partnership, and I fail to see how the bond passed by the company can in any way create a preference against assets belonging to another persona and not specially pledged or mortgaged to the debenture-holders before they became the property of the partnership. The bond, as I have said, operates as a general bond, and can only affect the assets of the persona which passed the bond, and that is the company. In regard to the claim of the liquidator of the company for payment from the receivers out of the moneys in their hands of the amounts of the debentures, there is this difficulty, that it is impossible to gather from the evidence what proportion of the debentures was lawfully issued as against the company. If the evidence had been sufficient for the purpose, the more satisfactory course would have been to give judgment for the liquidator for the whole of the indebtedness of the partnership to the company. The liquidator of the company is also one of the receivers of the partnership, and between them they ought to be able to ascertain what that indebtedness amounts to. Having ascertained the amount, the receivers would be justified in allowing the liquidator to prove for the amount as a concurrent creditor, without first asking the Court to find the amount. The sole object of the liquidators' present action seems to be to obtain an order that the amount of the debentures be paid out of the sums paid to the receivers by virtue of the two previous judgments of this Court. Those judgments, however, were given for the actual cost of the work done by the plaintiffs in the previous cases, and the amounts paid thereunder cannot be charged with a preferential claim in favour either of the debenture-holders or of the company which issued the debentures. The receivers, by their plea, express their willingness to allow the debenture-holders to prove as concurrent creditors to the extent to which they have given value for their debentures. The apprehension of the receivers seems to be, not only that debenture-holders might claim more than they have advanced on the security of the debentures, but that Mr. John Walker, one of the partners, and the principal debenture-holder, might come into competition with the creditors of the partnership in the distribution of the assets of the partnership. These are matters, however, upon which the receivers should exercise their own judgment without the assistance of the Court. If they find that there is a debt owing by the partnership to the company, they should pay the debt to the liquidator if they have sufficient assets for the purpose. But I cannot see that there is any obligation on them to make direct payments to any of the creditors of the company. They have to realise and distribute the assets of the partnership, and they must leave it to the liquidator of the company to realise and distribute the assets of the company. The debenture-holders must make their claim on the assets of the company, the liquidator of which will, no doubt, award to them the preference due to the holders of a general bond. There must be absolution in each of the two cases, and the costs must be paid by the respective plaintiffs.

His Lordship added that Mr. Justice Hopley, who heard the cases along with himself, concurred in the judgment.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN, and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

APPEALS.

CAVE'S IMPERIAL BREWERY OR CAVE'S SOLID BEER
SYNDICATE, LTD. (Defendants), Appellants, v. THE CAPE GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS (Plaintiffs), Respondents.

1904.
July 13th.
" 26th.

Freight—Mistake—Undercharge —Relief—Railway.

The defendants, on receiving a consignment of drums of extract of malt at B., which had been conveyed on the plaintiff's railway from P., paid the amount of freight charged by the railway official at B. The plaintiff subsequently discovered that the official had by mistake made an undercharge, and, before the defendants had in any way altered their position, the plaintiff demanded the difference. There was no evidence that the railway tariff book, by which the official had to be guided, was needlessly obscure, or that the official had been guilty of gross carelessness.

Held, affirming the judgment of the High Court of Southern Rhodesia, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the difference.

This was an appeal from a decision of the High Court of Southern Rhodesia, dismissing an appeal by the present appellants from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Bulawayo, granting a decree against the appellants for the sum of £50, amount due for work and labour done and services rendered. The appellant had been summoned in the Magistrate's Court for the sum of £51 4s. 3d. (less £1 4s. 3d., to bring the matter within the jurisdiction of the Court), for carriage hire, work, and labour done, and services rendered in carrying a certain number of drums of malt from Port Elizabeth to Bulawayo. The respondents carried 52 drums of extract of malt, later on 126 drums, and at a yet later date 174. In the alternative the plaintiff stated he, by an error, under-charged the defendant £51 4s. 3d., through his officers and employees in Bulawayo having in error charged the defendant 12s. 7d. per 100 lb. for carriage, instead of 16s. 1d., the proper legal and tariffed charges, therefore, the defendant being well aware of the error, which sum, although often requested so to do, he neglected and refused to pay. The defendants in their plea stated they were not indebted to plaintiffs as alleged, and as a further plea stated that goods were delivered to the plaintiffs for carriage, from Port Elizabeth to Bulawayo, on the condition that the plaintiffs would charge the defendant for such carriage on arrival at Bulawayo. On arrival the plaintiffs charged the defendants £29 8s. 11d., £55 1s. 7d., and £99 12s. 5d., respectively, for the three consignments mentioned, and when defendants paid that sum the contracts were concluded. The amounts were fair and reasonable and defendants were not aware, and had no means of knowing that the rates charged by plaintiffs were not the ordinary current rates. As a further plea the defendants stated that the plaintiffs' agents contracted with them for the conveyance of the consignment at owner's risk and undamagable rate, and plaintiffs accepted such consignment, and carried it in pursuance of such contract at 12s. 7d. per 100 lb. The defendants held that the error as having been made by the plaintiffs' officers and employees, was not a justus error, as it was the duty of the plaintiffs, their servants, and agents to know what rate to charge, and they having such knowledge charged 12s. 7d. per 100 lb. The plaintiffs in their replication to the defendant's plea denied that there had been any special agreement between plaintiffs and defendants with regard to the carriage of the goods at a low rate, and on the contrary, stated that some of the drums of extract of malt were damaged, and the defendant was paid for them.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor) for appellants. Mr. H. Jones with him Mr. Nightingale for respondents.

Mr. Schreiner contended that the first claim was quite out of the question, as there was no balance due, the plaintiffs in accepting the money having concluded the contract, therefore the plaintiff could only recover on the alternative claim. The defendant's plea set out that he considered he had paid the proper amount, and was not cognisant of the fact that the amount charged was less than he was supposed to pay. He thought it would simplify matters if he stated that he did not just at present intend to quote the real tariff rates, because he did not know them. He did not know why the plaintiffs had fixed on 16s. 1d., because although he had carefully perused the tariff book, he was unable to find it stated there. The charges which the defendant had paid had been going on for years. Where was the limitation? If this appeal failed, the plaintiffs would hold a sword over the people's heads for years, and probably be able to claim for unlimited periods, and in that way ruin firms. A settlement of accounts was final, and if that were not the principle, business would be very much deranged. From every case in which justus error was discussed it would be seen in this particular case the Court would not hold it was a justus error.

Mr. Jones said that the case was a very simple one, and was on all fours with the case of a purchaser who did not look at his own list, and requested goods from a shopkeeper at cost price. Surely the shopkeeper, if he made a mistake, would be entitled to recover the balance? Assuming that the Government had given a receipt for the 12s. 7d. rate, even that would not estop them from proceeding to recover the balance of the proper rate. His learned friend's argument, he contended, was not sound, and he submitted the judgments should not be reversed. The error was one which any person in the position of a railway clerk could easily make, and it was not of such a nature as to debar the Government from making any claim they might have in equity.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (July 26).

De Villiers, C.J.: It is clear from the evidence in this case that on the arrival of the drums of extract of malt in question at Bulawayo, the plaintiff's officials there made an undercharge for the freight due for conveyance by railway from Port Elizabeth. The freight legally chargeable was 16s. 1d. per 100 lb., whereas the rate charged was 12s. 7d. per 100 lb. The drums were delivered to the defendants, but no receipt was given to them for the amount paid. An action was subsequently brought by the Commissioner of Public Works in the Resident Magistrate's Court for the difference of freight, and alternatively for relief against the mistake committed by the railway officials at Bulawayo, and judgment was given in favour of the plaintiff. On appeal to the High Court of Southern Rhodesia, that Court dismissed the appeal, and the defendants now appeal to this Court against the judgment of the High Court. The case has been argued on behalf of the defendants as if a discharge from further liability for freight had been given by the railway officials to the defendants, but, as I have already remarked, no receipt of any kind was given. Reliance is, however, placed on an admission made by one of the plaintiff's witnesses at the trial that the defendants would not have obtained delivery of the goods if they had refused to pay the freight demanded. This admission does not show that the acceptance of the freight and delivery of the goods constitute a complete discharge from all further liability in respect of freight. Unless there were such a discharge, there is no reason in law why the plaintiff should not, on discovery of the mistake, claim the balance of the freight owing on the goods. But, assuming that the transaction constituted a discharge, the question would still remain whether the plaintiff is entitled to be relieved against the mistake which was undoubtedly made by his officials. Mr. Schreiner admits that it was a mistake of fact, but he contends that the mistake was so gross that the plaintiff cannot avail himself of it. I cannot agree to this view. The classification of goods like extract of malt is by no means a simple matter, and a mistake like the one in question might easily be made in the press of work by the most careful official. The mistake made by the clerk in the case of Wiggins v. Colonial Government (16 S.C., 425) was of a different nature. There the clerk charged for melons not placed in any receptacle as if they had been placed in bags, and the tariff book clearly indicated what charge he ought to have made. In the present case the tariff book was not equally clear. It is said that if the tariff book is obscurely worded, the department ought to suffer for the obscurity. No evidence, however, was given on the point, and in the absence of such evidence, I am not prepared to decide that it would have been possible to make the tariff so clear as to obviate any possible mistake. There is this further difference between the case of Wiggins v. Colonial Government and the present case, that there the consignor was induced by the clerk's mistake to send goods by train which he would otherwise not have sent; whereas in the present case there is no proof whatever that the defendants' position was in any way altered by the mistake. If, for instance, it had been proved that in consequence of being charged freight at the lower rate, he had sold the extract of malt at a lower rate than he otherwise would have done, there would have been fair ground for holding that relief should not be granted. In the absence, however, of any evidence to show that the parties cannot be reinstated in the positions in which they would have been if the proper charge had been made and paid, I am of opinion that the Courts below correctly decided in favour of the plaintiff. The appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

Buchanan, J., concurred.

De Villiers, C.J., added that Hopley, J., also agreed with the judgment.

REX V. BOTHA.

Act 35 of 1893—Jurisdiction of Circuit Courts.

While increasing the jurisdiction of Magistrates, Act 35 of 1893 in no way reduces that of judges in respect of punishment for offences committed under the Act.

This was an appeal from the Circuit Court of Barkly East. The accused was charged under the Stock Thefts Act of 1893 and found guilty of being in possession of five head of cattle belonging to a farmer named Loubacher, of Barkly East. At the trial, counsel for the prisoner asked the presiding judge to reserve the point that the Court had no jurisdiction under that particular Act. The judge refused to reserve the point.

Mr. Rainsford (for the appellant) contended that according to the Act, if the prisoner could not give a satisfactory explanation of being in possession of the cattle, the Magistrate could assume his guilt, but it did not provide that juries could do so. The accused had been charged under a particular Act, and the powers of the Court under that Act as to punishment were limited.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown) was not heard.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the Act 35 of 1893 had a twofold effect. It increased the jurisdiction of the magistrates, and it facilitated proofs of theft of stock, but there was nothing in the Act which implied that there was any intention on the part of the Legislature to reduce the power of the judges in the infliction of punishment, and that the higher Courts were intended to retain their jurisdiction was perfectly clear. The 20th section clearly showed there might be cases in which the jurisdiction conferred on the Magistrate by the 13th section would not be considered sufficient, and in which the higher Court should be called in to aid to inflict suitable punishment. There was a charge of theft, and looking at the evidence, there was clear proof of theft quite independent of the Act, and even if it was a contravention of this Act he was of opinion that the higher Courts had jurisdiction. The point reserved must be decided in favour of the Crown.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

{ 1904.
{ July 14th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the admission of James Cowan O'Reilly as an attorney-at-law, notary public, and conveyancer. The applicant had served three years, and twenty days over, but he had had three months' sick leave.

Application granted and oaths administered.

VAN DER BYL V. KABER.

Mr. Sutton moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £100, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent., and that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Order granted.

MARCHAND V. TALANDA.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence on a deed for £50, balance of rent, less £5 paid for repairs, with costs, and for an order of ejectment from the premises.

Order granted.

NORTHAMPTON BANK V. { 1904.
WARD AND CO. { July 14th.

Provisional sentence — Legal holder of bill—Knowledge of equities.

On a claim for provisional sentence by the holder of a bill of exchange against the acceptor, the defence was raised that the goods for the price, of which the bill had been accepted, did not correspond to the goods actually bought, but the plaintiff denied any knowledge of any defence which the acceptor might have against the drawer. Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to provisional sentence.

This was an application for provisional sentence for £370 on a certain bill of exchange with interest and costs.

The affidavit of Thomas Ward, managing director of Thomas Ward and Co., stated that the company carried on business as merchants in Cape Town. Since March, 1903, they had the sole right in South Africa to sell a certain patent boot, and extensive orders were placed with Abbot and Sons, of Northampton. The boots were not manufactured according to the samples, with the result that the defendant firm was mulcted in heavy damages. The mode of payment was by draft, payable at three months in London. Two drafts amounting to £1,179 ls. had already been paid, and cash payments had been made to Abbot and Sons from time to time.

The affidavit of the bank manager stated that he knew nothing of the business relations between Abbott and Son and the defendant company. The bill was discounted in the ordinary course.

Mr. McGregor (for defendant) thought that the matter should be ordered to stand over for the principal case, and argued that by Act 19 of 1893 presentation of a bill is not required in order to make the acceptor liable if the acceptance be general. Pay to A B at C D is a general acceptance, unless the words "and not elsewhere" are added. Prince, Vincent and Co. v. Grand Junction Railway (12 C.T.R., 238).

De Villiers, C.J., said that the bank was the legal holder of the bill, and it lay upon the defendant to show that the bank was not the bona fide holder for value. The defendant made an assertion—a very grave assertion—but it was categorically denied by the bank manager, who said that he had no knowledge of any defence the defendant might have against the drawer. It was clear that the bank was entitled to provisional sentence, which would be granted, with costs.

HEYDENRYCH V. DUNMAN.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £270, for value received.

Mr. M. de Villiers put in the affidavit of the defendant, which set out that in November, 1902, she went to Mr. Stephan, who promised to get her a loan of £250. Subsequently, she was introduced to the lender, and Mr. Stephan said that she should sign a note for £270, and it was agreed that the £20 would be returned when the debt was paid. Interest was paid at the rate of 3 per cent. On the 16th August she paid £237 19s. 6d. to Mr. Stephan. The plaintiff never disputed Messrs. Sibbet and Stephan's right to receive the money. On the 13th October she received a letter from the plaintiff to pay the amount of the promissory note, and that was after she had told plaintiff on the street that she had settled with Stephan. The plaintiff wrote to her that if she did not pay the money he would proceed against her. She saw Stephan, and he said that he had taken over the loan himself. The plaintiff admitted the transaction in the presence of Mr. Stephan, adding that he did not mind as long as the interest was paid. In June, six months later, she received another letter from the plaintiff, threatening to take proceedings. The affidavit of Mr. Stephan set out that the plaintiff agreed to let him have the loan on the same security, he (Stephan) hypothecating his property as security.

Mr. Schreiner read the affidavit of the plaintiff, which set out that the arrangement was that she was to return the principal to him personally. Stephan said that the defendant had agreed to let him have the money as long as he paid the interest, and the defendant admitted that to plaintiff. Deponent told her that she would have to get the money for him. Subsequently Stephan told him that he had a purchaser for the defendant's property, and that she would pay him the money herself. He denied the conversation as set out by the defendant and Stephan as to a transference of the debt. He knew that Stephan at that time was in financial difficulties, and even if he had asked for a loan, plaintiff would not have given it without very good security. He said Stephan was the same person at present under a charge of theft in another case, for converting a client's money to his own use.

De Villiers, C.J.: If the statements made by the defendant are true, it is perfectly clear that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed. It would be a grievous injustice to the defendant to give provisional sentence if the facts as stated here are true. She says that Stephan acted as agent for the plaintiff. Interest was paid to him as agent of the plaintiff. Stephan corroborates her statement. He says that he received the interest as the agent of Heydenrych, and paid over that interest to Heydenrych as his agent, and he says that the capital sum was paid over to him, and that it was arranged between him and the plaintiff that the money should be lent to him instead of to the defendant. The statements of these two witnesses are corroborated by Miss Legrew, who was present when the conversation took place between Stephan and the plaintiff, and she understood from that conversation that it was arranged that Stephan should take over the debt. At this stage I wish to say no more than this: that the probabilities of the case are in favour of the defendant. At all events, it is not a case in which the Court should give provisional sentence. The plaintiff should go into the principal case, and the costs in this application will be costs in the cause.

MALMESBURY BOARD OF EXECUTORS V. KENNEDY.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a series of mortgage bonds for £300, £200, £300, £150, £100, £250, for £10 9s. premium of insurance paid, with costs, that the property specially mortgaged be declared executable, and under 329d, for £20 3s., money expended by the plaintiff, and £1 1s. paid for the defendant, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

VAN DER BEEG V. MAKE.

Mr. Russell moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £100, with interest from 1st July, 1903, and costs. The Bond became due by reason of non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

MALAN V. STRYDOM.

Dr. Krause moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £600, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent., and for £1 9s. 6d., and that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Order granted.

WALSH AND WALSH V. ERSKINE AND SADLER.

Mr. Gardiner said that in this matter he moved against Erskine only. Both defendants had been served by edictal citation, but there had been no return in the case of Sadler. He moved for provisional sentence for £7,000, balance due on a mortgage bond which had become due by reason of non-payment of interest, and £56, being money expended for the defendant; also for £24 18s. 4d. and £32, quitrents and cash advanced, and that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Order granted.

MARAIS V. HARRISON.

Mr. Sutton moved for provisional sentence on two mortgage bonds, one for £3,500, with interest at 6 per cent. from July 1, 1903, and one for £1,000, with interest at 6 per cent. from 18th August, 1903, with costs, and that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Mr. Burton (for the defendant) read the affidavit of the defendant, in which he admitted his signature with power to pass the bond. He was not now in a position, owing to an action, which had been taken against him by his wife for a decree of separation, to meet all his creditors, but if execution was stayed there would be ample funds for all creditors.

Mr. Sutton said he had instructions to consent to a stay of execution as regarded the capital for one month; but no stay as regarded the interest.

Sir H. Juta (for the receivers of defendant's estate) pointed out that the receivers had power to realise, and the plaintiff should not have proceeded against Harrison at all. He should deal with the receivers.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, but he wants his money.]

Then let him come to us.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He does come to you.]

But he makes Harrison the defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: And he is the proper defendant.]

Plaintiff should not have gone behind the receiver's back and sued Harrison, who has not got the property, and cannot deal with it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing he had come to you, how could you avoid paying the debt?]

Sir H. Juta said he was not instructed on the merits, and he held that the plaintiff should have approached the receiver.

De Villiers, C.J., said he thought that for the sake of the plaintiff, it would be better to accept the terms offered. There would be provisional sentence for the capital, and interest, and stay of execution as regarded the capital for three months.

ORCHARD V. BREDARDORP } 1904.
LICENSING COURT. { July 14th.

Liquor licence — Conditions —
Coloured people — Prohibition.

The Licensing Court of B. imposed a condition on a licence granted to the applicant that he shall not sell liquor to coloured persons without a permit, and another condition that he shall not sell liquor after ten a.m. on the Saturday before Nachtmal.

Held, that these conditions could not be legally imposed.

This was an application for a review of the proceedings of the Bredasdorp Licensing Court, held on the 2nd March, 1904, on the grounds that such proceedings were illegal. The applicant owned an hotel in Bredasdorp, and at the last Licensing Court, which was presided over by the Resident Magistrate (Mr. Scully), several orders were made on his licence, one of which was that coloured people should only be allowed to obtain drink between the hours of 11 a.m. and 1 p.m., and that only on a permit from a European master, and also that no drink be sold after 10 a.m. on the Saturday preceding "Nachtmal."

Mr. Schreiner (for the applicant): We say that these conditions are ultra vires. The Court has no power to draw a distinction as to colour.

[Mr. Scully (R.M. of Bredasdorp, who appeared on behalf of the Licensing Court): I admit the illegality of that.]

We ask this Court either to amend these conditions, or to direct the Licensing Court to amend them, and to substitute "native" for "coloured person."

[Mr. Scully: As chairman of the Licensing Court I consent to that.]

Then I would suggest that liquor should be supplied to natives not only on the certificate of a "European master" but of any master who is a registered voter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would it not be better to refer the matter back to the Licensing Court?]

That is the usual practice, a coloured registered voter is on exactly the same footing as a white man; and here "European" evidently means white man, and not merely one born in Europe. As to the prohibition of the sale of liquor on the Saturday before "Nachtmal" see Queen v. Van Zyl (3 C.T.R., 289). Act 25 of 1891, sec. 1, sub-sec. 2 (b) gives a Licensing Court no power to prohibit the sale of liquor after 10 a.m. The Court had already fixed the hours of sale for all days save Sundays, Good Friday, and Christmas Day, and they could not single out any other days for exceptional treatment. Another point is that canteens cannot be opened till 11, and then they prohibit all sale after 10. That is total prohibition for the day.

De Villiers, C.J.: I fully appreciate the desire of the magistrates to check drunkenness amongst the coloured people of Bredasdorp, but any desire of that kind has to be carried out according to law. The law makes no distinction between coloured people and white people, but it does between the natives and coloured people, and gives a definition of "natives." In my opinion, it was beyond the powers of the Licensing Board to place the condition as to "coloured people" on the licence. On the second point, it seems to me that it is on the same footing as the case of Van Zyl, heard some time ago. The prohibition extends from 10 a.m. on the day prior to Nachtmal, and consequently the sale of liquor to natives on that day is prohibited for the whole day; because, under ordinary circumstances, the canteen does not open until 11 o'clock. There is nothing in the Act which provides for the prohibition of the sale of liquor on the day prior to Nachtmal. I therefore declare both conditions to be illegal. If the Licensing Board wishes to amend the first condition by substituting the word "natives" for "coloured people," I presume the machinery of the 92nd section of the Act will be sufficient to enable the Licensing Board to reconsider its decision, and the proper course will be to substitute "natives" for "coloured people." The Court will therefore make an order in accordance with the summons, but there will be no order as to costs. It seems to me that the Licensing Board has acted quite bona fide in the course they have pursued.

Mr. Buchanan, on behalf of the applicant, Ruby Catherine Howard Armstrong, applied for leave to sue the respondent, Frederick Lawrence Armstrong, by edictal citation. He stated that the applicant and respondent were married on the 6th December, 1894, in St. Mark's Church, Cape Town, by the Rev. W. L. Clementson. After the marriage they went to reside at Woodstock for about two and a half months, when the respondent got into financial difficulties, and left petitioner in March, 1895, for Victoria, Mashonaland. About six months after petitioner joined him. During that time respondent drank heavily. Petitioner becoming ill returned to Cape Town for a change. Since then petitioner received a few letters from him, but these soon ceased, and she had not heard from him since. About June last year petitioner's brother, while on a visit to Beira, saw the respondent, who informed him that he was settled there. It had come to petitioner's knowledge that her husband had been unfaithful to her, and had openly lived an immoral life at Beira, and had committed adultery with divers prostitutes. Petitioner was desirous of instituting proceedings against her husband for divorce by edictal citation, and was desirous of having the evidence of Tilly Brook and May Leslie taken on commission, and requested that Mr. R. H. Greville, British Consul, be appointed commissioner.

The application was granted, and the return day fixed for October 31.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

ESTATE DE JAGER V. { 1904.
THYSSE. { July 15th.

Interdict — Trespass — Prescription.

This was an application on behalf of the executors in the estate of the late

Cornelius Johannes Jagger, for an interdict to restrain the respondent from taking possession of portion of the farm Pogelsdrift, in the Oudtshoorn district. The petition of the applicant stated that the respondent intended taking forcible possession of certain portions of the farm which he intended cultivating. The respondent was a tenant of another portion of the farm, but had no claim whatsoever to the portion in question.

The respondent's affidavit stated he had been in possession of the farm he now held for the past 30 years. It had ever since been occupied by him or his wife, to whom he was married in community of property. He denied that he had taken forcible possession of the farm, but that he had held it under lease for years. The piece of land in dispute was pointed out to witness in 1874 by his wife's father as her marriage portion.

Certain replying affidavits stated that the respondent had only taken possession of the farm during the past few years, and consequently could not have been held by him for the past thirty years as stated.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan (for the applicant). The present application arises out of a case which has, in various forms, been several times before the Court. In 1875 (Buch. p. 86) the case of De Jager v. Scheepers was heard. De Jager had left a farm to his two sons, with fidei commissum to the eldest son of the elder son. The younger of the two sons of the testators, on the death of his elder brother, claimed that brother's share of the farm in virtue of a supposed jus accrescendi. It was, however, held that there was no jus accrescendi. The case came up again in 1880. De Jager v. Scheepers and others (Forde, 120). There the question of prescription was raised, and it was held that prescription did not run until the property was out of the hands of fiduciary. In the case of De Jager v. De Jager (Ap. 1-423), the Court held that the eldest grandson of the testator was entitled to succeed to a half share of the farm, and this decision was upheld on appeal to the Privy Council (Ap. 2-146). As to the claim on the ground of prescription, there can be no prescription unless the occupation is nec vi, nec clam, nec precario. There the occupation was certainly precario. The possessor cannot, therefore, show 30 years' prescription. Then, again, Johannes Stephanus was only a fiduciary, and prescription does not begin to run until the property has left the hands of the fiduciary. We ask, therefore, for an interdict restraining the respondent from cultivating the land at Pogelsdrift, which is enclosed by the wire fence.

Mr. J. E. de Villiers (for the respondent): Applicant's contention is not in accordance with the notice of motion. We have occupied the portion of the farm outside of the wire fence for 50 years. As to prescription not running against Johannes Stephanus, we do not claim under the will.

[Buchanan, J.: It is difficult to prescribe an individual portion of a farm.]

But we held that pro diviso, and I submit we could prescribe as to this against Gideon's branch of the family. Our prescriptive rights to that portion of the farm on which the house is situated are not attacked.

Mr. Buchanan (in reply) was not called upon.

Buchanan, J.: The applicants as the executors of the estate, hold the legal transfer and title to the property in dispute. They ask for an interdict to restrain the respondent from trespassing on any part of the farm over which they have legal rights. The respondent claims the right to be on the farm under a license from his father-in-law, who he says thirty years ago pointed out part of the farm as being the share belonging to the respondent's wife under the will of her grand-parents. Since then this will has been the subject of litigation, and the claim of persons in the same relationship as respondent's wife was set up first in the Oudtshoorn Circuit Court, then on appeal to the Supreme Court, and finally to the Privy Council, and all these tribunals decided adversely to the right now claimed by respondent through his wife. The main objection set up by respondent therefore fails. But he also alleges that he has been in possession of a portion of the farm as of right for a period of thirty years, and he now claims a title by prescription. He further says that during that period he has improved the property by building a house on it worth £200. The ground principally relied upon by the respondent is a very weak one. As the matter now stands the plaintiffs are clearly entitled to an interdict, and an interdict will be granted, but with a stay of execution for four months, which will enable respondent to establish by action any right he may have on the property, for compensation for any improvements. Costs of the application will follow the result of the action if brought otherwise, to be paid by respondent. Respondent must also be restrained at once from trespassing on the part of the farm enclosed by a wire fence, which was formerly leased to Meiring and to which he clearly has no right.

STRYDOM AND OTHERS v. s 1904.

BLIGNAULT AND OTHERS. (July 15th.

Interdict — Disposal of surplus funds collected for a specific object by public subscription.

This was an application calling on the respondents to show cause why an order should not be granted to interdict a certain committee comprised of the respondents from parting with a certain sum of money, which was subscribed for the purpose of celebrating the King's Coronation at Calitzdorp. The amount of money in hands was pretty large. The history of the case was as follows: A public meeting was called in Calitzdorp prior to the King's Coronation, and subscriptions were called for. A certain sum of money was collected, and it was found that it was more than was necessary for the costs of the sports, so the petitioners decided to make a lasting memento to the memory of His Majesty, by making a recreation ground, and applied to the respondents to lodge the amount of money in hands, to the credit of the committee of the recreation ground, as was agreed to at a public meeting, but they refused to do so.

Mr. W. P. Schreiner, K.C., appeared for the applicants, and Sir H. Juta, K.C., appeared for respondent. Mr. Close watched the case on behalf of the Rev. Mr. Barry.

[Buchanan, J.: What do the respondents propose doing with the money?]

Mr. Schreiner: They want to have a Market-square, and we propose a recreation ground. Mr. Blignault, who acted as treasurer to the committee, formed by the respondents, and who were the supporters of the Market-square, did not keep the subscriptions in a separate account in the bank at all, but mixed it with his own money. He purchased a portion of his own property for the Market-square. The main point that the Court had to decide was whether people of Calitzdorp were to have a recreation ground or a Market-square.

[Buchanan, J.: It is a shame that the money subscribed for such a purpose should be spent in litigation.]

Mr. Schreiner said his clients had tried to impress that point on the respondents, but they would not listen to them. His clients relied on the findings of the public meeting, at which, by a large majority, it was decided to purchase a recreation ground; whilst the respondents relied on the decision arrived at by a public meeting, held during the existence of martial law, and at which they said there was a large gathering, but which petitioners claimed was not properly advertised. In fact, so badly was it done, that many of the principal people in the village knew nothing of the meeting.

Sir Henry Juta read answering affidavits made by the respondents, in which it was stated that at the meeting at which it was decided to ask for subscriptions towards defraying the cost of the Coronation festivities, it was agreed that if there was any balance, it should be devoted to the purchase of a market square, and the resolution to the effect was actually seconded by one of the petitioners in the present case. They claimed that the meeting was properly advertised and thoroughly representative. At the meeting there was considerable obstruction, caused by most of the present petitioners, who brought a number of school boys to support them. They contended that a market square was more likely to be for the welfare of the town than a recreation ground.

Mr. Schreiner read a replying affidavit, which alleged that a petition got up by the committee in favour of the market square had been signed by persons who were not ratepayers, and in some instances had been signed more than once by the same person. With regard to the statement that obstruction at the meeting was caused by school children, various witnesses stated that there were only three school children present, who did not vote.

Mr. Close did not oppose the application, but only applied for costs.

Buchanan, J., said he thought the best course to adopt would be to either return the money to the subscribers, or else let the chairman of the Municipality take a poll of the subscribers as to the manner in which the money should be spent. The money in the meantime to be lodged in the Standard Bank, to the credit of the Coronation Fund.

Mr. Schreiner said if the Court, in its judgment, would give an expression of opinion as to which object was best, a recreation ground or a market square, it would tend to save any amount of ill-feeling.

The Court made an order authorising the Assistant Magistrate to take a poll of the subscribers on or before August 31, and to report to the Court as soon after the 31st August as possible.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C. K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ESTATE BLACK AND SIMON'S } 1904.
TOWN MUNICIPALITY V. } July 18th.
JACKSON AND CO., LTD.

Mr. Close moved for the appointment of a commission to take the evidence of Rear-Admiral Durnford, who was about to leave Simon's Town for some months.

De Villiers, C.J., asked counsel if it were not desirable to take the evidence of other witnesses on admission.

Mr. Close said that another witness was staying behind for a week or two.

De Villiers, C.J., said there was no chance of the case being heard before next term.

Mr. Close said in that case he would apply for the commission to include the evidence of Mr. H. C. Winn Edwards, subject to the consent of the other side.

An order was made accordingly, Mr. Advocate Russell to act as commissioner, costs to be costs in the cause.

INELSON V. NELSON.

This was an action for judicial separation, brought by the wife against her husband on the ground of cruelty. Mr. Upington was for the plaintiff; Mr. Burton was for the defendant.

Mr. Upington said that the plaintiff claimed a judicial separation on the ground of certain cruelty alleged in the declaration. The defendant claimed in reconvention a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, on the ground of malicious desertion. The case would now be very much shortened. The plaintiff's legal advisers, after considering the case of Doran v. Doran (13 C.T.R., 781, 929), which was very similar in its features, had come to the conclusion not to proceed with the claim for judicial separation, and they would not oppose the application for a decree of restitution of conjugal rights. He was instructed by the plaintiff that on no account would she return to or live with her husband, and under these circumstances he (Mr. Upington) would, on behalf of the plaintiff, withdraw the claim in the declaration. He understood that the defendant was willing that the two younger children of the marriage should remain with the plaintiff, and that he was prepared to pay a sum of £6 a month towards their maintenance.

Mr. Burton said that, under the circumstances, he proposed merely to lead formal evidence as to the desertion.

Andries Nelson (the defendant) was called. He said he was married to the plaintiff in May, 1895, out of community of property. They had had three children—two boys and a girl. The oldest child was 8½ years of age. They lived together for some time, but towards the end of last year their relationships became very strained. In April of this year the plaintiff deserted him, and she refused to return to him.

By the Court: The furniture and certain life policies were conferred upon his wife by the ante-nuptial contract.

Cross-examined: He did not object to the two younger children remaining with his wife, provided he could have reasonable access once a week. He was claiming back the life policies which he had ceded to his wife.

Mr. Burton (replying to the Court) said that they did not press for costs.

Decree of restitution granted, plaintiff to return to or receive the defendant on or before the 1st August, failing which to show cause on the 18th August why a decree of divorce should not be granted, defendant to have custody of the eldest child of the marriage, or to pay to the plaintiff £3 a month towards the maintenance of each of the two other children until 16 years of age, plaintiff to have been declared to have forfeited the benefits of the marriage, each party to pay her or his own costs. On the claim in convention, the order of the Court was absolution from the instance.

WARNER V. SCHULTZ.

Partnership—Racehorse—Costs.

This was an action brought by Robert Charles Warner, of Cape Town, coal merchant, against one Schulz, of Three Anchor Bay, to recover balance of account.

The declaration set out that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in three sums, viz., £26 odd in respect of money lent, £37 10s., being half the purchase price of a certain racehorse called Joe Chamberlain, and £93 10s., money lent and advanced by Mr. R. Warner, carrying on business as R. Warner and Co., and services in and about the endorsement of certain promissory notes. The said R. Warner, trading as aforesaid, had ceded his business to the present plaintiff, more particularly in relation to the debt owing by the defendant.

Defendant, in his plea, admitted that he owed the loan of £26 he had received from the plaintiff, but he disputed the other transactions. As to the racehorse, Joe Chamberlain, he said that the horse was left in his charge by the plaintiff when he left Pietersberg, Transvaal, and witness left it in charge of his son, from whom it was requisitioned by the Transvaal authorities during the war. No compensation had been paid. In regard to paragraph 4 of the declaration, he admitted that he was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £59 18s. 1d., being balance of account and interest thereon; but he said that he had tendered the said sum to the plaintiff. He denied that he had agreed to pay the plaintiff any sum of money for services in or about the endorsing of the promissory notes. He said further that he was entitled to half share of a prize of £150 won by the said racehorse, and also to a sum of £35, in respect of the feeding of the horse for seven months at £5 a month. He also said that he was entitled to set off the sum of £68 10s. against the amount of £86 14s. 4d., which he admitted that he owed the plaintiff, and he tendered to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £18 14s. 4d., together with costs. Subject to the above tender, he claimed in reconvention the sum of £68 10s.

The plaintiff in replication said the prize in question was not £150, but £107 8s. 6d. He admitted the tender, but said the same was insufficient, and he prayed that the claim in reconvention might be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Upington for plaintiff; Mr. P. T. Jones for defendant.

Mr. Upington read the evidence of several witnesses in the Transvaal, taken on commission.

The plaintiff, Robert Charles Warner, said he was carrying on business in Cape Town as R. Warner and Co. As to the racehorse, they purchased this animal in partnership in May, 1899. He was then living at Pietersberg, Transvaal. The horse won an event, and the prize was £107 8s. 6d. gross. Witness left the Transvaal on account of the war. Subsequently the defendant came down to Cape Town, and he approached witness with a view of raising money to start a boarding-house at Three Anchor Bay, Milner Hall. He wanted £750. Witness obtained £150 from the business of R. Warner and Co., which was lent by witness's father. The firm also endorsed four bills of £87 10s. each on behalf of the defendant. The notes had been paid. The advance was made in November, 1901. For the accounts witness had sent to the defendant, he had always brought up an item of £25 commission for endorsing the bills. He arranged with Schulz on the 5th January, 1902, that he should pay commission on the bills and interest on the loans; and it was agreed between them that £25 would be a fair amount. Schulz had never repudiated his liability for that sum until the present action was brought. When he left the Transvaal, Joe Chamberlain was in the defendant's possession. In December, 1903, he learned that the horse was stolen. In the defendant's claim for £32 10s. the defendant did not allow for entry fees, nominations, etc., but merely took the gross share of the transaction. All that he was liable for was the keep of the horse from the time it was taken over.

Cross-examined: He denied the defendant's statement in his plea that there was any arrangement made with regard to endorsing the bills. In the first instance he made the arrangement as a friendly transaction, but he could not be responsible for the commission of £25 to which the firm was entitled. At the time of the races he was not suffering from fits, consequent on heavy drinking. If the defendant said that the payments in June, August, and September were not for the keep of the house he would contradict him.

Robert Warner denied the tender of £59 18s. 1d. in March, 1903, by the defendant. It was in March this year that he had a conversation with the defendant in Long-street about the account. Cross-examined: He might have said that he would not press Schultz for the money until his son had settled with the latter.

Mr. Upington closed his case.

Mr. Schulz, the defendant, stated he never promised to pay £25 commission. Witness agreed either to give good interest or a bonus for the loan, and ultimately he agreed to pay 8 per cent. When he got the account in April, 1902, he went straight to the office of the defendant and repudiated the commission of £25. Witness heard that Joe Chamberlain had been commandeered and was in possession of President Steyn. He accepted the cheques as payments on the open account, and had nothing to do with the keep of the horse.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He had no authority from Warner to sell his share of the horse, and the reason he would not part with it was that he was in debt to witness. It would have been difficult to get £100 for the horse in January, 1900. When he got the letter about the commission witness went straight to the office and saw Mr. Warner, and he put the mistake down to the clerks. Until the matter practically came to action he never actually wrote repudiating the £25. Witness's books were destroyed by the Boers at Waterval. Witness debited the plaintiff with £57, half the amount of the purse. Plaintiff paid for the nominations, acceptances, weighing fees, and colours. Witness understood that they amounted to £87, and that amount deducted from the purse would leave £20, or £10 each. Mr. Warner boarded with witness about two months. Witness had been paid for that. In March plaintiff told witness that he had heard that his (witness's) son had sold the horse in December, 1899, for £75. Witness saw the accounts, on which he was credited with £13 7s.

Re-examined by Mr. Jones: Witness got £26 on account from plaintiff to pay for his board and lodging whilst in Cape Town.

Mr. Jones closed his case.

Counsel for the plaintiff addressed the Court, and said he would submit that with regard to the £25 commission, that the plaintiff's story was correct, and that the defendant was wrong in his version. It was a peculiar thing that in all the correspondence that passed between plaintiff and defendant there was no reference to the fact that this money was not due, although accounts for it had been sent in. Mr. Warner, senior, certainly corroborated the plaintiff in what he said as to an agreement having been arrived at. There was nothing extraordinary, considering the relations of these two men prior to the transactions, in the fact that the actual amount was not agreed on before the loan was arranged. With regard to the racehorse transaction, it seemed perfectly clear that there could be nothing due to the defendant. Defendant admitted that the nomination fees, weight and colour charges, and expenses of that nature were paid by the plaintiff. The defendant stated he had debited plaintiff with £53 14s. 3d. in his book, and that sum was exactly half of the purse, and yet he wanted to make out that that amount was arrived at after taking into consideration all figures.

De Villiers, C.J., said that with regard to the horse it was clear that the defendant's son understood that he took over the horse when he paid the £75, the purchase price of the horse, but it was also clear that there was a misunderstanding—and one could quite understand how in the confusion during the war such a misunderstanding could occur, what the defendant clearly understood was that anyone taking over the horse should only take his half share. It might be that the transaction that if there was a partnership the defendant could not take another person into the partnership, but the question that arose was, did he leave the horse there with the intention of selling the horse to his son, or with the object of making over his half share to his son. The probabilities were that the defendant asked the son to take over his share of the horse at £75, because when he last saw the plaintiff he was unwilling to sell his portion, and the utmost responsibility he took over was the half share. Subsequently, there was a commandeering and loss of this horse, and it was only right that both owners of the horse should suffer instead of one, and only in the case of there being an out and out sale to the son would the Court hold that the defendant should stand the whole loss. With regard to the £25, the Court was not satisfied that this was due. It was a loan transaction. He got a fair rate of interest—8 per cent.—and it might well be that he gave his endorsement of the promissory note without expecting any reward. It was clear that Warner expected other benefits to arise out of the advantage given to the defendant, and at all events it lay upon the plaintiff to prove that there was promise of this £25. Therefore those two items fell to the ground. Continuing, he said he was not satisfied that there was more than £22 16s. 3d. owing to the plaintiff. On the other hand, the defendant had not tendered the amount that he should have done. The ordinary rule of the Court was that the person against whom judgment was given must pay the costs. He did not see sufficient reason for departing from that rule except on the point as to the costs of the commission, and the costs of that would have to be borne by both parties.

ALEXANDER V. MUIR. { 1901.
 { July 19th.

Personal injury—Negligence.

This was an action brought by Julius Alexander, optician, of Cape Town, against William T. Muir, of Ceres, to recover £500 damages for injuries received through the negligence of defendant's servant.

The declaration stated that plaintiff was an American optician practising in South Africa. The plaintiff was a passenger in the post-cart from Ceres to Ceres-road. In, or about, December, 1902, the plaintiff visited Ceres on business. It was agreed between plaintiff and the defendant that the plaintiff should become a passenger on the post-cart. The plaintiff was not carefully carried by the defendant as agreed, but was thrown over the banks at the side of the road, a distance of about 15 feet, and rolled 30 feet more. The negligence was caused by the defendant harnessing an untrained horse to the cart, and also owing to the negligence of his servant in driving. In consequence of the accident, plaintiff sustained a fracture of the jaw, and had some teeth knocked out. His forehead and face were scratched. Certain goods which plaintiff used in his business were destroyed. In consequence plaintiff claimed £500 damages.

The defendant's plea admitted the accident, but denied that it was owing to the negligence of his servant. He also denied that an untrained horse was harnessed to the cart. He denied that the cart was overcrowded. He admitted that in consequence of the accident plaintiff received several scratches, but denied that he received a fractured jaw.

The replocation was general.

Mr. Alexander appeared for the plaintiff, and Sir Henry Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Close) for the defendant.

Julius Alexander, the plaintiff, stated he was an American optician, carrying on business in Cape Colony. In December, 1902, he was on business in Ceres, and booked a seat in the mail cart to get to Ceres-road. He paid 5s. for it. The mail cart left at 5.30 p.m. A Mr. Cooke travelled with witness. The cart would seat three passengers and the driver. They picked up another passenger in Ceres. They then drove to Mrs. Van Wyck's house, and picked up a Mr. Van der Merwe. In addition there were the mails and passengers' luggage on the cart. Mr. Van der Merwe complained of the lack of room, but the driver made room for him by sitting on the mail bags with his legs over the splash board, on which attitude he would not have any control over the horses. The horses were somewhat frisky throughout the journey. The driver teased the friskiest of the two horses with a whip. They drove along the Pass, and the driver turned his attention to the other horse Mr. Van der Merwe spoke to him about it, but he took no notice of it. They came to a water-course in the road, and the driver took the horses through it on the side of the road nearest the precipice. One of the horses was a "jibber," and the driver whipped it up. The horse at the "off-side" shied, and forced the near horse over the precipice. Had the driver been in a proper position he could have controlled the horses. Witness was rendered unconscious by the fall. He recovered, and pulled himself together, and washed his face in the water-course, and lay there until some people picked him up. The cart was smashed to atoms, and the horses lay about 50 feet away from it. Drs. Morris and Munnik and Mr. Muir, the defendant, came out from Ceres. Witness had his travelling "test cases" with him, and a quantity of the contents were smashed. Witness was taken back to Ceres, and remained in bed about three days. Witness's lower jaw was fractured, two teeth were dislodged, and the others were loosened. Witness, who was in perfect health prior to the accident, now suffered considerably from nervousness.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: Witness was confined to bed for three days.

After that you came downstairs?—I did not, because there's no stairs to come down.

You were the life of the hotel?—In what way?

I believe you used to keep the hotel pretty lively after your accident?—It is my nature to make everybody lively.

Did you show Dr. Morrison your fractured jaw?—I did.

Would it surprise you to know that he says it was not fractured?—He tried to close my jaw three times, but failed.

Witness had never seen drivers sitting on the mail bags on the front of a cart before. When the defendant arrived, they were all together in the road. Witness did not hear Cooke tell Muir that the whole thing was an accident, and that the driver was not to blame. Cooke was in England at present, but was expected back to South Africa soon. Witness was making about £5 a day out of his business.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Are there no parapet walls along this road?]

There are loose stones.

Were there any just where the accident occurred?—There were.

What happened to them?—The horses forced them out of the way.

Rudolph van der Merwe, of Hope Town, stated he was a passenger by the mail cart on the occasion of the accident. He corroborated plaintiff as to the details of the accident. He knew a good deal about horses, and he considered the horses driven by the defendant were not suitable for such a road as that between Ceres and Ceres-road. Witness took an action against the same defendant, and settled it for £15.

Dr. Harris gave evidence as to an examination of the plaintiff. He saw him in January, 1903. He complained of pains in his jaw. Witness examined it, and found signs indicative of a fracture. The symptoms at present seemed to be the same as they were then.

Mr. Alexander closed his case.

Karl Johannes van der Merwe stated the boy who drove for defendant had been in his employment about twelve months. He was a sober, competent driver. Witness drove in the cart which met with the accident along with five other passengers from Ceres to Ceres-road the day prior to the trial of the case.

Mr. Alexander: You must have made a mistake as to the cart you drove in yesterday, because that cart is smashed?—I meant one built in the same way.

To the Court: The driver may have been careless when passing the point at which the accident occurred on the occasion in question.

William V. Blackburn, examined, stated he had been residing in Ceres for the last three years. In 1902 he was a transport driver. He had driven the horses that met with the accident repeatedly, and never had any accident with them. The cart was larger than the ordinary Cape-cart. Witness knew Williams to be a competent, careful driver. He still drove the mail cart. Witness saw plaintiff walking about after the accident. He was using a stick to assist him.

Cross-examined by Mr. Alexander:

Witness resided with Mr. Muir. He often drove for him. He did it for pleasure.

Richard Giddey, proprietor of Elam's Hotel, stated the cart was a full-sized one, by which he meant it should comfortably seat three passengers on each seat. He also testified as to the driver's competency. Mr. Alexander was brought back to the hotel after the accident, and he was "the life of the house." He derided the "cake-walk" on a couple of occasions.

Cross-examined by Mr. Alexander: Plaintiff was of a very lively temperament. Witness considered the driver in sitting on the mail bags, had perfect control over the horses.

Petrus J. T. Wolfaardt also testified to the competency of the driver.

Hendrick Williams stated he was a post-cart driver in the employment of the defendant for the past four years. He had been driving horses for many years. Witness had been driving one of the horses two years, and the other six months. He had driven the two together for three months. Witness was still engaged in driving the cart between Ceres and Ceres-road. Witness never had an accident before or since. Both horses were accustomed to harness. The cart was a large one. It was not overcrowded in any way. Witness had often carried six people in the cart, and the mails. Witness denied that he whipped the horses unnecessarily. He drove fast because he had lost time in starting. Mr. Van der Merwe put his hand in front of witness, and took hold of the right hand rein, thus preventing witness from using his whip. The effect of this was that the horse's hindquarters came into collision with the pole.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He was some distance off the edge when Mr. Van der Merwe caught hold of the rein, but he was unable to resume possession of the horses. He denied altogether that he was teasing the horses previous to the accident. He was ten minutes late for the train.

Dr. Morris stated that in December, 1902, he was practising at Ceres, where he saw the plaintiff on the day of the accident, and found him suffering from bruises of the face, left hand, and left thigh, one tooth missing, and another pushed out. A few days after the accident, the plaintiff was practically all right. Beyond the bruises there was no permanent injury.

Cross-examined by Mr. Alexander: The thickening of the jaw would be the result of the accident. Witness attended the plaintiff for seven days. If the plaintiff said that he suffered from sleeplessness and cold sweats, they might probably be caused by nervous disorder.

Dr. Norman Wilson stated that he examined the plaintiff on the 5th July last, and found no traces of a fracture of the jaw. Beyond a thickening of the jaw, there was no evidence of any permanent injury. There was no mention of sleeplessness or nervous disorder.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The thickening of the jaw might be the result of the fall.

Alfred Dyason, an attorney, practising at Ceres, said that he was present when the cart was measured. The cart was 6 feet wide and the road over 16.

Cross-examined by Mr. Alexander: He was attorney for the defendant.

The evidence of T. Muir, taken on commission, set out that the cart was a roomy one, and the present driver had been in his position for a number of years. He used the same horses for nine months after the accident. Mr. Cook and the other passengers thought it was purely an accident, and that the driver was not to blame. Another cart had gone over the precipice at the same place, which was very dangerous, and insufficiently protected by guard stones. Eleven or twelve accidents had happened at the place during his time.

Sir H. Juta closed his case, and counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: It is a matter of great regret that two important witnesses who saw the accident, and were sufferers in the accident, have not been called as witnesses to state what they actually saw took place. It seems that these two witnesses have left the country, and it is to be regretted that the case was not brought on while they were here, and able to give their evidence. The only statement we have in regard to their views of the accident is a statement made by the defendant as to what took place shortly afterwards in the presence of the plaintiff. The plaintiff was hurt, but still the statement was made in his presence by these two witnesses to the effect that it was a pure accident. The silence of the plaintiff should not affect his case, because he was hurt at the time. Therefore, this should not bear very much against him. At the same time, we have the fact that these two witnesses made these statements in the presence of plaintiff. A great deal has been said about overcrowding in this cart, but I confess I don't see that the cart was overcrowded. It is true that the driver did not sit upon the cart seat, but from the description as to the manner in which he sat, it seems to me he would have had as good control of the horses as if he had sat on the seat. There was some luggage and also a letter bag. He sat on the letter bag, and, according to his statement, his feet were inside the board. The plaintiff's witnesses, no doubt, say the contrary, but on his own statement that his feet were inside, if that were true, he would have as firm a footing as he would have had if he sat on the seat. It is not an unusual thing to see these people sit on the splash-board, but that in itself would not be proof of negligence. But, then, it is said that the two horses did not pull well together, and that they were unfit for the work. But they had been used for that work for some months before, and also used since without having any accident. The plaintiff, I think, was not such a competent judge of horses as to be able from the short experience he had of these two horses on the journey from Ceres to the scene of the accident to say whether these two horses were fit and proper for their work, and the same remark applies to Van der Merwe. The elder Van der Merwe saw the horses daily, and he says that these horses were fit for the work, and, moreover, that this Williams, the driver, was a very competent driver. He had been in his service for years, and never had an accident, and that he was a sober, steady, and industrious man. This is the local evidence of men on the spot, who knew the horses, the driver, and the defendant, so that, so far as that evidence goes, it seems entirely in favour of the defendant. But there is still the fact that an accident happened, and I quite agree with Mr. Alexander that the mere fact that this accident happened is sufficient to call upon the defendant to show that the accident happened, notwithstanding the exercise of reasonable skill and care on the part of the driver. It is the undertaking of the cart contractor to carry the plaintiff safely, so far as the defendant can with reasonable skill and care, and to show that he was so carried. Beyond that his liability does not go, because he is not an insurer. He undertakes so far as he can to exercise reasonable skill and care that the plaintiff shall be carried safely to his destination. The plaintiff then has to produce evidence to show that this accident could have been avoided by the exercise of reasonable skill and care. On this point the plaintiff and Van der Merwe have given their evidence, and, according to them, the driver whipped up the left hand horse, with the result that he startled the horse on the right hand, which pulled with greater force than the other, and pressed against the pole, ultimately pressing the cart over the embankment, but I don't consider that the mere whipping of the horse on the left hand side was in itself an unskilful act of the driver. A good driver will work as much with his whip almost as with the rein, and there are occasions when the whip will be the means of preventing horses from going from one side of the road to the other, and this seems to have been one of these occasions in which a judicious whipping of the left hand horse would have materially assisted in bringing the cart out of the predicament. It was one of those occasions in which a skilful driver ought to have been left to himself. It is a great mistake people often make, and it is not alone made by ladies, to interfere with the driver. Here is a skilful driver, who never had an accident. His former master praises him as a good and skilful driver, and his present master employed him before, and since the accident, and it appears, to my mind, if the driver had been left to himself, he might have taken the cart out of the predicament, but then Van der Merwe thought he might come to his assistance by pulling at the right rein. I consider it is not the mere pulling of the rein which interfered with the driver, but it is the general interference with the driver, and in nine cases out of ten it will lead to an accident which the person who interferes wishes to prevent, and that is what I consider took place in the present case. A strong jerk of the right rein would do more harm than good, and I believe that a gentle pull of the right rein would be, under the circumstances, most beneficial, with a slight whipping of the left-hand horse on the left-hand side. If the driver had been left to himself, I consider that is what he would have done, but the interference of Van der Merwe, in my opinion, contributed to the accident. Still, I quite agree on this point with Mr. Alexander, that if there was neglect on the part of the driver, and there was only contributory negligence on the part of Van der Merwe, that the defendant would not be excused; but on this point, in my opinion, after careful consideration of the evidence, the driver exercised proper skill and care, and that it was Van der Merwe's interference alone which contributed to the accident, and that therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to recover any damages in the present case. The defendant exercised due care in the appointment of his driver, who was a careful, sober, and industrious man. Judgment will be for the defendant, with costs.

GENERAL MOTION.

Ex parte TOOCH. { 1904.
July 19th.

Mr. De Waal moved for an order for the arrest of N. K. Spencer, under the 3th rule of Court, who was indebted to the petitioner in the sum of £9 0s. 7d. pending an action in the Magistrate's Court. It was believed that respondent was about to leave for England.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the rule of Court fixed the lowest amount at £15, and he was not prepared to put the formidable machinery of arrest in operation for the recovery of such a paltry sum.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

AMER V. VAN DER BYL AND { 1904.
OO. AND THE MASTER. { July 19th.

This was an application on notice of motion for the discharge of an order for the attachment of a certain shop at the corner of Stone and Ellesmere streets by the messenger of the second-named respondent on the ground that the said shop belongs to the applicant, the said attachment having taken place under the sequestration of the estate of one Ebrahim Cassim.

The affidavit of the applicant stated that he had purchased the shop from Cassim, and that he had been wrongfully ejected.

A number of supporting affidavits were put in.

Certain answering affidavits were put in to the effect that the applicant acted in collusion with Cassim in attempting to defeat the rights of the merchants, his creditors. Applicant had been a partner of Cassim (his half-brother) in three shops. A plot had been hatched whereby the applicant was to take over the bulk of the goods in Cassim's shops, so as to defeat the rights of creditors. The sale to applicant was denied, and it was alleged was merely a fraudulent and collusive arrangement.

Copy of a document was put in, in which applicant acknowledged having been in partnership with the insolvent.

In a replying affidavit, the applicant denied the alleged plot to defeat the creditors of Cassim. He also denied that he was related to the insolvent, and in regard to the document, he declared that he did not understand its contents when he signed it.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers for the applicant; Dr. Krause for the respondents.

[Buchanan, J.: Why do you proceed against the first respondent and not against the trustee?]

Mr. De Villiers: We are proceeding against the Master.

[Buchanan, J.: You see, Mr. De Villiers, you make an allegation of fraud. Will your client, Dr. Krause, give security for costs of any action which may be brought against you?]

Yes, certainly.

Buchanan, J.: I fear we can hardly decide this case without having the witnesses before us. No order will be granted. On the respondents giving an undertaking to abide by and submit to any judgment, which may be given in an action to be brought by the applicant for recovery of property and damages, action to be brought forthwith, and costs to abide result; failing any action to be brought next term, applicant to pay costs of this motion.

ESTATE FAURE V. VAN DER { 1904.
BYL. { July 19th.

Ejectment—Motion.

B. had purchased certain land from the applicants, had sued them for transfer, and the applicants were ordered to give transfer, or in the alternative, to pay B. £500 damages. They paid the money, which was accepted by B., however, remained in possession of the land, as it had never been registered, either in the name of F. or of the applicants. On a motion for the ejectment of B.,

Held, that an order must be granted as prayed.

This was a motion on behalf of the executors testamentary in the estate of the late Johannes Albertus Faure, for an order compelling the respondent to give up possession of certain two erven, 24 and 25, situate at Gordon's Bay, in the division of Stellenbosch.

The affidavit of the petitioners stated that an action was brought in 1902 (see 12 C.T.R., 476) by the present respondent against the present petitioners for an order for transfer of the property in question, which he had alleged had been sold to him by the late Mr. Faure. On the 6th June, 1902, the Court gave judgment in the following terms: "Judgment for the plaintiff, with costs, including expenses of plaintiff as a necessary witness, and the Court orders the defendants, in their aforesaid capacity, to give transfer to the plaintiff within three months, failing which to pay the plaintiff the sum of £500, as and for damages, plaintiff to be allowed to remove his materials from the property." Petitioners went on to say that they had been unable themselves to get title, consequently they could not grant transfer to the present respondent, and on the 8th September, 1902, they paid him £500 and costs. Respondent still remained in possession of the property, and petitioners now prayed for an order compelling him to at once restore or give up possession of the property to the applicants.

The respondent, in his affidavit, said that the property was not registered in the name of petitioners, but in the name of a gentleman now residing at Johannesburg, who had asked him to remain in possession till he could come and assert his rights. In the meantime, he (respondent) was prepared to pay rent till he was ejected from the premises.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the applicants; Mr. De Waal for the respondent.

[Buchanan, J.: You have already brought your action, Mr. De Waal, and obtained judgment, why then do you oppose the present application?]

We object to this matter being decided on motion. Here there has been no spoliation, and such a case cannot be decided on motion. Maasdorp's Institutes of Cape Law (Vol. 2, p. 87).

[Buchanan, J.: Have you anything to say on the merits?]

Since the action was tried a new issue has arisen. Then it was assumed that the whole question was one of breach of contract. Nobody then knew that the property was in the hands of third persons. Had they had any title they might have got possession under the Derelict Lands Act, but knowing they had no title they did not venture to make the application. Possibly Faure may have made a mistake in selling these two lots, but we cannot be compelled to deliver up the property to the applicants, as they can show no title. Melior est conditio possidentis. We are in possession, and nobody can oust us save by a vindicatory action. Grotius (2-2-6). Nathan's Colonial Law (Vol. 1-374, par. 606). The first thing the claimant has to prove is ownership. Grotius (2-7-2). As against third persons we have as much right as if we could show prescriptive title. The property is still registered in the name of Frieslich, and the Court in the action did not order us to hand it over to the first claimant. Mr. Schreiner was not called upon.

Buchanan, J.: The respondent admits that he went into possession of this property under this contract of sale from Faure. He bought from Faure, and looked to Faure to put him into possession, he brought the action for transfer and in that action, failing the transfer, he got a judgment for damages, and it is clear from the permission, attached to the judgment, for him to remove his materials, that if he recovered damages he certainly must give up the property. It is a necessary consequence. Objection has been taken to this motion, which is to remove the respondent, and it has been argued that an action should be brought. An action has been brought, and the whole question has been decided upon action. It is no defence to say that property belongs to a third party. Respondent derived occupation from Faure, he sued Faure for transfer he could not get transfer, he had paid no rent for occupation all these years, and he has accepted the £500 damages awarded to him by the Court. There is no title in anybody else set up in this case from whom the respondent could claim, except Faure. The application will be granted with costs, and respondent will be allowed one month in which to remove the materials.

Ex parte PAM.

Leave to appeal to Supreme Court—Interlocutory order.

This was an application for an order granting one Julius Pam leave to appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Griqualand West. On May 16, 1904, the High Court had granted a rule absolute authorising the Official Liquidator of "The Free State Mines, Ltd.," to attach certain shares, and a bond registered in the name of the petitioner, to found jurisdiction and leave to sue him by edictal citation. Petitioner applied for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court, but the High Court dismissed the petition. The petitioner now asked leave from the Court to appeal.

Mr. Gardiner moved accordingly.

The Court refused the application with costs, on the ground that the order of the High Court was purely interlocutory.

WRIGHT AND ANOTHER v. f 1904.
THE CAPE TIMES, LTD. { July 19th.

Pleading—Libel.

If it intended to plead justification in an action for libel, that defence must be pleaded specifically.

This was an argument on exceptions taken to the defendants' plea. The matter arose out of certain statements in reference to the administration of Wynberg Gaol, contained in a series of articles published in the "Times." The plaintiffs are Dr. Wright, District Surgeon of Wynberg and Dr. Molteno, assistant District Surgeon, and the defendants are the proprietors of the "Cape Times."

The declaration set out that one of the duties of the plaintiffs was the medical care of prisoners in the Wynberg Gaol. On the 24th March, 1904, the defendants published in the "Cape Times," of and concerning the plaintiffs, the following false, malicious, and defamatory words: "The food, generally speaking, is disgraceful. The meat often putrid, green, and quite unfit to eat; the mealie meal frequently sour, and in a filthy state, the bread stale or under weight, and so on. . . . The 'hospital' accommodation is beyond description. To start with, there is no such thing as a hospital. A narrow cell, in one corner a stretcher, devoid of all necessaries, At the time these notes were written (secretly sent out to a chum through a little hole in the wall), a coloured man, in the last stages of consumption, was occupying the one stretcher in the hospital. This man had at one time or another received corporal punishment, which had been administered in such a disgraceful manner that part of the man's lungs (already slightly affected) were severely beaten in by the tails of the 'cat-o'-nine tails.' For weeks this man had been lying in the hospital, unable to move, never washed, and in an indescribable filthy state. The skin was black instead of light brown. This unfortunate man was kept on the ordinary prison diet. When the time came for him to die the doctor ordered him some brandy—which he rarely received. For days at a stretch he never saw a doctor at all."

The plaintiffs said that this meant that they had been guilty of gross neglect and misconduct in the discharge of their professional and official duties, and they claimed £2,000 damages.

Defendants, in their plea, admitted the allegations in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the declaration, except that they said they had no knowledge that it was the duty of the plaintiffs, or one of them, once a day to visit the sick prisoners, and inspect the quality of the food cooked and uncooked. They admitted the publication on the 24th March of the words set out in paragraph 3 of the declaration, but denied the other allegations in the said paragraph. They said that the words complained of were not published maliciously, they were published bona fide in the public interests, and by way of legitimate public comment and criticism upon a matter of great public concern in one of a series of articles properly published in the "Times," respecting the administration of certain public gaols in this colony, of which the Wynberg Gaol was one. They further said they were privileged, and that their statement did not support the plaintiff's action. They denied the allegation as to damages.

On this, the plaintiffs excepted to the plea on the ground that the same was bad in law, and offered no defence to the claim of the plaintiffs.

Mr. Upington (for the exceptors).

The defendant company admit that it was part of the duty of the plaintiffs to superintend the floggings in the gaol. They do not plead justification, and unless they do so their plea is bad. This is no question of public comment. See Upington v. Solomon (Buch. 1877-260).

[Buchanan, J.: That was before the passing of Act 46 of 1882.]

Yes, but it is the leading case as to newspaper privileges. See particularly the judgments of the Chief Justice (p. 260), and of Stockenström, J. (p. 283); see, also, Payne v. Sheffield (2 E.D.C., 166), particularly the judgment of the Judge President. This judgment clearly distinguishes between the imputation of acts and comments on acts. A newspaper has no more right than a speaker to impute a crime; either may comment on crime. Here the exceptors are charged with a crime committed against a particular individual in the hospital. If a newspaper were allowed to make charges of this kind nobody would be safe. They have no special privilege. It is no defence to say that they believed the charges, or that they are fair comments. The only possible plea would be that of justification. Odgers (p. 35) citing Lefroy v. Burnside (4 Irish L. Rep., 465, 466). I submit that the plea is bad.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the respondents): It is difficult to understand the object of this exception. We have not the plaintiffs in view, and there is no special mention of them. The article only says that a man had been brutally flogged, and afterwards shamefully neglected at some time or other.

[Buchanan, J.: Do you intend to prove these facts?]

Oh yes, as against the gaol, but not against the plaintiffs. We contend that we are quite justified in commenting on a system.

[Buchanan, J.: Do you say your plea admits that these words are true?]

Yes, paragraph 2 of the plea denies all allegations of paragraph 3 of the declaration, save as to publication of the words; we deny, therefore, that the words were either "false," "malicious," or "defamatory." But we cannot admit all the statements and innuendos of the declaration. The furthest we go is to say that for days this unfortunate man did not see a doctor. The plaintiffs say that it was their duty to see him every day; but we do not know that. We are quite willing to add to our plea that the allegations we have made are true both in substance and in fact. I quite admit that legally speaking newspapers enjoy no wider privileges than anybody else, but in practice juries usually allow greater latitude to them than to other people. See Odgers (p. 33). The plaintiffs have shown themselves far too sensitive. Suppose that some accusation were made against (let us say) the Colonial Office, would every man in that office be justified in at once running for a summons? The givemen of libel is malice, Botha v. Brink (Buch. 1878-118), and the presumption as to malice is rebutted by the fact that we commented on the management of an institution, and not on the conduct of individuals. Res ipsa loquitur. As to the judgment of Stockenström, J., in Upington v. Solomon, I cannot find the doctrine therein stated endorsed in the same general terms by any other authority. If comments on a public institution are made bona fide, it is not necessary to prove every minute circumstance. As to the distinction between "privilege of the occasion" and "privilege of the words," see Odgers (p. 33).

[Buchanan, J.: Do you say the words are true?]

We deny that they are false.

[Buchanan, J.: Is that sufficient according to the rules of pleading?]

I submit it is, and that the exception should be overruled, with costs.

Mr. Upington was not heard in reply.

Buchanan, J.: The defendant's newspaper published certain allegations regarding the conduct of public officials in the management or control of the prisons of the Colony. Among these allegations were certain statements charging the plaintiffs with distinct acts of misconduct, and on these charges this action was founded. The declaration averred that the charges made were false, malicious, and defamatory. The plea simply denied this averment, and did not say that the charges were true. I have not now to deal with the question of privilege, but only to decide as a question of pleading, whether the plea properly raises the issue which the defendants wish to have tried. Counsel admits that the defence is one of justification, and that the defendants intend proving the truth of the charges. That being so their plea should distinctly and in terms raise that issue. This it does not do, and the exception will therefore be allowed, with costs. Defendants, however, will have leave to amend their plea.

Exception allowed accordingly, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.)]

TRIAL CAUSES.

DE WET V. BLOOM. { 1904.
July 20th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan (for the plaintiff) moved for judgment in terms of a consent paper. The action arose out of a sale of property, and plaintiff sought an order for payment of £2,500 as an instalment of the price and the passing of a mortgage bond for £6,500 and interest for the balance, or, alternatively, an order for cancellation of sale.

Judgment in terms of consent paper.

{ 1904.
July 20th.
Oct. 26th.

Broker—Shares—Cover—Damages.

The plaintiff bought certain shares in companies through the agency of the defendant, a broker, the arrangement between them being that the defendant should retain the scrip until the price was paid, and that in the meantime, if the market price fell, the plaintiff should pay to the defendant the difference as "cover." The price fell, and the plaintiff from time to time paid sums as "cover." The price having fallen still lower, the defendant demanded further "cover," and as the plaintiff did not pay it, the defendant sold the shares under Stock Exchange regulations on account of the plaintiff.

Held, that the defendant, although bound to account for the sums received by him, was not liable in damages as for an illegal sale of the shares.

This was an action brought by Mohamed Karriem, an Indian general dealer, of Cape Town, against Elias Harris, stock and share broker, Cape Town, to recover certain cover money paid upon share transactions, and also damages in the sum of £1,000.

Defendant stated that he was unable to appear by counsel, as he had given notice of his intention to surrender his estate. He added that his principal witness, Mr. Woodhead, could not attend through illness.

Mr. Upington said that a plea had been filed, and on the 12th inst. a letter was received from Messrs. Tredgold and Co., who had been attorneys to the defendant saying that they had withdrawn from the case, defendant having advertised his intention to surrender.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What effect has the insolvency on the action?]

Mr. Upington said he believed the effect was to stay execution.

The declaration set out that in 1902 plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement whereby the defendant agreed for remuneration to purchase for and on behalf of the plaintiff such stock or shares as the plaintiff should from time to time authorise him to buy, and that it was a condition of the said agreement that upon such purchase of stock or shares as aforesaid the plaintiff should deposit cover money. On the 5th September, 1902, defendant purchased for plaintiff certain 100 shares known as Coal Trusts for £387 10s. On the 9th September defendant purchased 200 shares known as Main Reefs for £500. Plaintiff duly deposited with the defendant from time to time cover amounting in all to £436 11s. 10d., and it thereupon became the duty of the defendant to hold the said shares for and on behalf of the plaintiff until instructed to sell or otherwise dispose of the same. On the 6th April the defendant wrongfully, unlawfully, against the wish of the plaintiff and in breach of agreement sold the shares for £196 5s. and £285. The said shares had since greatly increased in value, and could have been sold at a profit. Plaintiff prayed that the defendant be ordered to repay to him £436 11s. 10d. paid as cover money, or, in the alternative, for the said sum as damages, and £1,000 additional damages.

Defendant, in his plea, said he was a dealer as well as a broker; he denied that the shares had increased in value, and could have been sold at a profit. He agreed to hold the shares in accordance with the rules and usages of the Cape Town Stock Exchange. He gave the plaintiff notice in April to take delivery of the said shares, and plaintiff failing to do so, he caused the shares, in accordance with the agreement and the rules of the Exchange to be sold by the secretary. He prayed that the claim be dismissed. In reconvention, he claimed a sum of £87 5s. in respect of the said shares. The shares only realised £481 5s., and the total sum that had been owing to him was £568 10s.

The replication of the plaintiff denied that an agreement was entered into subject to the rules and usages of the Exchange or that the shares were held in accordance with the rules and usages of the Exchange. For a plea in reconvention, he craved leave to repeat the allegations contained in the declaration.

Mr. Upington was for the plaintiff; defendant appeared in person.

Mahomed Karriem (the plaintiff) said he had been in Cape Town nine years, and had carried on business as a general dealer. He arranged with Harris that he should buy shares on his behalf. An Indian named Gaffoor spoke for him. The arrangement was that Mr. Harris should buy shares for witness, and that he should deposit cover. If the shares went down Harris was to hold them for him, and witness from time to time was to pay sums in the way of cover. Nothing was said about the rules and customs of the Stock Exchange. Witness was also to pay interest at the rate of 8 per cent. on the purchase of shares. On the 5th September, 1902, Harris bought 100 Coal Trusts for £387 10s., and on the 9th September 200 Main Reefs for £500. Witness had from time to time paid cover amounting in all to £406 11s. 10d. On the 4th April, 1904, he received a letter from Harris threatening that unless he took up the stock he would sell it. Witness saw the defendant about more cover; he did not agree to the sale of the shares on the Stock Exchange. At that time the shares were rising. On the 6th April he received another letter from the defendant, saying that he had sold the shares on High 'Change, the Main Reefs at 28s. 6d. and the Coal Trusts at 39s. 3d. On the 19th April he instructed his attorneys, who sent a demand for return of the cover and £1,000 damages. After the shares had been sold, they continued to go up in value.

Cross-examined by the Defendant: He did not agree that the shares should be sold when defendant thought fit, according to Stock Exchange rules. He did not sign the document (produced), vesting the defendant with authority to sell on these terms.

Defendant said he was willing to arrange for the shares in dispute to be bought back at the price at which they were sold on High 'Change, and to be delivered to the plaintiff. He again mentioned the absence of Mr. Woodhead, who was a material witness.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Mr. Woodhead appears to be a most important witness. When will he be able to attend?]

Defendant said he did not think he would be able to appear within a week.

Abdol Gaffoor stated he took plaintiff to Mr. Harris, as the latter asked him to do so. Witness took several Indians. Harris said the arrangements with them were to be the same as with witness. These arrangements were that the men should have a call on the shares for a certain sum. Witness was present when Karriem entered into negotiations with defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How long was this agreement to last?—As long as Karriem could pay the cover.]

Cross-examined: Defendant courted witness's custom. Witness was not satisfied with the way the business was done. The plaintiff had the same arrangements as witness. Witness was decreed by defendant.

Mr. Harris: When I got judgment against you, you disappeared, and have not since been seen, although I have searched high and low for you. I had to make my living, and, besides, I was summoned here to-day to give evidence.

Why didn't you defend your case?—Because I was advised not to.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to defendant): What do you say the agreement was?]

Defendant: The circumstances were as follows: The plaintiff was brought into my office, and said he wanted to buy shares. The man who brought him in had done large transactions with me. I told him I could buy or sell shares for him, as I was a jobber, as well as a share-broker. I said, "You must pay cover, and at any time that you do not do so, I can sell them." Unfortunately, that regulation was not on the brokers' notes. The plaintiff agreed to that. I called on him for £100 cover, but he could not give it. My clerk dealt with him, and he can give evidence on that point.

Charles Howard Greenway, secretary of the Stock Exchange, handed in the bye-laws of the Exchange, and added that they were being revised, and that a new book was at present being compiled. On the instructions of defendant, witness, on the 7th April, sold 100 Coal Trusts at 29s. 3d., and 200 Main Reefs at 28s. 6d. Since then these shares have been up and down. The highest price for Coal Trusts in the meantime was 51s., buyers, and 52s. 6d., sellers, on the 4th May, but there were no sales, and Gold Reefs, 38s. 6d. on the 12th May. It was necessary under the bye-laws that all brokers' notes should bear "Stock Exchange Rules" on them. At the words "Subject to Cape Town" the present time Coal Trusts were about 39s. or 40s., and Main Reefs about 30s. 6d.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What price did he buy at?]

Mr. Upington: I believe 87s. 6d.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant is quite willing to give the plaintiff back his shares.]

Mr. Upington: I submit the defendant should pay the highest price quoted since buying.

Cross-examined by Mr. Harris: Witness had considerable knowledge of Stock Exchange business. As he did not know Mr. Harris's agreement with plaintiff, he could not say if he had treated him well or not.

Defendant said he had considerable difficulty with the plaintiff, as he would not sell when he advised him to do so. He was willing to buy the shares back, and give them to him.

Plaintiff (recalled) said he would not have sold the shares without making a profit out of them.

Elias Harris, the defendant, stated that if the plaintiff had been in a position to pay cover he would not have sold the shares. Instead of witness owing plaintiff money, plaintiff owed witness money. Witness knew very little about the case.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Witness was present when the agreement was entered into. The total amount of cover paid was £436. A demand was made on plaintiff to pay cover. Witness did not demand it. Woodhead did it. Witness was financially embarrassed at the time. He could have got the shares "carried" elsewhere for him. Mr. Benjamin was not a partner with witness.

De Villiers, C.J., said it was impossible to deal out justice in the case without Woodhead, as he seemed to be a most important witness.

Mr. Upington said that if his lordship made such an order he would have to agree to it. If such was done, it would mean that his client's rights would go.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is all the same.]

Mr. Upington: But he will have the judgment of the Court.

The case was allowed to stand over until next term for the evidence of Mr. Woodhead.

Postea (October 26th).

Charles W. Woodhead stated, in reply to the defendant, that he had been his clerk for 13 years. He wrote to plaintiff on the Saturday before Easter Monday, telling him he would have to take up his shares unless he could give cover. Witness interviewed him, and told him he wanted £100 cover. Plaintiff offered £60 cash on the Monday following, and a bill for £50, payable in 30 days. Witness said that was useless, as the bank was pressing Mr. Harris. The firm had always had trouble with plaintiff about cover. He always demanded heavy cover from the plaintiff, because the man who introduced him let the defendant down for £2,000. Defendant's business was always carried out under the rules of the Stock Exchange.

Charles Twycross, chairman of the Cape Town Stock Exchange, stated defendant had been a member of the Cape Town 'Change from its formation up to a couple of months ago. It was quite common for brokers to carry stock for clients with cover. If a man did not take delivery when called upon to do so, the broker was supposed to sell out against him.

Cross-examined: Witness said that even where cover was given, only one hour's notice to take over shares was necessary.

Are you quite sure that 30 days' notice is not required by your rules?—One hour's notice is all that is necessary.

I am going to put the question to you in this way. We will assume that there is a contract between a client and a broker. The client intends to have a number of transactions with him. He says: I am going to deposit a certain fixed sum of £50 cover. You are to retain these shares in your possession until asked by me to sell. I am prepared, whenever called on by you, to pay the difference in the market value of shares. That is not an ordinary Stock Exchange transaction?—I must say that we recognise transactions according to the Stock Exchange rules. No member can come to us and excuse himself for not complying with the Stock Exchange rules.

De Villiers, C.J.: The agreement alleged by the plaintiff in the present case was that the defendant agreed for remuneration to purchase certain stock and shares, and that on the purchase of stocks or shares, the plaintiff should deposit with the defendant a certain amount of cover money, and that the defendant should retain the stocks and shares for the plaintiff, until duly instructed by him to sell or otherwise dispose of them. The plaintiff, in the meantime, to supply cover money. I am quite satisfied from the evidence that the plaintiff must have misunderstood that any transaction between them was to be subject to Stock Exchange rules, but the difficult question to decide, if it were necessary to decide it, is whether the Court would be justified in holding that where contracts such as that alleged in the present case were entered into, the broker was or was not bound to keep the stock for a requisite time, and not to sell it, without giving reasonable notice to the client that he must either pay the cover or else take back the shares. Mr. Twycross has given evidence as to the rules of the Stock Exchange, but under the view that I have taken of the facts of the case, it is not necessary to consider them, because I am satisfied from the evidence given by Mr. Woodhead that an opportunity was given to the plaintiff before the stock was sold to pay the cover. It is said that that was not pleaded, but if it were necessary in that case, I could allow the plea to be amended. The evidence given by Mr. Woodhead proved that the plaintiff did receive notice to bring in cover or his shares would be sold, and as he did not bring it in, his shares were sold on the 6th of April. I am not satisfied with the evidence given by the plaintiff. His evidence with regard to the signature on the agreement was very unsatisfactory. I am inclined to believe that the plaintiff should not succeed in his action. There is a claim in reconvention. The defendant said that, as the estate has been assigned, he was not entitled to claim in reconvention, and in the absence of any proof that he was authorised by the assignees of the estate to receive the money, I will make no order on the claim in reconvention. I wish to say I would not encourage any action being brought by the assignees against the plaintiff, because there are certain circumstances that might justify the Court in believing that, although the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from the defendant, that the defendant was not entitled to recover from the plaintiff either. Therefore, there will be absolute from the instance on the claim in reconvention, and as for the claim in convention, there will be judgment for the defendant, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ARONSTRAN V. MAISEL BROS. } 1904.
AND CO. { July 21st.

In this matter Mr. Gardiner appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. M. de Villiers was for the defendants.

Mr. De Villiers applied for a postponement until Monday next, and explained that the defendant was not ready, as he had only just returned from Johannesburg, where he had been engaged in litigation. They offered to pay the costs of the day.

Mr. Gardiner: Plaintiff is to blame for the postponement. He applied for attachment ad fundandam jurisdictionem. Then he asked to have it discharged, and said he did not mean to go on with the case. We oppose any postponement.

De Villiers, C.J., said that, unless the case were heard to-day, it would have to stand over till next term.

Mr. De Villiers: In that case I shall have to retire from the matter.

After hearing counsel further,

De Villiers, C.J., said that it might, perhaps, be possible to set down the case for Wednesday.

The case was ordered to stand over till Wednesday next, on condition that the defendant pay the costs of the day.

CAPE TOWN TOWN COUNCIL } 1904.
V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT { July 21st.
AND OTHERS.

Jurisdiction — Imperial Government—Exception.

In an action brought by the Cape Town Town Council against Colonel H., as repre-sending the Secretary of State for War, for an order compelling him to remove certain fences placed by him around certain land claimed by the plaintiffs as a public recreation ground, the defendant excepted to the jurisdiction.

Held, that as the action was in reality against the Imperial Government, and as there had been no direction of His Majesty that right should be done in the matter, the Court had no jurisdiction.

This was an argument upon an exception taken by the third defendant, Colonel Hoskyns, Royal Engineers, as representing the Secretary of State for War.

The action refers to land forming part of Green Point Common, and situate in the neighbourhood of Mouille Point and Fort Wynyard. The plaintiffs are the Town Council of Cape Town, and the defendants are: (1) The Colonial Government, (2) the Table Bay Harbour Board, and (3) Colonel Chandos Hoskyns, Commanding Royal Engineers, as representing His Majesty's Secretary of State for War. The plaintiffs claim:

(a) A declaration as to the rights of the Town Council and the defendants in respect of the laboratory and the plaintiff Council making no claim in respect of the said portion of land and laboratory, and the plaintiff Council making no claim in respect of the laboratory and the small portion of ground adjoining it, which were actually granted in 1840, nor in respect of the land occupied by Fort Wynyard.

(b) An interdict restraining the first defendant from granting any portion of the said land, save as above, to either the second or third defendant, or from purporting to reserve the said land, or to give the second or third defendants any rights over the same.

(c) An order on the second defendant (1) to quit and deliver up the portion of the said land of which it is in occupation, (2) to remove all buildings and other obstructions therefrom and the fencing around the same, (3) to fill in all excavations made by it thereon, (4) to build up and restore the road which it has encroached upon.

(d) A declaration that the said Council and the inhabitants of Cape Town are entitled to the free use of and access to the foreshore encroached upon by the second defendant, and an interdict restraining the second defendant from interfering with the same, or from obstructing or trespassing on the foreshore.

(e) An order compelling the third defendant (1) to remove the fence placed by him or under his authority round portion of the said land, (2) to allow all roads across the said portion to remain free and unobstructed.

(f) As against the first and second named defendants, £100 damages for trespass.

(g) As against the third defendant, £100 damages for trespass.

(h) Alternative relief.

(i) Costs of suit.

The present exception was brought by Colonel Hoskyns, on the ground that, without submission or consent on the part of the Secretary of State for War, the plaintiffs were not entitled to maintain an action against him as an officer of His Majesty's Government.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner) for the exceptor; Mr. McGregor for the respondents.

Mr. Schreiner: The cases of Palmer v. Hutchinson (6 P.C., 65 and 45 L.T., 180), and Fraser v. Stewerwright (3 Juta, 375) show that the Imperial Government cannot be sued without its consent. My client represents the Secretary of State for War, and is sued purely in that capacity. The plaintiffs' only remedy against him is to proceed by way of Petition of Right.

Mr. McGregor: It is quite true that Colonel Hoskyns represents the Imperial Government, and I cannot question the authority of the cases cited. There is, also, the case of Binda v. Colonial Government (5 Juta, 284). At the same time we cannot consent to the withdrawal of the third defendant, because the other defendants might object, and it might prejudice our case as against them. The Harbour Board is concerned with the lower portion of Green Point-road. The case of Graham v. Commissioner of Works (85 L.T., 96) has an indirect bearing on the present case. We must submit should the Court order the third defendant to be struck out, but we cannot consent to such a course, as we wish to preserve the record intact. If the Crown gave an order that "right be done," probably execution would not issue, but right would be done by means of funds provided by the Colonial Government. It is, however, most important that the first defendant should be interdicted from giving title, and that the Harbour Board should not be allowed to continue to make excavations at the foreshore. As to joinder of parties out of the jurisdiction in cases of contract, see Darcy (p. 232). The principles he there states as to contract apply a fortiori in cases of tort.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why do you sue the Secretary for War?]

The military have a fort and a lavatory on the ground, and they have also been using and fencing land between the road and the sea. The question of the user of that land is the really important point.

Mr. Schreiner asked that the name of the third defendant (the exceptor) should be struck out of the record.

[De Villiers C.J.: That matter is not now before the Court. Of course all natural consequences of upholding the exception will follow.]

De Villiers, C.J.: There are three defendants in this case, viz., the Colonial Government, the Table Bay Harbour Board, and Colonel Hoskyns, as representing His Majesty's Secretary of State for War. There are separate prayers in the declaration against each of the three defendants. As against the first defendant there is a claim for a declaration of rights, and for an interdict restraining the first defendant (that is the Colonial Government) from granting any portion of the land in dispute to either the second or third defendant. The claim as against the second defendant is to quit and deliver up the portion of the said land of which it is in occupation, remove all buildings and other obstructions therefrom, and the fencing around the same, fill up all excavations made by it thereon, and to build up and restore the road which it has encroached upon, and a declaration that the Town Council and the inhabitants of Cape Town are entitled to the free and unobstructed use of and access to the foreshore encroached upon by the second defendant. With those two claims there is no necessity for dealing at present. The claim against the third defendant (Colonel Hoskyns, as representing the Secretary of State for War) is for an order compelling him to remove certain fences placed by him or under his authority round portions of the said land, and to allow all the roads across the said portion to remain free and unobstructed. If this had been an action against Col. Hoskyns personally, there would have been no ground for the exception, but it is an action against him in his capacity as representing His Majesty's Secretary of State for War, and the question arises whether this Court has jurisdiction. In my opinion, the decision of the Privy Council in the case of Palmer v. Hutchinson, which was an appeal from the Supreme Court of Natal, is conclusive in the present case. It was there held generally that jurisdiction over all Her Majesty's subjects does not include jurisdiction over an officer of the Imperial Government as representing His Majesty, and that decision was subsequently followed in this Court in the case of Fraser v. Sivewright, where the matter was fully discussed, and the rule clearly laid down that the Court has no jurisdiction without an order of His Majesty's Government that right should be done in an action brought against an officer of the Imperial Government in his official capacity. That decision appears to me conclusive in the present case, and, therefore, the exception taken by the third defendant to the jurisdiction of the Court must be allowed, with costs.

Schreiner, K.C., asked whether the Court would not order that the prayers (c) and (g) be struck out of the claim of the plaintiff Council.

De Villiers, C.J.: That will follow. At present I can only deal with the exception. Any necessary results of allowing the exception will follow.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

HODGSON V. ESTATE { 1904.
HODGSON. { July 21st.

This was an application for an order setting aside an interdict restraining the applicant from passing transfer of two farms in the division of Frasersburg.

A rule nisi had been granted on the 14th June, and leave was granted to the respondent to move to have it set aside. The applicant was indebted to the estate of the late George Hodgson, who was his brother, in the amount of £3,380 on a certain mortgage bond, and in the sum of £2,151 18s. 6d. The applicant was the registered owner of the two farms, and the petitioners in the first instance stated that he had sold one of the farms for £400 and the other for £5 to his son, and they alleged that those prices were far below the value of the farms, and they further believed that if the farms were divided up it would greatly reduce the farm Grootfontein. The deceased, in his will, left an injunction that no claim was to be made until three years after his death, provided the interest was paid. Now the present petitioner, Augustus Frederick Hodgson, applied to have that interdict set aside, and he made affidavit to the effect that he had improved the farm Grootfontein to the extent of £600. The estate of his brother held his life policy, which would be worth £1,000. He sold the two properties for the purpose of reducing his indebtedness to his brother's estate. In 1902 he paid £500, but a drought intervened in 1903 and 1904, and nothing further could be paid. The applicant's attorney had written to the respondent's attorney, that the applicant was still prepared to pay to the executors the proceeds of the sale in order to reduce his liability to the estate, but there was no answer.

The answering affidavit of Moses Hollander, an adjoining farmer, set out that if the farm Moordenaarsgat and Wittephen were sold, the farm Grootfontein would be reduced in value by £1,000. The farm Grootfontein derived water from the other farms. Johannes Hodgson, son of the deceased, further testified to the depreciation that would result from a division of the farms.

Mr. Burton (for the applicant); Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for the respondent).

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: The executors of the late Mr. Hodgson obtained an interdict on an ex parte motion restraining the respondents from transferring a certain piece of landed property. The ground upon which this interdict was granted was that the executors representing the deceased person were creditors for a large sum of money, and that the debtor was disposing of certain of his landed property to his son at a very low value. On the face of the application, there were ample reasons for granting this interdict, and it was granted pending further action, with leave to the respondent to move to have it set aside. This interdict was granted on the 14th June last, and up to the present no further action had been taken. The respondent now moves to set aside the interdict, and on the fuller information before the Court it appears that the principal debt is secured by a mortgage bond on the farm Grootfontein. The applicant does not propose to deal with Grootfontein now; what he wishes to sell is the place Moordenaarsgat and a small piece of land named Wittephen. The deceased advanced to the applicant the purchase price of Moordenaarsgat, and, though the deceased restricted his executors from taking any action for the recovery of this money for a period of three years after his death, still that restriction must be read in equity as meaning on condition that the owner of property does not dispose of the property for which the debt was incurred. He has now sold it, and I think he is entitled to sell the property not specially hypothecated, but he can only do so in fairness to the estate by paying into the estate the amount advanced to him to buy this property, and that was £432. The order of the Court will be that the application will be granted, and the interdict be set aside on payment to the executors of the sum of £432, and any interest due, unless an action is brought before the end of next term by the executors, and should such action be brought, costs will abide the result, failing which the applicant should pay the costs, because the interdict was necessary under the circumstances.

ESTATE RHODES V. HARTIGAN AND OTHERS.

Landlord and tenant—Rent—Collateral agreement.

This was an application on notice of motion for an order on behalf of the executors of the estate of the late Cecil John Rhodes, calling on the respondents, Alfred Henry Hartigan, Harold G. Baker, and Leslie Stewart, carrying on business at Wynberg under the style of Bamboesvlei, Limited, to show cause why they should not be evicted from the farm Bamboesvlei. The affidavit of Gerald Edward D'Arcy Orpen, a member of the firm of Messrs. E. R. Syfret and Co., duly appointed agents of the executors of the estate of the late Cecil John Rhodes, set out that in January last, plaintiff (Sir Lewis Lloyd Michell), through his firm, as his duly appointed agent, let to the defendants the farm Bamboesvlei, and the defendants took possession the same month under the obligations in the lease. The rent was stipulated at £20 a month, payable in advance on the first day of each month, but the defendants had wrongfully and unlawfully failed to pay on the due dates rents which became due on the first of March and April respectively. It was a further term of the agreement that on failure by the lessees to pay on the due dates, the lessor should be entitled to terminate the tenancy, and to take immediate possession of the property. On the 19th May, they were ordered to give up possession, but they refused to do so.

The answering affidavit of Henry Barker set out that on behalf of himself and the other partners he paid the first half-month's rent in advance. One of the considerations of their taking over the farm was that the petitioner guaranteed that a pump for drawing water from a well should be put in proper order, and he promised to do this forthwith. The petitioner did not put the well in order until the 13th March last. At the end of February the petitioner agreed, after representations had been made to him about the worthlessness of the farm without water, that the £10 already paid should count as rent to the end of February. On the 10th April the pump broke down, and respondents were unable to get any water. Through the want of water, they had lost through grazing £60 a month. On the 29th April E. R. Syfret obtained an interim interdict against his firm restraining them from removing any property on the farm, but for some reason or other he had not moved to have the rule made absolute. On the 17th June Sir Lewis Lloyd Michell summoned them for £40 rent due, and for an order of ejectment, but he had failed to proceed with his action. Through the failure to put the pump in order, they had lost a good connection, and they were desirous of proceeding with the action.

The replying affidavit of Gerald Edward D'Arcy Orpen denied the allegation as to the conditions mentioned. It was merely as an act of grace that the £10 was counted as a settlement until the end of February, and that the pump was put in order. It was owing to the respondents' carelessness that it broke down again.

Mr. Close for the applicants; Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers for the respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: This is an application for an order of ejectment of the respondents from the property of the estate now vested in the executors. The respondents were put in possession of the property under the terms of the letter of the 14th June, which terms were accepted unconditionally by the respondents. Among these terms were that the rent was to be paid monthly in advance—£20 a month. There is also a condition that the lease will be terminated on two months' notice on either side. £10 rent only has been paid, and though repeated demands have been made, no further payments have been made. The applicants now wish to eject the tenants, and the only defence set up by them is founded on an alleged collateral agreement that the applicants would put a certain pump in order. This is denied by the applicants, but from the evidence it is clear in February this pump was properly put in order so that this ground of defence has been removed. There is absolutely no reason why possession should not be given up, and an order to that effect will be granted, with costs. If the respondents have any claim for damages, they can bring their action for these damages. The applicants do not now claim anything beyond an order of ejectment, and the application will be granted, with costs, possession to be given on or before the 28th inst.

VEERASAMY V. SUBBAYA { 1904
AND ANOTHER. / July 21st.

Trust funds—Religious purposes —Right of subscribers to an account.

This was an application for an order compelling the respondents to furnish a full account supported by proper vouchers of certain moneys expended by them in connection with certain funds collected for the erection of an Indian Temple at Port Elizabeth.

The affidavit of the applicant set out that he was an Indian shopkeeper, and resided at Burghersdorp. During 1902 the respondents visited various towns of the Cape Colony for the purpose of collecting money for the erection of an Indian Temple at Port Elizabeth. He was a member and a subscriber to the said Temple, for which a committee to administer the funds had been appointed at Port Elizabeth. Between March, 1902, and December, 1903, he subscribed to the funds of the said Temple £65 13s., and the money was paid to the respondents, who had received other large sums of money. The respondents had assumed control of the money, but he was unable to obtain any information from them. Certain members had formed themselves into what was now called the Indian Hindoo Benefit Society, and defendant was making the application in their interest, as well as his own, for the purpose of having the erection of the Temple proceeded with. He had been informed, and verily believed that the said respondents were about to leave this colony, and it would be in the interest of all concerned to have trustees appointed to receive and administer the funds. The respondents had promised to render an account, but they had not done so. The affidavit of Hubert Pagden, attorney, of Port Elizabeth, set out that the second respondent was requested to furnish certain information, but he failed to do so.

The affidavit of the first respondent, the vice-president of the society, admitted collecting the subscriptions, but denied that the applicant was a member of the Indian Temple. On the 30th July, 1902, a meeting of Indians was called at Port Elizabeth, when a president, vice-president, secretary and treasurer, and trustees were appointed for the purpose of administering the funds. No further election of officers had taken place since that date, and the same parties still held office. The second defendant was never appointed as a vice-president. He admitted that the president had left the Colony on a holiday, but a meeting had been called to appoint a substitute. He denied that the second-named respondent or himself had assumed entire control of the money. The affidavit of Daniel Brown, of Port Elizabeth, set out that his firm acted on behalf of the mortgagees of the Temple. The applicant had been ruled out of order at a meeting in his office by the members of the society, when he brought up the question of the administration of the money. He was informed that a general meeting would be called to discuss the matter.

Mr. McGregor for the applicant; Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the respondents.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: The petition filed in this case has two prayers. The first is that the respondents should be compelled to render a full account, supported by proper vouchers of all moneys received and expended by them and by the committee, being funds collected from applicant and others for the erection of a certain temple. It would appear that in 1902, subscriptions were collected from the Indian community throughout the Eastern Province towards the building of a temple for religious services at Port Elizabeth. The applicant subscribed to these funds, and as such subscriber he now makes this application. I have no doubt whatever that the Court has full authority in cases like this to require anybody who receives trust funds to account for these funds if necessity for such a course should arise; but before the applicant can call on the respondent to account in this case two things at least are necessary. One is that the applicant has a right to make this demand; and, secondly, has the conduct of the respondent been such as to render such an accounting necessary? It is alleged, and not denied, that the applicant, though a subscriber to the fund, was not a member of the church. I am not prepared to say that the applicant would be precluded from having an enquiry into the spending of a fund to which he had subscribed on that ground alone, if there was anything to show that the money subscribed by him has been improperly dealt with by the respondent, but the affidavits fail to support a charge of misconduct. On the contrary, it is alleged that in July, 1902, when the first meeting of the subscribers of the church members took place, proper officers were elected and appointed by the church to carry out the object for which the funds were collected. One Modeley was appointed secretary and treasurer, and certain other members were appointed trustees, among whom was one of the respondents. Up to October, 1903, Modeley continued to act as secretary and treasurer. Being then about to leave for India, a meeting of the church and congregation was called, and to this meeting Modeley, as treasurer, submitted an account of his administration, and those interested signed a certificate that they were thoroughly satisfied with the account up to that date. One of the respondents, who is vice-president of the church—the other was not an office-holder,—seemed thereafter to have acted as secretary and treasurer in the absence of Modeley. He received certain moneys, and he called a meeting which was held on the 4th July last, when he, too, rendered his account to the church of the moneys received and expended by him. This account was referred to Mr. Holton, a clerk in the office of Attorney Brown, and Mr. Holton has gone into these accounts rendered by the respondent, and he is thoroughly satisfied as to their correctness. At this meeting on the 4th July the respondent resigned office. A new set of officers was appointed to the church, and a new treasurer and new trustees. These new officials of the church are now in office, and none of them seem at all dissatisfied. The applicant wishes the respondents to account to him for everything received by them. His complaint is that he himself has not been furnished with an account. But I fail to see any duty on the respondents, after what they have done, to furnish the applicant with an account. The applicant is not a member of the church, and he did not have a right to attend the meetings of the church unless, indeed, he had grounds for supposing there had been fraud or mismanagement of the funds to which he contributed. Under the circumstances, the Court will not order any further investigation into the accounts. The next prayer of the applicant is that the respondent should be ordered to place any balance which might be found due in the bank, pending the appointment of proper trustees. It has been shown that at the present time proper trustees have been elected. Therefore the second prayer of the petition has been complied with, and there is no necessity for such an order. After hearing all the affidavits, I see no ground why an order should be made. Application refused accordingly, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

BUDGE V. BUDGE'S EXECUTORS. 1904.
TORS. (July 22nd.

Executor—Account—Joint estate —Inheritance—Discharge—
Restitutio in integrum—Mistake.

In an action brought by the applicant against the executors of his parents' joint estate, the Court declared that he was entitled to one-eighth of such estate, and reserved leave to him, in case he should not come to a settlement with the executors, to apply for an order, that the joint estate be realised for the purpose of ascertaining such eighth share. The applicant did come to a settlement with the executors and accepted from them the sum of £1,000 in full discharge of his claim.

Held, that it was no longer open to the applicant to take advantage of the leave reserved.

Held further, that even if the matter had been reopened, or if the applicant had proceeded by way of restitution in integrum, the fact that he had given the discharge with full knowledge of all the facts would have disentitled him to relief in the absence of fraud or any other ground of relief.

This was an application on notice to the respondents that an application would be made pursuant to a judgment delivered in May, 1903, wherein the applicant, along with Mr. Steytler, as co-plaintiff, applied for an order calling on the respondents to furnish full particulars of the applicant's rights under the joint will of his father and mother (see 13 C.T.R., 307.) His parents made a joint will in 1866, in which the surviving spouse was to have a life interest in the estate. The mother died in 1874, and the father took possession of the whole of the estate. The father re-married in 1876, and made another will, revoking the previous one, and making a fresh disposition of the property. His lordship granted an order declaring the applicant entitled to an eighth of the estate, but reserved the right to give a further order thereafter, as to the realisation of the assets, and for the appointment of Mr. Steytler to jointly administer the estate. Now the applicant came to court in terms of the reservation referred to. The affidavit of the applicant set out that he was the eldest son of George Budge. A joint will was drawn up between his father and mother in 1866. His mother died in 1874, and there were eight children of the marriage. The original will stipulated that on his father's death one-half of the estate was to be paid out and the other half was to be retained to pay interest to his wife, and on her death it was to be divided among the heirs. His father died on the 1st September, 1902, but he was not paid his share after his father's decease. Subsequent to the judgment in the Supreme Court, he accepted £1,000 as a settlement from his mother's estate, but he did not accept it as a full settlement from the joint estate.

The answering affidavit of George Runciman, one of the respondents, set out that after negotiations, the applicant, after demanding £1,500 and £1,200, finally accepted £1,000 in full settlement.

The answering affidavit of Mr. Steytler and Mr. Metcalfe, corroborated the affidavit of Mr. Runciman as to the applicant accepting £1,000 in full settlement of his share in the joint estate.

The replying affidavit of the applicant denied that he had signed away his rights. He also denied that he had been to the Deeds Office with Mr. Steytler. No balance-sheet of his father's estate was shown to him, and when he asked to see one, he was informed that he had nothing to do with it. It was only a couple of days previous to the trial that he had seen the balance-sheet, which declared the estate to be valued at £10,000, and that of his mother at £2,000. He knew that five of his brothers and sisters had been paid out by his father in his lifetime.

Mr. Burton was for the applicant; Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the executors testamentary in the estate of the late George Budge, and Mr. W. P. Buchanan for the executor dative in the estate of the late Emma Budge, and for the attorney, Mr. Metcalfe.

Mr. Burton: If the applicant is bound by his receipt clearly we are out of Court, but he says that he did not intend to sign away his inheritance for £1,000.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He may be entitled to bring an action for restitutio in integrum, but the Court has already made its order. Is there no possibility of the parties agreeing?]

Sir H. Juta: The matter is very simple. The applicant gave a clean receipt in terms of the order of Court, and now he wants to claim under the second will. He was put to his election and elected to claim under the first will.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In what capacity did Mr. Steytler write?]

He was one of the plaintiffs in the action, one of the executors dative.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You deny, Mr. Burton, that there was an election; then why was not the action proceeded with?]

Mr. Burton: There was an election, but the applicant knew nothing about the particulars of the joint estate, and no accounts thereof were ever submitted to him. In the applicant's favour it must be said that although Messrs. Steytler and Metcalfe may have thought that they had made it clear to him that he was giving up his share of his father's he did not understand that. Months after he did not understand that. Months after he had signed that receipt he gave his attorneys £100 to prosecute a further claim; which sum was returned to him when his attorneys withdrew. I admit that the information we have received from Mr. Steytler and Mr. Runciman somewhat alters our position. The account of the father's estate shows £4,000, and that of the joint estate £10,000. Thus all the father could legally dispose of under the first will was £4,000. The widow gets £6,150, and the other heirs £1,800, and yet the applicant is expected to part with all his rights for £1,000.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The account must be incorrect.]

The two accounts appear to overlap. If it could be shown that the father acquired property after his wife's death, that would account for a great deal.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Practically you are asking us to re-open the whole account?]

Yes, I fear we do ask that.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What prima facie case can you show?]

The applicant says that he was never satisfied with the accounts of the first estate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose Sir Henry your contention would be that the father acquired property after his wife's death?]

Sir H. Juta: Yes.

Mr. Buchanan: That is also Mr. Steytler's position.

Sir H. Juta and Mr. Buchanan were not heard.

De Villiers, C.J.: I am clearly of opinion that it is no longer open to the applicant to take advantage of the right reserved to him by the previous judgment of this Court. The right reserved was to renew the prayer for an order that the assets of the applicant's parents' joint estate be realised for the purpose of paying his share of the inheritance, but the right was only to be exercised in case the parties did not come to terms as to the amount of the joint estate. In fact the parties did come to terms, and the applicant accepted from the executors of the joint estate the sum of £1,000 in full discharge of his claim thereon. The applicant now states that the discharge was given under a misapprehension, but I am satisfied from the affidavits of Mr. Steytler and Mr. Metcalfe that he fully understood the accounts that were rendered by the executors, and the nature of the discharge given by him. Even therefore if the applicant had been allowed to renew his prayer or had proceeded by action for a restitutio in integrum on the ground of mistake he would have failed in obtaining relief in the absence of fraud or any other ground of relief.

The present application must be refused with costs.

[Applicant's Attorney: G. Scanlon; Respondent's Attorneys: Silberbauer, Wahl and Fuller.]

VAN DER MERWE V. EXECUTORS OF VAN DER MERWE. { 1904.
{ July 22nd.

Will — Legacy — Construction —
Direct substitution — Fidei commissary substitution.

Husband and wife, by will, bequeathed certain farms to their three sons subject to certain conditions, one of them being that the sons should show obedience to the testators during the lifetime of the latter. The will added that, if contrary to expectation, any of the three sons should die, the bequest should devolve on their respective sons, subject to the same conditions, including that of obedience to the testators.

Held, that a direct and not a fidei commissary substitution of the grandsons was intended.

This was a special case, stated in the following terms for the decision of the Court. It arose out of an action between Louw van Wijk van der Merwe, a minor, duly assisted by his mother and surviving natural guardian, Elizabeth Cornelia Louw van der Merwe, and Adrian Jacobus Louw van der Merwe, in his capacity as the executor dative in the estate of the late Francois Jacobus van der Merwe:

1. The plaintiff is the minor son of the late Francois Jacobus van der Merwe, of whose estate the defendant is the executor dative, and is also grandson of the late Schalk Willem van der Merwe, in his lifetime a farmer, and his late wife Anna Jacobsa van der Merwe (born Louw) who were married to each other with community of property, hereinafter called the grandparents.

2. By the mutual last will and testament in the Dutch language of the said grandparents, dated the 5th day of April, 1862, they bequeathed after the death of the survivor of them their places or farms called Lokenburg, Koer-demoefontein, Keizerfontein, and Menzies Kraal, all situated in the division of Calvinia, to their three sons named Schalk Willem Jacobus van der Merwe, Jacobus Nel van der Merwe, and the said late Francois Jacobus van der Merwe, for the sum of seventy-five thousand Cape Guilders, on condition that the said three sons should show them all proper respect and obedience, should remain with them during the lifetime of both or either of them, should assist them, and should give them all the required help in their occupation, or otherwise the survivor of them should have the power to revoke this legacy and bequeath the same to the obedient sons.

3. A true copy of the said Will and Testament, and a correct translation thereof into the English language, are hereunto annexed, lettered "A" and "B" respectively.

4. The said Will and Testament further provided that, in case unexpected (onverhoopt) one of the said three sons, to whom the said four places or farms are bequeathed, after the death of both the said grandparents should come to change the temporal for eternal state (i.e., die), then the bequest of his share or their shares in the said four places or farms, should devolve upon and go over to their sons and the male line (geslacht) for a reasonable sum, who will then be bound and obliged to show the same obedience to the said grandparents till the death of the survivor of them, as has been defined in the proviso to the bequest of the said four places or farms to his or their fathers under forfeiture of the said legacy, for which purpose the said grandparents gave the survivor of them full right to revoke and annul the same by his or her will. The right, however, of the father in the bequeathed four places or farms shall not devolve to the male line (geslacht), otherwise than under the same conditions and provisions against a sale, exchange, or the placing of a stranger in possession or use thereof, as defined therein.

5. The said grandparents died without the said Will and Testament, i.e., the said legacy having been revoked or altered, leaving the said three sons them surviving.

6. Transfer of a third share in each of the said four places or farms, as owned by the said grandparents, was passed by their duly appointed executors testamentary to the said late Francois Jacobus van der Merwe, who married twice, leaving two sons—the defendant by the first marriage, and the plaintiff by the second marriage.

7. The said late Francois Jacobus van der Merwe died on the second day of July, 1903, leaving a will by which he disposed of his immovable property, including the share then possessed by him in each of the said four places or farms.

8. The plaintiff contends that by virtue of the said Will and Testament of the said grandparents, the said late Francois Jacobus van der Merwe was only entitled to a life interest in the said four places or farms, and that upon his death the said four places or farms devolved upon his sons, of whom the plaintiff is one.

9. The defendant contends that under the said Will and Testament of the said grandparents a share in the bequest of the said four places or farms devolved upon grandchildren only in case the father of such grandchildren predeceased the testators or the survivor of them; and that the said late Francois Jacobus van der Merwe, having survived his father, the said Schalk Willem van der Merwe, his share in the said properties devolved upon him upon the latter's decease as his own absolute property, and free from the burden of fidei commissum, and that he was consequently entitled to dispose of it by will at pleasure, and in the manner in which he did dispose of the same.

Wherefore the parties pray for judgment upon their respective contentions, and for such order as to costs as the said Court may direct.

The original will was in Dutch. The following is an English translation:

To all and every one who shall see this public act, or hear it read, be it known that on this fifth day of the month of April, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-two, we, the undersigned Schalk Willem van der Merwe, Carel Aaron son and Anna Jacoba van der Merwe (born Louw), have resolved to make disposition of the property to be relinquished by us on demise, as we do hereby do by these presents, consequently, as we proceed thereto, we revoke first of all—all previous testaments, codicils and other testamentary acts which we have passed previous to the date of these presents, and now, as if making a new disposition, we declare: In the first place to hereby legate, bequeath and bespeak, and that after the death of the survivor of us the following, to wit, our perpetual quitrent farms, Lokenburg, Koerde-moefontein, Keizerfontein and Menieskraal, all situated in the ward Onder Bokkeveld, district of Calvinia, with all that is immovable thereon, to our children Schalk Willem Jacobus van der Merwe, Jacobus Nel van der Merwe, and Francois Jacobus van der Merwe, that is the four farms together, to them, the aforesaid three children, for the sum of seventy-five thousand Cape Guilders, say (fl. 75,000), upon the following conditions and stipulations, however:

(a) That they, Schalk Willem Jacobus van der Merwe, Jacobus Nel van der Merwe, and Francois Jacobus van der Merwe shall show us all respect and obedience owing by children to their parents, and shall remain with us so long as one of us is alive, assist us in all things, and shall give us all the necessary help in their power in the carrying on of our business, the survivor of us to have the right in case one, or the aforementioned three sons should leave us, or should not offer us the necessary assistance, or should show us the least disobedience, to withdraw the foregoing bequest of the aforesaid four farms, and to cause to devolve upon the obedient or those who are of assistance to the survivor;

(b) That in case one of the hereinbefore mentioned three children to whom, after the death of both of us, the aforesaid four farms are bequeathed, should unexpectedly pass from the temporal to the eternal, then the bequest of his share, or their shares in the said farms shall pass to and devolve upon his sons, and the male line for a reasonable sum—who shall then be held and bound to show the same obedience to us, the testators, until the death of the survivor, as is stipulated in the foregoing bequest of the farms to his or their fathers upon pain of confiscation of the bequest, to which end we give the survivor full right to revoke and annul such in his or her testament. The right of the father to the bequeathed farms shall, however, not pass otherwise to the male line than upon the same conditions and stipulations against a sale, exchange, or the placing of a stranger in possession, or use thereof as stipulated in the aforesaid written.

That in case one of the three should desire to dispose of their shares in the aforementioned farms, he shall not sell, let, exchange, trade with or otherwise dispose of the same to a stranger, but, wishing to dispose thereof, he shall do so to the joint owner or joint owners for a reasonable sum.

That no one of them shall take strangers or tenants on the said four farms unless with consent of the joint sharers, their brothers, in order to prevent as much as possible a rupture of brotherly unity.

And further, it is our wish and desire, notwithstanding the aforesaid bequest, to bequeath and bespeak, as we the testators do hereby bequeath and bespeak, to our daughter Elizabeth Susanna Louw van der Merwe, married to Isaac Jacobus van der Merwe, for the sum of one thousand guilders (fl. 1,000), a portion of the farm Lokenburg, being from the cross furrow below the . . . (unintelligible) along the river down to where the footpath and Oskloof and Lokenburgs river join from there in a straight line on the left side of Zuikerbosch Kloofs point, including all lands south of this line as far as the old line upon this stipulation, however that free drinking water shall be reserved for the general use of the joint sharers where Oskloof footpath joins Lokenburgs river.

And further, it is our wish and desire that our aforementioned daughter Elizabeth Susanna Louw van der Merwe, and her husband, Isaac Jacobus van der Merwe, shall have and retain the right to graze (35) thirty-five head of cattle on the outside farms for the period of three years after the death of the survivor, and also that the joint sharers of the farm Lokenburg shall be obliged to give our daughter, Elizabeth Susanna Louw van der Merwe, sowing land for (8) eight muids of corn for the period of three years after the death of the survivor. Also, that the said Isaac Jacobus van der Merwe and Elizabeth Susanna Louw van der Merwe shall retain the right for the period of three years after the death of the survivor to the full and free use of the two rooms in front of the threshing floor, and one half of the stable, and the entire loft above the stable, likewise the loft above the rye barn—and for this right the said Isaac Jacobus van der Merwe and Elizabeth Susanna Louw van der Merwe shall be obliged to pay annually to the joint sharers of the farm Lokenburg the sum of three pounds sterling.

And further, we, the two testators, have deemed fit to bequeath and bespeak hereby to our daughter, Elizabeth Susanna Louw van der Merwe the house situate on erf No. 3, at Calvinia, excepting the outside room of the said house, for the sum of four thousand eight hundred guilders.

Further, we bequeath and bespeak to our daughter Elizabeth Susanna Louw van der Merwe, and that for the sum of 100 Ryks daalders, a certain piece of ground called Baviansfontein, being from the beacon of Kooren's Hoogte in a straight line to the beacon of Baviansfontein, and from there as the ridge runs round the kloof, the ridge forming the division, and including Baviansfontein. This bequest to take effect upon the same conditions and stipulations as those upon which the other bequest is made to her.

In case our beloved daughter Elizabeth Susanna Louw van der Merwe should die before her husband Isaac Jacobus van der Merwe then he the said Isaac Jacobus van der Merwe shall retain the right to these bequeathed goods as long as he lives in order the better to be able to bring up and maintain the children upon the usufruct and after his death all these bequeathed goods shall fall to and devolve upon the children already born or still to be born of the marriage of the said Isaac Jacobus van der Merwe with Elizabeth Susanna Louw van der Merwe.

Further we the testators declare to bequeath and bespeak to our beloved daughter Maria Catharina Elizabeth van der Merwe married to Isaac Heremias Visagie as a gift from her parents the outside room of the house situate on erf No. 3 at Calvinia; she shall however not have the right to assume it until after the death of the survivor of us and that the well in front of the said outside room shall be kept free for the use of the joint sharers of the said house.

And we bequeath and bespeak as a gift to our daughters each the sum of (£100) one hundred pounds sterling to be (paid) in advance out of our joint estate after the death of the survivor.

And further we bequeath and bespeak to the children of our deceased son Jacobus Adrian van der Merwe the same legacy of £100 in advance after the death of the survivor equally with our daughters.

And to the daughter of our late deceased son Carel Aaron van der Merwe named Johanna, married to Abraham Moeton, the same legacy of £100 in advance to be paid after the death of the survivor.

Further, we, the undersigned, declare to nominate and appoint each other reciprocally that is the first dying the survivor of us together with the children already born of this marriage as we hereby do to be the sole and universal heirs of the first dying in equal shares and in case of predecease of one or more of those children then the predeceased's descendants by representation and such to all the property of the first dying movable as well as immovable, acts and credits, inheritances and expectancies nothing whatsoever excepted to be assumed and possessed by them as free, personal and unencumbered property without the contradiction of any-one whomsoever.

We, the undersigned, declare it to be our express wish and desire that the survivor if he or she so desire shall remain in full and undisturbed possession of the entire estate, provided, however, that he or she be held and bound to bring up and maintain in an honourable and Christian way the children already born of this marriage until their majority, marriages, or other approved states, at which time the portion of the same shall be paid out to each of them.

We, the undersigned, declare that the survivor of us shall be held and bound within the period of three months after the death of the first dying of us to have the entire estate properly inventoried and appraised by two competent men of no blood relationship or connection by marriage in order to correctly ascertain each inheritance, which inheritance the survivor shall be obliged to pay out.

Further, we the undersigned declare to nominate each other reciprocally together with our sons, Schalk Willem Jacobus van der Merwe, Jacobus Nel van der Merwe, and Francois Jacobus van der Merwe, likewise our sons-in-law Isaac Jacobus van der Merwe, Isaacs Heremias Visagie, Gert Jacobus van Wijk and Johannes Abraham van Wijk as executors of this our will administrators of our estate and effects and such with power of assumption, substitution and surrogation, wherefore we desire that no one shall interfere with our estate or children to that end excluding all and any officials or magistrates who ex office might or could interfere therewith.

We the undersigned declare that the aforesaid executors shall not be obliged to file with the Master of the Supreme Court or any magistrate a statement and inventory of our estate.

Finally we the undersigned declare to expressly reserve to ourselves the power and right at all times to alter this our final disposition (except the appointment of heirs) consequently to add thereto or take therefrom as we may be advised either by separate act or at the foot of this document desiring that all alterations so found and under our own signatures shall be regarded as if the same had been literally inserted herein.

All the aforesaid having been read by us we declare this to contain and to be our testament last or final will with the desire that it in all parts shall be valid and take effect as such either as a solemn testament, codicil, donatio mortis causa or as may best consist with law notwithstanding any formalities may have been omitted which we hereby regard as having been inserted imploring the extreme assistance of the law.

Thus testated and passed at Calvinia year month and day aforementioned and in the presence of the subscribing witnesses.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the plaintiff; Mr. M. De Villiers for the defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The question is whether this is a direct, or a fideicommissary substitution.]

Sir H. Juta: Yes, I must admit that the will directs that these substituted heirs must show obedience and respect to the testators from which no doubt it might be argued that the substitution is direct. The will, however, places a restraint on alienation, and that would seem to imply that the instituted heirs were only fiduciaries, and that the substitution was clearly fideicommissary.

Mr. M. de Villiers was not called upon.

De Villiers, C.J.: The question to be decided is whether in substituting their grandsons for their sons in the bequest of the four farms in question the testators intended a direct or a fideicommissary substitution. After bequeathing the farms to their three sons subject to certain conditions, one of them being that the sons should show obedience to the testators during their lifetime, the will added that if contrary to expectation any of the three sons should die the bequest should devolve on their respective sons subject to the same conditions, including that of obedience to the testators. It was to be expected that the sons would die at some time or another, but it would be contrary to expectations that they should die during the lifetime of their parents the testators. The event, therefore, in which the legacy was intended to devolve on any grandson was the death of any of the sons during the lifetime of the testators. This view is strengthened by the condition that the grandsons were to show the same obedience as had been required of the sons, which it would only be possible for them to do during the lifetime of the testators. Clearly, therefore, what was intended was a direct and not a fideicommissary substitution of the grandsons. All the sons survived their parents, and received transfer of their respective shares of the farms. Subsequently one of the sons died after having by will disposed of his immovable property, but the plaintiff who is his son disputes his right to deal with the farms after his death, and claims a reversionary right to them under the will. This claim could only be validly made if the substitution had been a fideicommissary one, but seeing that the substitution was direct, judgment must be given in terms of the defendant's contention. The costs will come out of the estate.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Honourable Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C. K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

APPEALS.

REX V. LIEBENBERG. { 1904.
 { July 26th.

Masters and Servants Act—Unlawful detention of child—Right of mother of illegitimate child.

The father of an illegitimate child, four years old, apprenticed it to the appellant without the formal consent of the mother, who objected to the child being apprenticed at that age. The child remained with the mother, and the appellant was informed by the Magistrate of the district, not acting in his judicial capacity, that he was entitled to take possession of the child. He accordingly obtained possession of the child, and the mother claimed the restoration of the child under section 27, chap. 5, of Act 15 of 1856. The proceedings in the Resident Magistrate's Court were in form of a criminal nature, but there was no verdict of guilty and no sentence beyond an order that the child be restored to its mother.

Held, on appeal, that there was not sufficient ground for disturbing the order of the Magistrate's Court.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Hope Town, in which the defendant, Christoffel Liebenberg, had been ordered to restore a native male child named Jack to its mother and natural guardian, Sarah Biddulph.

From the record of the Court below it appeared that the defendant had been charged with detaining the child, who was under the age of sixteen, as a servant or inmate of his house, and with refusing to restore the said child to its mother and natural guardian. The Magistrate found that the child was illegally held by the accused, and sentence was that the child be restored to its mother and natural guardian. The defence was that a contract had been entered into between the appellant and the father of the child for service, and that £10 was paid in consideration of the indenture. The child was born out of wedlock.

Mr. Percy Jones was for the appellant; Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones: My first point is that in this case no criminal offence has been committed. Sec. 27 of Act 15 of 1856 provides civil machinery for the recovery of a child under 16 detained by any person against the will of its natural guardian.

[De Villiers, C.J.: This is not a matter of review. You appeal against the proceedings as irregular.]

We say that the Magistrate was wrong ab initio, and that the whole proceedings should be quashed.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then your whole procedure is wrong.]

It might perhaps have been better if we had asked for review. But see Shaw v. Shaw (4 Juta 424), particularly the judgment of De Villiers, C.J. The whole point of that case is that this section gives the Magistrate only civil, but not criminal jurisdiction. See also Boswell v. Johnson (1 Roscoe, 16) and Barendse v. Daniels (1 Watermeyer 11.) Then as to the merits the evidence shows that the accused was acting bona fide, and that he had no criminal intent.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What right had he to forcibly take the child?]

I do not know that he took the child by force, though no doubt he did bring pressure to bear on the mother. He went to the Magistrate and entered into the usual contract.

[Buchanan, J.: Against the wishes of the mother.]

Yes, that is so.

[Buchanan, J.: The man may have acted bona fide, but the child was unlawfully detained. The accused has not shown any right on the merits to have the record quashed.

Mr. H. Jones was not heard.

De Villiers, C.J.: If this had been an application by way of review, an important question might have arisen as to whether the proceedings should have been in the form in which they came before the Court. The case was treated as a criminal case, the accused was charged with contravening section 27, chapter 5, Act 15 of 1886, in that he "did wrongfully and unlawfully detain one Jack, a native male child, under the age of 16 years, as his servant or inmate of his house, and refused to restore the said child to its mother and natural guardian, Sarah Biddulph." The appellant was then certainly arraigned, and he pleaded not guilty, but in giving his judgment, the Magistrate really did not find him guilty; he did not record a verdict of guilty against him; he said that the child was illegally held by the accused, which would have been a correct judgment in case it had been a civil proceeding, and then the sentence did not include any fine or imprisonment upon the accused, but it ordered that the child be returned to the mother, its natural guardian, which also would be a perfectly competent judgment in case it had been a civil proceeding. It is not, however, a case of review, the applicant appeals against the judgment, therefore, I think the Court may now dismiss the objection to the form of the judgment, if substantial justice was done by the judgment. In my opinion, substantial justice was done. It is true that there was a contract made for the apprenticeship of this young child, then four years of age, to the appellant, but the contract was entered into by the father of the child; that father not being married to the mother, it was an illegitimate child; the mother alone had the legal custody of the child, the father had no legal control. Of course, if the mother had so acted in regard to the apprenticeship as to make it contrary to good faith that she should recover back this child, then under the 27th section of the Act the Magistrate could have refused to order delivery of the child, but it was not clear that the mother did so act as to make it contrary to good faith that she should recover back the child. One thing comes out clearly, and that is that the mother objected at the time to the child being immediately apprenticed, and no time was fixed when she would consent to the child being allowed to be apprenticed. Then the appellant went to the Magistrate, not apparently in his judicial capacity, but in his private capacity. Acting on the private opinion of the then Magistrate, the appellant went and took away the child, apparently without the consent of the mother. That, clearly, he had no right to do; the mother was no party to the contract. The appellant could not have obtained the custody of the child without a judicial order. In the absence of any such judicial order, I consider that the applicant never had the legal custody of the child, and never had the right to keep the child. The order, therefore, of the Magistrate seems to me to be perfectly correct. It is to be regretted that the proceedings took place under his ordinary criminal jurisdiction, but I do not see, considering the form of the proceedings, how this could be brought up as a record against the defendant for a criminal offence. Under these circumstances, I think the appeal should be dismissed.

REX V. ENSLIN AND MOLL. { 1904.
July 26th.

Game Preservation Act—Notice by owner of land—Best evidence.

In a prosecution of the appellants before a Resident Magistrate's Court for contravention of the 7th section of Act 36 of 1886, a notarial certificate was produced to the effect that the prosecutor, being the owner of the land on which the appellants trespassed, had published in the A. newspaper, circulating locally, a notice, and warning that he was desirous to preserve the game thereon.

Held, that proof of the giving or publication of such notice and warning was indispensable, and that, as the best evidence had not been given, namely, the production of a copy of the newspaper, the conviction could not be supported.

This was an appeal against a judgment of the R.M. of the Paarl, who had convicted the appellants of contravening Section 7, Act 36 of 1886, and had convicted the accused Enslin of contravening section 4, Act 36 of 1886. The appellants had each been sentenced to pay a fine of £1 in regard to the first charge.

In regard to the first offence, the appeal was brought on the grounds (1) that the requirements of the 7th section of the Act were not complied with, inasmuch as no notice had been given previous to the commission of the offence, personally, or in the “Government Gazette,” or any local newspaper circulating in the district that the complainant, Joseph de Koch, desired to preserve the game on his land; (2) that the conviction was bad in law; and (3) that the evidence did not support the conviction. In regard to the other offence, the ground of appeal was that the evidence did not support the conviction.

From the evidence, it appeared that the two men were seen in the act of cutting a buck's throat on the land of the complainant, and that they were both carrying guns. One of the prisoners, Enslin, had no licence to shoot game. The complainant said that he gave notice in the “Advertentieblad,” which was published during the suspension of “Ons Land” during martial law, warning people against shooting game on his land.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for the appellants; Mr. Howel Jones was for the Crown.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers: Both the accused appeal against the conviction under Sec. 7 of Act 36 of 1886 on the ground that the owner has not given the prescribed notice of his wish to preserve his farm. A paper published in Cape Town is not a “local paper” in the Paarl.

[Buchanan, J.: It would be sufficient if the notice were published in the Gazette; a local paper is a paper circulating in the locality.]

The popular meaning of “local newspaper” is either a paper published in the town or district, or one dealing particularly with local topics. As to the ordinary meaning of the term see Imperial Dictionary under the word “local.”

[De Villiers, C. J. Where is your proof that this notice was inserted in the “Advertentieblad”?]

Mr. H. Jones: I quite admit that the notarial certificate is not evidence, but we have the affidavit of the constable who acted as messenger to the effect that he was unable to procure a copy of the paper.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Has one of the appellants a licence?]

Moll has a licence.

[Buchanan, J.: He did not produce it.]

The Chief Constable says he has one.

Mr. De Villiers: There seems to be no evidence against Enslin on the second count (under sec. 4.) The Magistrate says that there was none, and then proceeds to find him guilty. The evidence all goes to show that Enslin did not shoot the game in question.

Mr. H. Jones: Sec. 4 prohibits the pursuit of game. Enslin was charged under Sec. 4 as well as under Sec. 7.

De Villiers, C.J.: Both the appellants were charged under the first count for contravention of the seventh section of Act 36 of 1886, in that they did kill, catch, capture, pursue, and hunt certain game on the farm of Joseph de Kook, without permission of the owner, the said farm being private property. It is a condition precedent to the prosecutor succeeding in such a prosecution that he should prove that notice and warning had been given, either personally or by letter, or in the “Gazette,” or in a local newspaper, that he is desirous to preserve the game thereon. It was alleged that a notice was inserted in the “Advertentieblad,” which was substituted for “Ons Lands” during martial law. It is contended on behalf of the appellant that the “Advertentieblad,” being issued in Cape Town, cannot be regarded as a local newspaper, and that as there is a local newspaper called the “Patriot,” at the Paarl, notice ought to be published in that paper. It is not necessary, however, to decide that point, because in my opinion there is not sufficient evidence that there was a publication in the “Advertentieblad.” The onus of proving the publication lay upon the prosecutor, and the prosecutor ought therefore to have subpoenaed the publisher of the “Advertentieblad” to prove the insertion of the notice. The best evidence should be produced. The parties apparently thought that the production of a notarial certificate was sufficient, but no such procedure can be adopted in criminal cases. The prosecution should have produced the best evidence, and in the absence of such evidence, there was no sufficient proof of notice. The convictions therefore on the first count in both cases ought to be quashed. In regard to the second count, only one of the appellants was charged, viz., Enslin. It is said on behalf of the appellant that Enslin did not shoot the buck: that it was Moll who shot it, and that therefore Enslin could not be charged with a contravention of the fourth section of the Act in that he did kill, catch, capture, hurt, or shoot at certain game. In my opinion, there is clear evidence that Enslin did hunt and pursue the game. Whether he actually fired a shot is another matter; but both men went out with a common object. Both were sportsmen, both carried guns, and when the one sportsman, Moll, had shot the buck, the other sportsman came up and cut its throat. One can hardly understand why the buck's throat should be cut, unless the buck were still alive, and it was necessary to despatch it by cutting its throat. However, independently of this, I consider that both went out with the common illegal object, and that both required licences. It appears, however, that Moll had a licence, and he was not convicted on the second count. As to Enslin, he had no licence, and therefore the conviction of Enslin under the second count must stand. The appeal will be allowed on the first count, but dismissed on the second.

REX V. HAMMERSCHLAG. { 1904.
July 26th.

Liquor licence—Condition—Construction—Lighting of lamp—Closing time.

A condition was inserted in the appellant's liquor licence that a lamp was to be affixed over the door of the licensed premises and kept lit from sunset to closing time. The hours for which the licence was granted were from 7 a.m. to 9 p.m.

Held, that as the appellant was not legally bound to keep his licensed premises open until 9 p.m., the reasonable construction of the term "closing time" was the time when he actually closed his premises, and that if he actually closed his premises on any night before 9 p.m., he could not be legally convicted for not keeping such lamp lit until 9 p.m. on such night.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Resident Magistrate of Kenhardt.

The appellant was charged before the Magistrate with contravening section 5 of Act 44 of 1885 in that he committed a breach of a condition of a liquor licence granted to him. The licence was to sell liquor between the hours of seven a.m. and nine p.m., and a condition was attached to the licence that he should keep a lamp lit outside the bar from sunset until closing time. It appeared that on the occasion of the alleged offence, appellant closed his bar before nine o'clock and extinguished the lamp. The Magistrate held that "closing time" meant the hour to which the premises were licensed to be opened, and convicted appellant and fined him £3. Appellant contended that he was only obliged to keep the light lit until the time when he actually closed the bar.

Dr. Greer appeared for the appellant; Mr. Howel Jones for the Crown.

Dr. Greer: The appellant was not bound to keep his bar open. The licence is only permissive as far as the legal hours are concerned. It is prohibitive as to any time not comprised within those hours. It was sufficient compliance with the terms of the licence as to hours that anybody could obtain refreshment within the hours by applying for it. If then, the accused had a right to close his bar at any time before 9, what was the use of the light? The light can be needed only either to enable the police to see who is going into the bar or to direct people to it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If he is bound to keep open to 9, he must burn a light till 9.]

Yes, and if he is not bound to keep open he need not burn it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The licence authorises the sale of liquor on Sundays. If a man has conscientious objections to serve liquor on Sundays, surely he is not bound to do so?]

Quite so.

Mr. Jones: By the terms of his licence the appellant is bound to supply meals and liquor within certain hours.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Suppose a traveller came at 10 p.m. and asked for food, could not the hotel-keeper supply liquor with it, if asked?]

I submit not.

[Buchanan, J.: A licence is a permission, not a compulsion to sell.]

I was not upon that point, but upon the question of closing time. He may keep open till 9; hence the Licensing Court evidently intended that the light should burn till 9.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If they meant that they could have named the hour; but they have not done so; they only speak of "closing time."]

It is only a reasonable interpretation that the light should burn till 9 o'clock. Were it not for this light, a man might open at all hours, and admit all sorts of characters, as the police would not be able to see what was going on.

De Villiers, C.J.: The condition inserted in the appellant's licence was: A lamp is to be affixed over the door of the licensed premises on the outside, and kept lit from sunset to closing time, except there is moonlight during such hours. Then there is a further provision that the hours in respect of which the licence is granted are from seven a.m. to nine p.m. The prosecution reads this condition as if it had said that the lamps should be kept lit from sunset to nine o'clock, but it is not so stated, and it was quite competent for the Licensing Court to have made this clear. Instead of fixing nine o'clock, which is the time of closing, and which it would have been very easy for the Licensing Court to do, they used the words "from sunset to closing time." In my opinion the fair meaning of these words is that the lamps should be kept lit from sunset until the time when the appellant actually closed his premises. Another question then arises: Was the appellant bound to keep his licensed premises open until nine o'clock? If he was bound to keep them open until nine o'clock I confess I would have been prepared to hold that he was bound to keep the lamp lit, but I do not consider he was bound to keep them open until nine o'clock. He obtains a privilege to sell until nine o'clock, and is prohibited from selling after nine o'clock, but he is not compelled to sell from seven to nine. If he chooses to close up his bar between seven and nine, I do not think the Licensing Court or the public have any remedy against him. In these circumstances I am of opinion that, as the Licensing Court did not make the condition clear, and as the condition is quite capable of the meaning that he shall only keep a light until the time when he actually closed the bar, the conviction ought not to be sustained. The appeal will therefore be allowed and the conviction quashed.

dissolution, to take effect only on payment by the defendant to the plaintiff of two post-dated cheques given to the plaintiff as his share of the partnership assets. The defendant remained in possession of the partnership assets, part of which he sold at a considerable profit, but he failed to pay the amount of the cheques which were dishonoured at their due date.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover not only the amount of the cheques but the amount of profits actually made by the defendant, pending the actual dissolution of the partnership, after deduction of such portion of the amount of the cheques as had been devoted to the purchase of the goods on which the profit was made.

This was an action brought by Moses Aronstain, cart driver, Cape Town, against Benno Maisel and Maisel Bros., Ltd., carrying on business in Cape Town, for balance of certain dishonoured cheques and account of certain partnership transactions.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff entered into an agreement of partnership with the first-named defendant and the second-named defendants, whereby they were to become partners in the trade of general importers and merchants. It was provided in the said agreement that the plaintiff should contribute £250 in cash to the partnership, and the defendants should contribute £250 in goods, and that any profits and losses should be equally shared between the said partners. On the 22nd and 23rd January, the plaintiff paid to the said first-named defendant two sums of £125 each. Thereafter, it was resolved that the partnership should be dissolved from the 1st March, and Benno Maisel then gave to the plaintiff two cheques for £125 each in return for the money he had paid in. The plaintiff duly presented the cheques, which were dishonoured, and he afterwards applied for provisional sentence in the Supreme Court. Provisional sentence was given by the Court for £65 16s., and as to the balance of £184 4s. the parties were directed to go into the principal case. Plaintiff admitted that he had sold goods of the value of £145 and £39, and said he was prepared to bring these sums into the account. He prayed for an order for a true and correct account of the partnership, debate, judgment for such sums as Partnership—Dissolution—Profits.

The plaintiff and defendant being partners, agreed upon a may on debate be found to be due to the plaintiff, and costs of suit.

The defendants pleaded in abatement in regard to the suit against the second-named defendants, and said that the first-named defendant, Benno Maisel, ought to have been sued personally in the action. Failing the plea in abatement, the defendants pleaded over and said they admitted the agreement of partnership, payment of the cheques, dissolution of partnership, and so forth, but that it was agreed as a condition of the dissolution at the option of Benno Maisel that the plaintiff should not present the cheques for payment until he (defendant) had completed his contract with Rosenblum and Company, and that he should pay interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum. The contract was to be completed on the 1st May, and the defendant availed himself of this privilege. One of the terms of the dissolution was that the parties should have no claim one against the other. Plaintiff, in breach of agreement, presented the cheques for payment on the 1st March. He unlawfully entered on the business premises of the defendant, and removed and sold certain iron for the sum of £145 4s., and appropriated the proceeds to his own use, and failed to pay over to the first-named defendant the said proceeds, or any part thereof. Plaintiff also took possession of a wagon and horse, and sold the same for £39, and similarly appropriated the proceeds to his own use. By reason of this the defendant had been unable to complete his contract with Rosenblum and Co. He admitted that provisional sentence was obtained by the plaintiff for the sum of £65 16s., and said that in view of the sales, which had been made by the defendant of the iron, and horses and wagon, the plaintiff's claim had been fully satisfied. He denied that the plaintiff was entitled to any profits, or to an account. He prayed that the plaintiff's claim be dismissed with costs. For a claim in reconvention he repeated the allegations in his plea, and claimed the following sums: £800, value of goods wrongfully appropriated and sold by the plaintiff, now defendant in reconvention; £500 damages for breach of his contract with Rosenblum and Co., due to the action of the defendant Aronstain; and £500 damages for breach of contract by defendant in commencing business in competition with the plaintiff (Maisel) contrary to the agreement of dissolution of partnership; interest a tempore morae and costs of suit.

In replication, the plaintiff denied that his claim had been fully satisfied. For a plea in reconvention he said that the amount for which he sold the iron was a fair value, he denied that through his action the defendant (Maisel) had been prevented from completing his contract with Rosenblum and Co., or that Maisel had suffered any damages thereby, and he also denied that it was any part of the agreement of the dissolution of partnership that he should not commence business on his own account or in partnership in South Africa within a specified period.

Mr. Gardiner for plaintiff; Mr. M. de Villiers for defendant.

Moses Aronstain (the plaintiff) said he met the defendant Benno Maisel in January this year, and entered into an agreement of partnership. Witness was to put in £250 in cash, and the defendant was to put in £250 in goods. He did not know whether defendant put in anything; he saw no goods. It was provided that each of them was to draw cheques at the bank. Witness never drew cheques. It was also provided that they were each to draw £12 a month salary. Witness got no salary. He was dissatisfied, and it was agreed on the 6th February that they should dissolve partnership. Maisel prepared a letter, which witness signed. The press copy produced by the other side was incorrect.

De Villiers, C.J., asked counsel for the defendant if they had the original letter in Yiddish?

Mr. De Villiers said it had been mislaid.

Witness was examined in regard to the press copy, and he pointed out certain discrepancies from the original. Proceeding, he said that the only arrangement he made at the dissolution was that he was to receive back his £250 on the 1st March, and to have the profits on 3,500 jackets. Maisel had told him that he had made a good profit on the jackets; he bought them for 7d. each, and sold them at 2s. 3d. each, thus leaving a big profit. The jackets were bought from Rosenblum and Co., and paid for on the 22nd and 23rd January. They had also a large quantity of iron, which he sold to Rosenblum and Co. for £145; this had been gathered from various sources by witness and one Rabinowitz. The total expenses in connection with the iron was £60. He sold a cart and horse that had been bought for £50 for the partnership; he got £38 for the horse and cart. He also sold certain dishes for £1 4s. He had paid out certain items on account of the partnership.

Cross-examined: The partnership did not come to an end before they did any business at all. He told Mr. Maisel that he intended to go to Johannesburg and commence business. He denied that he agreed to a restraint of trade. He offered Mr. Maisel £50 profit on his share of the jackets. £50 was paid for the cart and horses, which were sold for £38. They sold the iron to Rosenblum in a lump for £145. Witness asked for the £12, less share of wages, on the 1st February.

By the Court: What right had you to ask for it then? The partnership was only established a few days?—Because he was doing me down.

By the Court: When witness entered into the partnership, he thought his partner was an honest man. He suspected him of trying to do him down a couple of days after, when he asked him for money and he refused to give it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How could you expect him to pay you a month's salary when he had only been with him a week?

Because he drew some of the profits for his own use.

How do you know that?—He told me. How much did he draw?—I cannot say.

Oscar Harding Webster, ledger clerk at the African Banking Corporation, stated Mr. Maisel opened an account in the name of Maisel Brothers and Co., Ltd., on the 22nd January. He paid in £150. Maisel was the only person who drew cheques on the account.

Joseph Aleck Werek, manager of Rosenblum and Co., stated he sold jackets to Maisel for £109 7s. 6d. in January, for which he received a cash cheque. Maisel met witness in the street shortly after, and said he had made a good profit. Witness purchased a quantity of iron from the firm for £145. Maisel said there were 150 tons in it, but there were only about 100 tons. Maisel had a contract with witness's firm to supply them with iron, but he had failed to carry it out.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What kind of iron was it?]

Just scrap iron.

Samuel Rabinowitz stated he was employed by Maisel to gather scrap iron. Maisel went to witness in January and told him he had taken in a partner. After a short time he informed witness that the partnership had been dissolved. Maisel left for Johannesburg. Maisel used to make cheques out in witness's name, which witness cashed, and gave the proceeds to Maisel. On one occasion witness cashed a cheque for £60 for him.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: Witness was on good terms with Maisel. Witness sued him for £4 12s. 4d., and got a decree for 12s. 4d., with costs.

Moses Aronstain (recalled by Mr. De Villiers) stated he never contested Maisel's right to draw cheques.

Mr. Gardiner closed his case.

Benno Maisel, the defendant, stated that he entered into partnership with plaintiff. He had authority from his company to do so. The company was incorporated in England, and witness was managing director. Plaintiff stopped witness in the street and asked for a job. Witness knew him in England, and said he could give him a job. Plaintiff suggested that Maisel should take him into partnership, and he would do all the work. Witness was to draw on the account as long as he was in South Africa, and when he left plaintiff was to draw on it. Witness took £500 worth of goods into the partnership. Three days after the partnership was made plaintiff went to witness and said he had just got an appointment on a mine in Johannesburg, and had to dissolve the partnership. Witness left for Johannesburg, and whilst there plaintiff sold all the goods. The goods consisted of iron and metal. Before the partnership witness had collected about 200 to 250 tons of iron. At the time of the sale there was about 400 tons. On February 7 witness gave plaintiff £7 as interest on the £250 to June. He never authorised the sending of the telegram alleged to have been sent from Johannesburg. Witness's contract price for iron was £2 per ton, which was very cheap. He used to send it as ballast on sailing vessels to Hamburg.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: All the iron he had was sold to Rosenblum, and if the latter said that it only amounted to 100 tons he was wrong. The same day the agreement was signed it was understood that he only was to sign cheques. He denied that he told Rosenblum and Rabinowitz that he sold the jackets for 2s. 3d. each.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is Maisel Bros. a limited liability company in England?]

Yes.

Mr. Friedlander, attorney, said that he told Mr. Maisel to get the document which was written in Hebrew translated. The document accidentally got mislaid in the office. He could not say whether the document produced was the one or not.

Mr. Goldblatt, sworn interpreter, stated that he translated a document for Maisel, and he was positive that his translation was a correct one.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The original was written on stiff paper, and he returned it to Maisel.

Mr. Maxton, engineer, said Mr. Aronstain approached him with regard to a certain quantity of iron. He calculated 425 tons at £2 a ton.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Calculating by weight was much more correct than by measurement.

Aaron Yellowitz said that Aronstain told him in February that he had dissolved partnership with Maisel.

The witness Rabinowitz, recalled by His Lordship, adhered to his statement that the cheque for £60 was given to him for the purpose of changing, and he handed the money to Maisel.

Rosenblum (recalled) said that Maisel had a contract to supply his firm with iron, and they held him to his contract.

Mr. De Villiers closed his case.

Mr. Gardiner, for the plaintiff, argued that his client had made a very good case. If he did not receive judgment on any other portion of his claim he should on the jacket transaction. The jackets were purchased for £109 7s. 6d., and the evidence was that they were sold for a good profit. Maisel had said that he only made a profit of 2d. each, but he would not call that a good profit, and if it was so he had had opportunities of producing his books and also the purchaser of the jackets to prove that, both of which precautions he did not adopt. All the admissions of the defendant went to show that the blankets had been sold, Maisel said, at 8d. profit each, 6d. of which was taken up in expenses, which made a total of £87, rather a large expenditure to incur in a £107 transaction. He submitted that judgment should be given to plaintiff for £100.

Mr. De Villiers (for the defence) contended that Aronstain was not a credible witness. When he applied for an interdict against the present defendant, he stated in his affidavit that Maisel had not put any goods into the partnership, but under cross-examination, he had tried to cover that up. Evidence had been given by an engineer that there was a large quantity of stock at the time the partnership was entered into. He did not think the Court could consider Mr. Rabinowitz as an impartial witness, as, on his own showing, he had had a lawsuit with Maisel.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the Court can only deal with the defendant as Benno Maisel, because there is no evidence before the Court of the bona fide existence of a limited liability company, known as Maisel Brothers and Co., Ltd. The defendant Maisel has produced a certificate with the Transvaal stamp on it, to the effect that he had been appointed to act carte blanche, and with full authority from the company, in all transactions, but that is not legal evidence. In his dealings with the plaintiff, the defendant alone appeared, he taking the whole responsibility on himself of conducting the business. As the company was outside the jurisdiction of the Court, the only course open to the plaintiff was to make the defendant personally a party to the suit. The defendant appears to have acted alone in the matter, and as he is within the jurisdiction and the limited company outside the jurisdiction of the Court, and as there is no evidence as to the powers of the company, or as to the authority which he had from the company, the only course open is to deal with the defendant alone. The partnership was admitted. It appears from the evidence that shortly after the partnership had been entered into, the plaintiff began to distrust the defendant, but he had already given his two cheques for £250, and the money had also been partly used for the purpose of purchasing jackets which were to form part of the stock-in-trade of the partnership. In February an agreement was arrived at that the partnership should be dissolved, but the date when the dissolution was to take effect was disputed. According to the plaintiff, the dissolution was to take place on the 1st March, and according to the defendant, at once. The cheques that were given by the defendant seemed, however, to support the plaintiff's contention, because they were postdated for the 1st March, and it certainly seemed strange that the defendant, who had agreed to a dissolution early in February should make the cheque payable on March 1. A document had been put in purporting to be a copy of a document alleged to have been written by the plaintiff to the defendant in February. The defendant denied that it was a correct copy of the letter he wrote. Certainly, the explanation to my mind, that he had lost the correct copy is wholly unsatisfactory. He said he gave it to his attorney, and all the attorney could say was—such was possible, but he did not say it was a fact. On an important matter of the kind clearer evidence should be given of the contents of the document. The defendant's evidence does not impress me so favourably as to be accepted without misgivings. For instance, to refer to the telegrams that passed between Rabinowitz and Maisel. They found that Rabinowitz wired to Maisel on the 14th March to the effect that Aaronstain was removing the iron, and that the police could not stop him, and asked to have instructions wired. A wire was received in reply stating it was all right, as Aronstain was a partner. Defendant said that that wire was sent by his agent whilst he was away. If that was so, why was there not some evidence to that effect brought forward? The defendant said he sent a different telegram, but he did not produce a copy. I am of opinion that the plaintiff has clearly shown that he is entitled to succeed in his action. The judgment must on the whole be a rough and ready one, because the Court had not all the data before it to give a judgment founded upon clear details. The claim for £250, the amount of the two cheques, is counterbalanced by the plaintiff selling the iron and the cart and horses, so that no claim can be allowed for that. In respect of the amount due out of the profits of the jackets, there is some dispute, but the Court is satisfied that the sum of £100 would be within the mark after deducting from the amount of the profits so much of the amount included in the cheques as had been devoted to the purchase of the jackets. In regard to the claim in reconvention, the whole of that claim will have to stand or fall by the validity of the letter to which I have referred, and as I have stated that I am not satisfied with the validity of the letter that claim must fall to the ground. With regard to the claim for iron, the Court is of opinion that the plaintiff has accounted for the money obtained for it, and that he had sold it in the best interests of the partnership. As regards the claim for putting an end to the contract, that also falls to the ground. That disposes of the whole claim in reconvention. The result is that there will be judgment for the plaintiff against the defendant in his individual capacity for the sum of £100, with costs, and upon the claim in reconvention there will be absolution from the instance.

Mr. Gardiner asked for an order with regard to some money in the bank, which had been attached.

The Chief Justice said the attachment would continue until the further order of the Court.

WREYMON V. SOLOMON.

Mr. Upington applied as a matter of urgency for the appointment of a commission to take the evidence of Mr. W. T. Olive, Civil Engineer, Cape Town, who was leaving Cape Town on Monday, and who was an important witness in the above suit, which was set down for hearing on the 3rd August. The other side did not intend to offer any opposition to the application. He suggested Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers as commissioner.

The application was granted, the costs to be costs in the cause.

CIVIL APPEALS.

WILLMER V. RENCE. { 1904.
 { July 28th.

Owner or occupier of land—Dog
—Trespass—Minor—Act 40 of 1889.

The defendant, a minor, was sued in a Magistrate's Court for damages for shooting the plaintiff's dog while trespassing at night on land occupied by him, and he raised the defence of minority. It appeared, however, that the power to defend had been signed by the defendant, purporting to be assisted by his father and natural guardian, who, as such, also signed the power.

Held, that the power cured any defect in the summons.

Held further, that under the 226th section of Act 40 of 1889, the defendant was entitled to shoot the dog trespassing on property in his lawful occupation and not being under the charge of any person.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the R.M. of King William's Town, by which the appellant, Fred. Ernest Wilmer, had been ordered to pay £10 damages and costs of suit for unlawfully shooting an Irish terrier, valued at £20, the property of Mrs. Rance, the respondent.

The ground of appeal was an exception on the point that the appellant was a minor, and also on the merits of the case.

Evidence taken in the Court below was read, from which it appeared that the dog had been found in the veld among mimosa bushes. It was dead, and, according to the prosecutor's story, from appearances it seemed to have been shot. The dog (Grip) had been fighting with a dog called Spring, and it was alleged that Wilmer had admitted having shot the animal to put it out of its pain. The incident happened in the vicinity of the police camp at Fort White. For the defence, evidence was called to the effect that the plaintiff's dog was injured by Spring, and had its leg broken. The dogs were parted, but Spring went back again, and killed Grip. The story as to shooting was denied. Defendant denied that he had shot the animal, though he admitted having said, "What if I have shot the dog?"

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said he disallowed the exception taken at the trial as to defendant being a minor, as it appeared to him that the defendant had been tacitly emancipated. Even if that were not so, he had obtained the necessary assistance of his father to defend the action. On the merits of the case, he found that the defendant had shot the plaintiff's dog, and had shown no justification for the act.

He saw no reason to doubt the bona fides of the witnesses called by the plaintiff.

Mr. D. Buchanan was for the appellant; Mr. Percy Jones was for the respondent.

Mr. D. Buchanan: The Magistrate overruled the exception as to minority, but see Jansen v. Wagenaar (1 Menz. 22).

[De Villiers, C.J.: That was a case of contract. Was not the defendant emancipated, and trading on his own account?]

There is no clear evidence as to that. See Auret v. Hine (3 E.D.C., 334).

In this case the defendant was only 19 years of age, and the facts that he earned money for himself and paid for his own clothes do not prove emancipation. Van der Keesell (1-8, sec. 4). If he were not emancipated he could not be sued, unless venia actatus were first obtained. The police evidence is not ad rem, as a minor cannot make an admission, nor can even his guardian do so on his behalf. Now if we exclude the police evidence, there is nothing to show that he shot the dog.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Under what circumstances may a dog be shot?]

If it should be found trespassing within an enclosed space wherein is game or cattle. See, also, sec. 226 of Act 40 of 1889. That section shows that any occupier of land may destroy a dog found trespassing.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones: The Magistrate found as a fact that the defendant had been tacitly emancipated; and, if this finding was correct, the Magistrate's decision follows as a matter of course. If he was not emancipated, he was assisted by his father to appear in Court. As to the facts, we have no direct evidence, but we have the strongest of circumstantial evidence. There is ample evidence that the dog was shot. The accused remained very silent about the matter, and he would not have done so had he not shot the dog. The dog was not trespassing in any enclosed space, and there was no evidence to show that the dog had done any harm.

De Villiers, C.J.: An objection was taken in the Court below to the summons, on the ground that the defendant was a minor, but this defect was in my opinion cured by the power to defend filed in the case. That power is signed by the defendant purporting to be assisted by his father and natural guardian, who as such also signed the power.

The defendant denied having shot the dog at all, and the evidence supported his denial, but in the view I take of this case it is unnecessary to decide whether the Magistrate rightly held on the evidence that the defendant had killed the dog. It is clear that the dog was trespassing on land in the lawful occupation of the defendant, and that the animal was not at the time it met its death in the custody, charge, or possession of its owner, or of any person whatever. The concluding words of the 226th section of Act 40 of 1889 enact that "it shall be lawful for any proprietor or occupier of land to destroy any dog found trespassing upon the land owned or occupied by such proprietor or occupier." This enactment is subject to the three next succeeding sections of the Act, but they do not in any way qualify the right of the owner or occupier where the dog is not in the charge of any one. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed with costs, and judgment entered for defendant with costs in the Court below.

Buchanan, J., concurred.

THEUNISSEN V. BURNS. { 1904.
{ July 28th.

Sale and purchase—Locutio operis
—Price—Tailor.

The plaintiff, a tailor, having delivered a suit of clothes ordered by the defendant, the latter refused to take it, on the ground that the coat did not fit, and refused to give the plaintiff the opportunity to alter it, so as to make it fit. It was proved that the coat might have been so altered if the defendant had allowed the plaintiff to fit it in the ordinary manner.

Held, that the plaintiff, who tendered the suit, was entitled to recover the price agreed upon.

This was an appeal from a decision of the R.M. of Somerset West, in which he gave judgment against the appellant for £4 5s., being the price of a suit of clothes made by the respondent. The defendant admitted that he agreed to take a suit of clothes, but he contended that the suit did not fit him, and he could not use it, and he tendered to return same. The Magistrate, in his reasons, said the defendant admitted he received a suit, but he declined to pay for it because it did not fit, being too tight under the arms, and short in the sleeves. Although the suit was not a perfect fit, the Magistrate was of opinion that the suit could have been worn without inconvenience. It could have been made to fit, and that view was supported by a practical tailor, viz., one Walter de Vine. The plaintiff was always willing to make the alterations, and in his opinion the defendant took up an unreasonable attitude in not allowing the plaintiff to make the alterations. Plaintiff had given evidence that it was the custom of the trade to alter a suit if it did not fit. In his opinion, the defendant ought to have allowed the plaintiff to attempt to make

Mr. De Villiers said that the defendant altered the alterations. After that, he might have had reason to reject the suit. The plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount of £4 8s., with costs.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers was for the appellant, and Mr. Alexander for the respondent.

Mr. De Villiers said that the defendant was under the impression, as also was Miller, that the suit could not possibly be made to fit him. The Magistrate seemed to misunderstand the first letter, which merely set out that the defendant would show the coat to the plaintiff's traveller.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Does a tailor guarantee the first fit will be a proper one? What is the object of fitting?]

Certainly, there should be a certain amount of fitting, but in this case there was an alteration made afterwards.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why shouldn't the second alteration be made? It is the defendant's own fault. If he had gone to try on the coat it would have been all right.]

Your Lordship will see that at the time the defendant was very ill. The plaintiff obtained judgment for the whole amount, although there were still serious defects. The Court would never allow one man to be enriched at the expense of another. Counsel submitted that the summons was wrong, as it should have been for work and labour done, and he might have put in a claim for damages for loss of profit.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Magistrate appears to me to have given a perfectly correct judgment. The defendant ordered a suit from the plaintiff, who is a tailor. When the suit arrived the defendant fitted on the coat, and finding that it was a misfit he insisted upon his right to reject the whole suit. The plaintiff offered to alter the coat so as to make it fit, but the defendant refused to give him the opportunity, and returned the suit. The plaintiff then altered the coat, but as the defendant had refused to fit it on in his presence he did not succeed in securing a good fit. Consequently when the coat was fitted on before the Magistrate it was still somewhat tight under the arms, but expert evidence was given that it was quite capable of being so altered as to fit exactly. It is now contended for the defendant that the plaintiff is not entitled to the full price agreed upon, as the coat is not yet a well-fitting coat, but it appears to me that the defendant is estopped from raising this defence seeing that it is his fault only that the coat does not fit. The plaintiff had to supply the material, and therefore it really is a case of sale and purchase, but even if the transaction were treated as a locatio operis the result would be the same. The conduct of the defendant justified the Court below in treating the case as if a proper suit had been made and tendered to the defendant. The appeal must be dismissed with costs.

WILSON V. EXCELSIOR BENEFIT SOCIETY.

Friendly societies—Settlement of disputes—Arbitration—Appeal.

The defendant Society was established under Act 7 of 1882, and was never registered under Act 5 of 1892. The plaintiff, a member of the Society, having made a claim for sick pay, which the Society disputed, a special meeting of members was called in accordance with the rules of the Society, to settle the dispute. The meeting decided to pay part of the claim, whereupon the action was brought in the Magistrate's Court for the whole amount.

Held, that the 25th section of the Act of 1892 did not apply and that there was no appeal against the decision of the general meeting which had been properly convened for the special purpose of deciding the dispute.

This was an appeal from a decision of R.M. of Cape Town in an action instituted by the appellant to recover from the respondents £9 7s., being balance of sick money due by the society.

It appeared that the appellant was ill in England from December, 1902, to October, 1903. There was a total claim of £23 4s. 6d., and the society paid £13 7s. 6d. The Magistrate found for the society, and the plaintiff's claim was dismissed. In his reasons for judgment, the Magistrate said it was not disputed that the plaintiff was in full benefit under rule 25 of the society, which provided that all disputes should be settled by an Arbitration Committee. The plaintiff left for England in December, 1902, and returned in October, 1903 but he gave the society no notice of his illness, as required by the rules, until the 1st June, and from that date the society paid him, and for sick payment credit was given by the plaintiff. The view the Court would take of the case would render it unnecessary to decide whether the rules of the society ever contemplated a case like the plaintiff's. One thing was certain. An Arbitration Committee of the society was duly summoned, and by their decision the plaintiff was duly bound in accordance with the rules. The Courts were open to an aggrieved party who could show that the Arbitration Committee acted not in accordance with the law, but the plaintiff gave no such reasons. Then, again, the plaintiff accepted £13 7s. 6d. in full settlement of his claim, and he signed the receipt, from which it was clear the payment was made in settlement. He held that the transaction was final and binding on the plaintiff.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Williams) was for the appellant, and Mr. Wilkinson was for the respondents.

Mr. Burton said that the Magistrate's reasons were two-fold. He held that the plaintiff accepted the sum in full settlement, and, secondly, that the arbitration, held under the rules of the society, debarred the plaintiff from having any remedy. He contended that the Magistrate should have gone into the merits of the case, as he was clearly wrong about the settlement, the plaintiff making it clear at the meeting that he would sue for the difference. The rules were framed under Act 7 of 1882, from which there was no appeal, and the Magistrate seemed to have based his decision on that Act. That Act, however, had been repealed by Act 5 of 1892, by which an appeal could be made to the Supreme Court or to the Resident Magistrate of the district.

Mr. Wilkinson said it might save time if he mentioned that the society was registered under the old Act.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is very important.]

Mr. Burton said he must confess he had not known of that. Counsel then proceeded to argue on the constitution of the Arbitration Committee, and contended, after quoting previous cases, that the committee that adjudicated on this particular case was not properly constituted.

Without calling upon Mr. Wilkinson, the Court dismissed the appeal.

De Villiers, C.J.: It appears to me that the provisions of the 25th regulation have been substantially complied with. If any dispute shall arise, it shall be referred to the Noble Arch, who shall form an Arbitration Committee, consisting of the whole lodge, to decide on the affair. This dispute apparently was referred to the Noble Arch, and they issued a notice calling on all the individual members entitled to be summoned. The members were specially summoned to consider this special case.

In my opinion, if the substantial construction of the regulation was complied with, and notice given to the members that they were to consider this dispute which had arisen, the constitution of the committee was in accordance with the rules. The members were called under this notice to consider this special claim put in by Brother Wilson for eleven months' sick pay, but he failed to acquaint the society according to rule at the time of his illness. The members were called together according to the rules, and the appellant is not entitled to succeed, unless he can show that this particular regulation is no longer in force. Mr. Wilkinson has pointed out that the Act of '92 specially excepts the case of societies established under the former Act, and it is not alleged that this society is enrolled under the new Act. The case must therefore be decided under the Act 7 of 1882 which does not like the 25th section of Act 5 of 1892 permit of an appeal against the decision of arbitrators settling disputes under the rules of the society. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

BOTHA V. BOTHA.

{ 1904.
July 28th.

Loan—Bailment—Negligence.

The defendant borrowed from the plaintiff a horse, which fell ill on the journey. The defendant's servants left it in the veld for several days, after which it died, but there was no evidence whether it would have been saved with due care and diligence.

Held, that the defendant was bound to take at least as much care of the borrowed horse as he would have taken of his own, and that as considerable negligence had been shewn in the treatment of the horse, the Magistrate was justified in holding that such negligence was the cause of the death.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Resident Magistrate of Barkly East, granting the respondent, who was plaintiff in the Court below, the sum of £20, value of a horse lent by respondent to appellant, and which the appellant, through neglect, allowed to die.

Plaintiff stated in evidence before the Magistrate that defendant went to him in August, 1903, and borrowed two horses. They were to go to Maclear, and were to be returned after the lambing season was over. Some days afterwards defendant went to plaintiff, and said that one of the horses was dead. Plaintiff was at the time satisfied that the horse had died suddenly, but afterwards, from what he heard, he asked the defendant to pay something for it. It was not correct that the defendant said that the horse was too thin and very poor. In the January preceding, plaintiff cut the horse's hoofs until the blood ran; but when defendant took the horse, the hoofs were sound.

Jasper Johannes Botha (the defendant) stated that he wanted a pack horse, and was advised to ask plaintiff for one, but not to take "Donka" (the horse in question). Plaintiff offered defendant Donka, and defendant asked him how it was. Plaintiff replied that it was poor, but serviceable. Defendant, on seeing the horse, said he was not serviceable, and plaintiff said he would lend defendant a "blue" horse to carry the pack, but that defendant would have to take Donka with him. Defendant did so, but refused to be responsible for Donka. When the horse died, defendant told plaintiff, who said, "Let him kick." Nothing was then said about paying for it.

Mr. D. Buchanan appeared for the appellant, and Mr. Burton for the respondent.

After hearing counsel in argument on the facts:—

De Villiers, C.J.: The Magistrate had to decide two points: first, what was the contract with regard to the horse; and, secondly, did the defendant take due care of the horse. As to the contract, the Magistrate practically found that it was a loan for the convenience of the defendant, and there was evidence to support the finding. The plaintiff and his witnesses stated that the defendant required both horses, and that it was only after considerable doubt that he allowed the defendant to have the two horses. Therefore, the Magistrate was right in saying it was a loan for the benefit of the defendant. It is clear that the defendant was bound to take at least the same care of the horse as he would of his own. The evidence showed that on August 17 the horse broke down, and that on August 23 it was alive. In the interval it was the duty of the defendant to do everything he could to save the horse. He was not doing his duty in leaving the horse to its fate. It was possible that if the defendant had gone to the rescue of the horse it might not have died. The defendant seems to have been very careless in the matter, and left the horse to his servant, and after he got notice from the servant that the horse was in that condition, he did not take the pains or trouble to save the horse. It seems that there were facts before the Magistrate to justify him in finding as he had, and as that was so, the Court will not disturb his judgment. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

Buchanan, J., concurred.

MORITZ V. MURRAY. } 1904.
} July 28th.

Sale and purchase—Warranty of quality—Quantum minoris.

The defendant having bought a quantity of eggs from the plaintiff, asked him not to deliver them at once. The plaintiff kept the eggs, ready packed, for about fourteen days, and then sent them to the defendant, who found that some of them had gone bad and had them publicly sold at the plaintiff's risk.

Held, in an action by the plaintiff for the price, that although the plaintiff must be held to have warranted the eggs to be fit for the purpose for which they had been intended, this warranty did not extend beyond the time when the defendant ought to have accepted delivery, and that the defendant was not entitled to deduct from the purchase price the difference between such price and the amount realised at the public sale.

This was an appeal by the defendant, from a decision of the Resident Magistrate at Robertson, in which he awarded the plaintiff a sum of £27 10s., the value of a quantity of eggs purchased by defendant from plaintiff.

The appellant stated that the eggs which he purchased from respondent were not good eggs. He could tell a good egg from a bad one, by the weight, colour, and by holding it up to the light. The eggs which he purchased were guaranteed by respondent to be fresh, but on arrival in Cape Town they were found to be bad, and in some cases rotten. They were sold for £10 6s., which appellant tendered to respondent, but he refused to accept it.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that it was clear that the plaintiff was the proper party to sue. The defendant must have been aware that the bulk of the eggs were 10 or 12 days old, and there was no proof of notice having been sent to the plaintiff as to the condition of the eggs.

Mr. Close appeared for the appellant, and Mr. W. P. Buchanan for the respondent.

Mr. Close, having been heard in argument on the facts; without calling on Mr. Buchanan, the Court gave judgment.

De Villiers, C.J.: There are, I suppose, few articles of food which vary in quality as eggs do. They undergo a daily deterioration from the time they are laid until they are no longer fit for consumption as food. In the present case there was no warranty to sell fresh laid eggs. The seller was, however, bound by the nature of his contract to warrant the eggs to be free from such defects as would make them unfit for the use for which they were intended. The defendant bought them for the purpose of resale, and the plaintiff must be held to have warranted them to be in a good and merchantable condition. There is evidence that fourteen days after the eggs were tendered some of them had gone bad, but at the time when they were so tendered the plaintiff says they were good, and there is no evidence to contradict his statement. The fact that some of them were bad fourteen days after does not prove that they were not perfectly good at the time when the defendant ought to have accepted them. The Magistrate properly held that the defendant should pay the full price of the eggs without any deduction by way of quanti minoris, and the appeal must therefore be dismissed, with costs.

FRYER V. ESTATE PETERSEN.

Executor—Agent—Authority—Estoppel—Costs.

The plaintiff having supplied goods to one B., who purported to buy them on behalf of the executor of P.'s estate along with goods bought by B. for the children of P., rendered an account to the executor, but there was nothing in the account to call the executor's attention to the fact that it included goods for P.,

Held, that the executor was not liable for goods supplied to B. after such account had been rendered to him.

This was an appeal from the decision of the R.M. of Colesberg, a case in which the plaintiff claimed for £31 4s. 11d. from William Davis, the executor of the estate of Mrs. Petersen, for goods sold and delivered at the defendant's request. The defendant tendered £28 0s. 4d. in full settlement. The balance of the order had been for Miss Burgen, who had only authority to purchase goods for the children. The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that he believed that the defendant in no way held out Miss Burgen as his agent, and when the defendant was made aware of the fact that Miss Burgen was purchasing goods, he repudiated any liability except for such articles as authorised by him for the children. There would be judgment for the amount tendered, without costs.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan was for the appellant, and Mr. Russell was for the respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

De Villiers, C.J.: "The defendant is sued as the executor of the estate of Mrs. Petersen for goods supplied to the estate after the death of Mrs. Petersen. It is quite clear that the plaintiff, the tradesman who supplied these goods, can only recover the price of goods if he was authorised by the executor to supply them. In the present case there is no proof whatever of any authority given by the defendant to the plaintiff to supply Miss Burgen with goods. But it is said there was such a previous course of business as to practically estop the defendant from denying that Miss Burgen was entitled to order the goods. There is no evidence of such a previous course of dealing. In the account relied upon, the goods might have been equally for the children or Miss Burgen. There was no such previous course of dealing as would lead the plaintiff to believe that Miss Burgen was an agent of the executor to buy on his behalf. I consider there was a considerable degree of negligence on the part of the plaintiff in assuming that Miss Burgen had this authority. The plaintiff must have known that Miss Burgen was not one of the family. She was not one of those for whom the executor was bound to provide clothes, and it was the plaintiff's duty, before he supplied Miss Burgen with goods, to inquire from the executor whether he was justified in supplying Miss Burgen with goods. The defendant was willing to pay for all articles supplied to the children, and costs to date. It is said there was a tender of costs up to the date of trial, and that the Magistrate should have given costs. "Costs to date" is capable of a double meaning, but moreover, the Magistrate was not bound to accept it. He had a judicial discretion in the matter. It appears to me that the Magistrate came to the conclusion that the plaintiff ought not to have held the executor liable for goods supplied to a person who had no claim on the estate. In my opinion; therefore, the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan applied for the rehabilitation of Henry Beckley, who was adjudged a bankrupt in August, 1896. He drew the attention of the Court to the Master's report, which was unfavourable.

De Villiers, C.J., having perused the Master's report, said he could not grant the application, but gave leave to apply again in six months.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the rehabilitation of Jan Abraham Haarloff. Counsel said that the estate was sequestrated on the 30th January, 1894. The debts proved were £217 17s., and the assets £74 13s. The distribution and law costs amounted to £148 2s. 4d., so that creditors had to pay £73 odd. There was nothing unfavourable in the Master's report.

tors present, but another creditor was not there. Since that there had been a consent paper signed by Prince, Vincent and Co., the remaining creditor, but as their representative had not been present, the Master refused to give the certificate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How can I help you?]

Well, an expression from the Court might help us?

De Villiers, C.J.: The provisions of the Ordinance must be complied with. There will be no order. You must compel the Master to give the certificate.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte DAVISON. { 1904.

Mr. Upington moved, as a matter of urgency, for leave to attach certain money belonging to one Arthur Weston. The petition set out that the respondent had been a bookkeeper in the employ of the petitioners, and that he had left for England after judgment had been obtained against him in the Magistrate's Court, at Queen's Town, for £24 1s. 3d. He had about £300 on deposit in the Queen's Town branch of the Bank of Africa, and it was believed if the bank was not interdicted from parting with the money respondent would withdraw it by cable. Counsel asked for an interdict against the bank, and also for an order authorising the Messenger to attach certain money to satisfy the judgment with costs.

Order granted in terms of the second prayer, the order to be telegraphed to Queen's Town, with costs.

Registration of title—Prescription.

The applicant bought one-eighth of a farm and entered into occupation. He afterwards sold one-sixteenth and remained in occupation of that portion. The total period of his occupation exceeded 30 years. After the applicant had sold one-sixteenth, it was discovered that the person from whom he had bought was the registered owner of one-sixteenth only. The applicant obtained a rule, calling on persons claiming the one-sixteenth, to show cause why the applicant should not by reason of his occupation for over 30 years be registered as the owner of the one-sixteenth. The owner of the one-sixteenth in question was dead, and his heirs did not oppose the application. A person claiming to have derived a title from such owner opposed, but as he showed no better title than the applicant, the rule was made absolute.

This was a motion to make absolute a rule nisi granted on the 20th May, under the Derelict Lands Act. It appeared from the petition that in 1872 the petitioner purchased one-eighth share in a certain farm at Frenchhoek from one John Douglas, of which he obtained transfer. In 1891 he sold one-half of his share, and in March last he sold his remaining sixth, but the Registrar of Deeds declined to pass transfer, because the said Douglas had originally only one-sixteenth share in the farm. Petitioner had caused search to be made in the Deeds Office, and had found out that Homan, De Villiers, and Douglas, who had transactions in the farm, were not particular about passing transfer.

The answering affidavit of Helena le Roux set out that the petitioner had obtained transfer of an eighth share from Douglas in error, who had also in error, obtained transfer from De Villiers. She denied that the petitioner had ever made use of one-eighth of the farm since 1872. She bought the share from the executors in 1894. The affidavit of Johannes Homan corroborated the statements in the affidavit of Mrs. Le Roux. Dr. Krause (for the applicant) applied that the rule be discharged, and that his client be registered as the owner of the share.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for Edward Christian le Roux, to oppose the motion, and to apply for the discharge of the rule.

The replying affidavit of the petitioner set out that he bought his share in 18972, and in 1891 he sold one-half of his share, and he never was aware that his title was defective. In 1896 he attended several meetings of shareholders of the farm, at which all the shareholders were represented for the purpose of deciding the principle on which the grazing should be regulated, and there never was any objection to him. It was not until his application to the Court was mentioned that Helena le Roux claimed the share.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the respondent Helena Le Roux): The petitioner may have had the right to occupy one-eighth of the farm if he could have shown prescription. But mere occupation is not enough to prove prescription: there must be adverse occupation. He did not possess pro domino. In point of fact, certain claimants would seem to have occupied 15-16th of the farm. Hauman, sen., took over the farm in 1831, and died the same year. J. S. Hauman had a grant of the farm, but took no practical steps till 1830.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You trace through the Haumans, but not from them: that is your weak point.]

[After further argument on the facts, Mr. Schreiner continued.] The applicant cannot claim by prescription, as he has since 1891 been only a joint tenant. No joint tenant can prescribe as against his co-tenant. He had never had any adverse user as of right. A joint owner cannot prescribe against a co-owner within sixty years.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers (for E. C. Le Roux): We claim to have a right to show cause against the rule nisi being made absolute.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But what is your defence?]

We are the registered owners of one-eighth. If he did not occupy it it is not derelict.

Dr. Krause (for applicant): Since 1872 we have occupied a portion of the farm.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What evidence is there to show that this was occupied by you as of right?]

The transfer deeds of the property.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The whole point is, is your occupation preferent to your title from Hauman?]

Their whole claim seems to be based on a mere presumption. Even in 1896 the petitioner is recognised by the co-owners as the owner of 1-16th. No cause has been shown why Mr. Le Roux is entitled to any portion of the farm.

Mr. Schreiner, in reply, dealt chiefly with the facts of the case, and contended that Malherbe could have no prescriptive right. In conclusion he referred to Smith and Others v. Martin's Executor Dative (16 S.C.R., 148).

De Villiers, C.J.: Two points have been relied on in this case, the first is the fact that the petitioner had obtained transfer of one-eighth of the farm, and had transferred one-sixteenth, and was, therefore, entitled to remain in possession of one-sixteenth; the other is that the petitioner from the year 1872 to 1891 made use of and occupied one-eighth part of the farm, and that from that date up to the present one-sixteenth. It was mainly upon the second part of the application that I was induced to grant a rule. That rule now stands, and that rule can only be discharged upon an application of a person who can show that he or she has a better title than the applicant. The person in whose name the property is registered has not come forward at all. If Hauman or his executors had come forward, and opposed the application, I should have had more difficulty in dealing with the case. I have to deal with people who are just as much strangers to the original owner as the petitioner is. In order to show that Mrs. Le Roux has a right to this property, it is alleged that the insolvent Hauman had acquired a right to the full one-eighth share by virtue of his ownership of Labrie, and that he purchased this share. When he became insolvent, he re-acquired the right, and subsequently this right was sold to the present respondent, Mrs. Le Roux. There is no evidence, however, that the insolvent did acquire the right. He did not claim as heir to the former heir, whose will was silent as to the property. That is an important point, because probably at the time he had not acquired transfer. Now, there is nothing whatever to show that the insolvent had ever acquired any right to this property. It is said that he had this farm Labrie, and he had a right to a share in that property by virtue of his ownership of Labrie. It is clear that if he was entitled to transfer it would have been passed, but none has been passed, although it is alleged he was entitled to one-eighth share. In my opinion, on the statements made on behalf of the respondents, there is nothing to show that the respondent would have any right to claim this property as against the executors of Hauman, the original owner to whom this property was transferred. The respondent, therefore, in my opinion, has no better title than the applicant. I think that in all right and justice the petitioner shows that he had more right to the transfer than any of the parties. As to the claim of the other owners, represented by Mr. De Villiers, I do not see what locus standi they have in the matter. The rule will be made absolute, with costs.

Mr. Schreiner asked the Court to reserve to his clients the right to bring an action in the matter.

De Villiers, C.J.: I think the respondents have brought forward everything they could. If I thought that by postponing the matter any injustice would be prevented, I should certainly grant the request, but I do not, therefore the application will be refused.

De Villiers, C.J., subsequently said it would save trouble and expense if the rule were given in regard to a sixteenth share.

Mr. Schreiner said he had no instructions on the matter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well, if you wish it, I can make a rule calling on all concerned as to the sixteenth of a share of the property returnable on the 31st August.]

Mr. Schreiner: As your lordship please.

Potter (August 18). The rule was made absolute.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan applied for an order interdicting the defendant from removing, selling, alienating, or otherwise disposing of certain printing material.

The application was granted.

TANCRED V. BEUKES.

Dr. Greer, on behalf of the plaintiff applied for an order authorising the attachment of certain property. He explained that the Court ordered the defendant on the 14th October last to give transfer and conveyance to plaintiff of certain property in the Calvinia district, but he had failed to do so. Plaintiff now asked for an order to attach the property.

Mr. P. Jones moved for leave to execute a mortgage bond to pay for certain repairs to property in the estate of petitioner's late husband. The Master's report set forth that it would not appear that the petitioner was not justified in raising the loan. She could have done so under the mutual will on her own portion. The repairs (counsel said) were necessary for the upkeep of the building.

De Villiers, C.J., said that at present he was not prepared to overrule the Master's report. Counsel could present a fresh application.

KUIL V. UNION-CASTLE MAIL CO.

Mr. Gardiner moved for leave to sue the respondents in forma pauperis for damages for the bite of a dog.

Granted, Mr. Gardiner to take the reference.

Trade mark - Similarity of trade marks—Decision of Registrar.

This was an application upon notice of motion calling on the respondents to show cause why a certain trade-mark should not be interdicted and why the respondents should not be called upon to pay the costs of the application. Affidavits were put in showing the similarity between the diamond as used by the respondent and the star as used by the applicants. The Registrar did not think there was any sufficient similarity to deceive purchasers. Mr. Schreiner (for the applicants) having been heard in argument on the facts, without calling upon Mr. Close (for the respondents).

De Villiers, C.J., said he was not prepared to disturb the decision of the Registrar. It appeared to him there was no such similarity between the two designs as to mislead any person with average intelligence, and the application would be refused, with costs.

Ex parte MARSH.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for leave to cancel a certain mortgage bond, and for the appointment of George William Steytler to the estate as trustee.

Order granted.

ROSENBERG V. WORTHINGTON.

Mr. Upton moved for leave to attach certain landed property, and for leave to sue the respondent by edictal citation. The respondent was indebted to the petitioner for £70. He was at present in Europe, and owned certain property at Sea Point.

Order granted, returnable 21st August.

Ex parte MEYER.

Will—Ord. 15 of 1845.

The Court granted an order, recognising the validity of a certain will which, per incuriam, had not been signed on each leaf.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for an order as to the validity of a certain will. The parties, through ignorance or inadvertence, failed to sign each leaf of the will, but the first leaf, which contained the essence of the will, had been duly signed.

Order granted, with costs out of the estate.

DORMEHL V SCHOLTZ.

Mr. Russell moved for leave to sue the respondent by edictal citation for the interest on a certain mortgage bond, and for leave to attach the property.

Order of attachment granted, with leave to sue by edictal citation, returnable first day of next term, one publication in "Ons Land," and one in an English newspaper, with leave to serve the edict with notice of trial.

TAYLOR V. TAFNACH.

Mr. Russell moved for leave to attach certain property of the respondent, and for leave to sue the respondent by edictal citation.

Order granted, personal service to be effected, failing which, publication as in the last case.

THOMPSON V. THOMPSON.

Mr. Upington moved for an order ordering the respondent to pay to the applicant a sufficient sum of money to enable her to proceed with her action for divorce and to maintain the children.

An order was granted, calling on the respondent to pay £25 to the plaintiff's attorneys to enable her to prosecute her action, and that the respondent should pay £5 per month for maintenance until the action was decided.

Ex parte SCHOEMAN.

This was an application on behalf of Gabrina A. Schoeman, widow of the late W. H. Schoeman, for leave to raise £120 on the mortgage of certain property bequeathed to her children, in which property she had a life interest. The money was required to meet certain liabilities of the estate and also for the support of petitioner and her children.

The Master's report concluded by saying: "I think the application should be granted, but I am afraid petitioner will find it difficult to meet the interest on the bonds."

On the motion of Dr. Greer the Court granted an order as prayed.

Ex parte COGHLAN AND OTHERS.

This was an application on behalf of James Coghlan and seven other major heirs of the late Malachy Coghlan and Mary Coghlan, asking the Court to direct (1) that a certain farm bequeathed to the children of the said Malachy and Mary Coghlan should not be sold until the youngest of the four minor heirs should become of age or marry (2) that the rent obtained from the said farm should be used for the maintenance and education of the three younger minors (the eldest was 20 years of age), until they should become of age or marry (3) That should the rent be found insufficient for such purpose the farm should be sold, and the interest from the invested proceeds applied as aforesaid (4) That in the event of one or more of the minors marrying or becoming of age or dying before the others, and the rent aforesaid being more than sufficient for the maintenance and education of the minor or minors, the amount of such surplus should be paid into the estate, or otherwise be paid towards the support of any of the present minors, who although then of age may yet be unmarried and in need of it.

The Master's report was as follows: "The will directs the estate to be equally divided among the children at the death of the survivor. If the estate were realised and the proceeds divided, the interest to be derived from the shares of the minors would not be sufficient for their maintenance and education, I think the proposed agreement would be more beneficial to the minors, and that the application may be granted; but the tutor who approves of the arrangement, and to whom the surplus rents should be paid, should lodge an account and produce proof annually that the minors are receiving their education at the Convent School in terms of the agreement.

On the motion of Mr. P. S. T. Jones the Court granted an order in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte SNYMAN AND ANOTHER.

This was an application on behalf of the widow Brege E. Snyman and Frederik A. Snyman for leave either (a) to pass a second mortgage bond for £350 at 6 per cent. on certain property, or (b) to pass a first mortgage bond for £500 on the said property for the purchase of stock for the farm, and also (in the event of leave being granted to raise £500) to pay off an existing mortgage of £150. The heirs were all majors, and all consented to either of the proposed arrangements.

The Master stated that he saw no objection to the application being granted.

On the motion of Mr. Rainsford the Court granted an order as prayed.

Ex parte SUNDSTROM.

This was an application on behalf of one Harry Sundstrom, of Mowbray, for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to allow the petitioner as natural guardian of his minor child to pass transfer to himself of certain property from the said minor. The property had been purchased by the petitioner, and was transferred to his minor daughter in error. He now wished to have it transferred to himself in order that he might be enabled to raise money thereon for the purpose of building a house upon it. The Master recommended that the petition be granted.

On the motion of Mr. Joubert the Court granted an order as prayed.

Ex parte COGHLAN AND OTHERS.

Mr. Gutsche moved for an order authorising the Master to pay out certain money in terms of his report.

Order granted, the Master to be satisfied as to the sworn appraiser.

HEDDON V. SAWKINS.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers applied for an order authorising the respondent to submit certain disputes to arbitration, with costs.

Order granted.

CORDES V. VAN WEENEN.

Mr. P. Jones moved for an order attaching certain property in order to found jurisdiction.

Order granted, citation returnable September 12, personal service to be effected, failing which, one publication in the "Star."

CORDES V. PULVERMACHER.

Mr. P. Jones moved for leave to sue in the same terms as the last motion.

Order granted, one publication in the "Natal Witness," failing which personal service.

THE MASTER V. ESTATE GOLDBERG.

Mr. Nightingale applied for an order compelling the trustee to file a liquidation account with costs.

Order granted.

THE MASTER V. ESTATE ALEXANDER.

Mr. Nightingale said this was a similar application to the last.

Order granted.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

VAN DER SPUY V. VAN DER (1904.
SPUY. (Aug. 2nd.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, divorce, instituted by Mrs. Aletta van der Spuy against her husband.

Wm. Thomas Birch, clerk in the Registrar Office, produced the marriage register.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for the plaintiff; the suit was undefended.

The plaintiff said she was married to the defendant on the 7th April, 1880. After marriage, she lived with the defendant for some two years, at his farm at Koeberg. The defendant misconducted himself in several ways, giving way to drink. They afterwards lived in Cape Town and Johannesburg. In 1893 witness had to come to Cape Town to live with her mother, as the defendant did not support her. She came down with the defendant's consent. She had lived in Cape Town ever since. Defendant came to see her, and he said that when times got better she was to go back. She had not seen the defendant since that time, nor had she had any request from him to go back. Witness had had to support herself and child by dressmaking. She believed the defendant was now employed in the Civil Service. She did not know where the defendant was at present. Witness had no estate. She believed the defendant had no estate.

Decree of restitution granted, with costs, calling on the defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th September, failing which, rule to issue calling on defendant to show cause on the first day of next term why a decree of divorce should not be granted with costs, and plaintiff declared entitled to custody of the child of the marriage, with leave to serve in the same manner as directed in regard to citation.

Postea (October 17.) The rule was made absolute.

SMITH V. SMITH.

A similar action was brought by Elizabeth Smith, of Cape Town, against her husband, who was last heard of in Johannesburg. Mr. De Waal appeared for the plaintiff; the defendant was in default.

Wm. Thomas Birch, clerk in the Colonial Office, produced the marriage register.

Elizabeth Smith (the plaintiff) said she was married to the defendant in community of property at Wynberg, on the 4th December, 1900. Defendant was a baker. They lived happily for about a year. The defendant then left her because of a quarrel. She told him not to stop out in the evening, and he said that if she did not like it he would leave her. Defendant stayed in Wynberg for a few months after he had left her. She wrote to the defendant, but he made no reply, and she then sued him for maintenance, and he was committed for 14 days. After he had been liberated from prison, he went to Johannesburg. He had not since communicated with her. Witness had no property.

Decree of restitution granted, with costs, the defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th September, failing which, rule to issue calling on the defendant to show cause on the first day of next term why a decree of divorce should not be granted, rule to be served in the same manner as directed in regard to the citation.

Postea (October 17.) The rule was made absolute.

HILDEBRANDT V. HILDE- { 1904.
BRANDT. { July 2nd.
{ Oct. 17th.

Malicious desertion — Divorce —
Willingness to return.

In an action brought by the wife against the husband for divorce on the ground of malicious desertion, it was proved that after the service of the rule on him, he called on the wife and offered to receive her back, but she refused to see him.

Held, in the absence of proof that the offer was accompanied by words or conduct which would justify the plaintiff in refusing the offer, she was not entitled to a decree of divorce.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, brought by Mrs. Clara Hildebrandt, of Wynberg, against her husband, Eugen Wm. Hy. Hildebrandt, the plaintiff also claiming custody of the children of the marriage. Mr. Alexander was for the plaintiff; the defendant was in default.

Clara Hildebrandt (the plaintiff) said she was married to the defendant at Maritzburg, Natal, in 1889. They lived together at Polela, where defendant was court messenger. Defendant afterwards came in 1895 to this colony, and was employed at the Breakwater. He then went to the Forter Reformatory as head warder. He was next appointed gaoler of Wynberg, and witness was appointed matron, and she was still acting as matron of the Wynberg Gaol. Defendant got six months' leave of absence in April of last year. Defendant left power of attorney with Mr. White. He went by the Norman up the East Coast. She received sundry letters and telegrams from him. On the 29th April she received a wire from him saying, "Am off; letters posted." She had heard nothing further from the defendant. Witness also spoke to certain letters which had since been received by Mrs. Lena Burr, sister of the late assistant matron of the gaol, from the latter, who had gone away to Natal about two months before witness's husband.

By the Court: The defendant gave her £5 on the day he left. He made over to Mr. White all right to his salary, but witness was not aware of it at the time. The defendant had owed money to Mr. White.

A clerk in the R.M.'s office at Wynberg produced a copy of letter from defendant, applying for leave of absence, and resigning his appointment.

A decree of restitution was granted, with costs, the defendant to return or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th September, failing which rule to issue calling on the defendant on the 15th October to show cause why a decree of divorce should not be granted, and why the plaintiff should not be declared to have custody of the minor children, service to be in the same manner as directed in regard to citation.

Postea (October 17.)

Mr. Alexander asked for a decree of divorce and custody of the minor children of the marriage.

According to affidavits and letters read, defendant (the husband) was ordered to return, and on August 3 he returned to Wynberg, and sent a sum of £11, which plaintiff returned, as it was utterly inadequate to support her and her children. Defendant (plaintiff stated) had not got any employment, and was not able to provide for her. Counsel read certain correspondence, and said that although defendant had made a vague assertion of his willingness to go back, he was not in court to-day, and had not shown that he was able to provide for his wife. Counsel submitted that defendant's offer to return was not bona fide, or he would have been there to-day.

De Villiers, C.J.: An order has been made on the defendant to return to or to receive his wife, failing which a decree of divorce would be granted. For the plaintiff to succeed in obtaining a decree of divorce she must prove that the defendant has refused to return to or receive her. I quite agree that an offer to receive or live with the plaintiff accompanied by words or conduct which would justify the plaintiff in refusing the offer would not relieve the defendant; but no such words or conduct have been proved in the present case. The plaintiff herself says that on the 3rd August, 1904, the defendant returned to Wynberg, her place of residence, and sent her £11, which sum she refused, as being totally inadequate for the maintenance of herself and children, and that he had also attempted to see her. Here, at all events, the man sent £11—it might be all he had—and the wife scornfully refused to see him at all. We have Hildebrandt's statements as to what had taken place, and there was a letter written by her attorneys to the plaintiff's attorneys on the 13th September, in which it is stated: "We are instructed to record the fact that the defendant has returned to the plaintiff, but the plaintiff refused to see him, or to allow him to enter the premises occupied by her." Well, that was a most extraordinary attitude for a wife to take up. She brings an action to compel the defendant to live with her or to receive her, and she then refuses to see him. Under the circumstances, I think there was a bona fide desire on the part of the husband to see his wife, and there was an absolute refusal on the part of the wife to see her husband. It could not have been a bona fide action to compel the husband to return to the wife, if the wife, when the husband did return to her, refused to see him. The application must be refused, with costs.

GIDDINGS V. GIDDINGS.

This was an action brought by Hannah Maria Giddings, of Cape Town, against her husband, James Giddings, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which for a decree of divorce.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan appeared for the plaintiff; the defendant had been barred from pleading.

Wm. Thomas Birch, clerk in the Colonial Office, produced the marriage register.

Hannah Maria Giddings (born Abel) said she was married in community to the defendant at Malmesbury on the 31st March, 1887. Defendant was a schoolmaster. For a few months they lived at Hopefield. Then they moved to Claremont, where defendant was master at St. Saviour's School. He afterwards opened a school on his own account at Claremont. At a still later date they went to Australia, and then returned to this colony. Witness opened a boarding-house in Cape Town. Her husband failed to contribute towards her support. About the end of August, 1901, he left her to go to East London in search of work. Since that time he had not contributed towards her support. He was a piano tuner, and was travelling about the country.

A decree of restitution was granted, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th September, failing which rule to issue calling on the defendant to show cause on the first day of next term why a decree of divorce should not be granted, service to be in the same manner as directed in regard to citation.

PARKER V. PARKER.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, brought by Katherine Parker, of Cape Town, against her husband, George Parker. Mr. M. Bisset was for the plaintiff; the defendant had been barred from pleading.

Wm. Thomas Birch, clerk in the Colonial Office, produced the marriage register.

Katherine Parker was called, but she failed to put in appearance.

The case was ordered to stand over.

At a later stage, plaintiff appeared, and gave evidence. She stated that on the 28th September, 1898, she was married to the defendant, George Parker, at St. Luke's Church, Salt River. Up to January, 1902, they lived happily together, when her husband went up-country to get his discharge. A few days after he left, he sent a postcard, but subsequent to his sending money for three months, she received no communication from him. There was one child of the marriage, aged five years.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There was no quarrel between you?]

No, my lord.

Decree of restitution of conjugal rights granted, the defendant to return or receive the plaintiff by the 15th September, failing which the defendant to show cause by the first day of next term why a decree of divorce should not be granted, the plaintiff to have custody of the child, and personal service to be effected.

SUTHERLAND V. SUTHERLAND.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce brought by Mrs. Charlotte Sutherland, of Cape Town, against her husband, one McDougall Sutherland, who was believed to be residing at Bulawayo. Mr. D. Buchanan appeared for the plaintiff; the defendant was in default.

Charlotte Sutherland (the plaintiff) said she was married to the defendant in March, 1894, at St. Andrew's, Somerset-road, Cape Town. They resided together in Cape Town for a while, defendant being head waiter in the Civil Service Club. Subsequently the defendant left her, and went to Johannesburg, and remained for eight months. He afterwards went twice to Bulawayo, and stayed for some time. In December, 1900, he returned to her, and they had a quarrel, as witness had complained of some letters that she had found in his box written by another woman. He left her, and had since gone to Bulawayo.

A decree of restitution was granted, the defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th September, failing which, rule to issue calling on the defendant to show cause on the 15th October why a decree of divorce should not be granted, and why defendant should not be declared to have forfeited the benefits in community, rule to be served in the same manner as directed in regard to citation.

ROBERTSON AND CO. V. } 1901.
HEATHORN. } Aug. 2nd.

Servant — Salesman — Salary — Misconduct.

By a contract entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant in England, the former engaged the services of the latter as a salesman in this Colony for three years at a monthly salary, and agreed to pay for his passage to the Cape, with a condition that in case he should leave without sufficient cause before the expiration of the three years, the plaintiffs should be entitled to a refund of the passage money. After serving for two years, the defendant was discovered to have concealed a sum of money which, as salesman, he ought to have put into the till.

Held, that this was an act of misconduct which justified the plaintiffs in dismissing the defendant, that they were not liable for his current month's salary, and that they were entitled to a refund of the passage money.

This was an action brought by Robertson and Co., ironmongers, Plein-street, Cape Town, against Leslie Heathorn, ironmonger's assistant, Cape Town, for payment of certain passage-money advanced, and a further sum alleged to have been received for the plaintiffs by the defendant, and not duly accounted for.

The declaration set out that the defendant entered into a contract with the plaintiffs for three years' service as ironmonger's assistant. The plaintiffs paid his passage money, £24 3s. In the course of his employment the defendant had from time to time received sums amounting to £20 in payment of various articles belonging to the plaintiffs that he had sold, and which it was his duty to account for and hand over to the plaintiffs. This the defendant had unlawfully failed to do. The defendant was dismissed from the plaintiffs' service on the 26th May. Plaintiffs claimed forfeiture of the sum of £24 3s., passage-money, and also that the defendant be ordered to pay the sum of £20, moneys belonging to the plaintiffs that he had failed to account for and hand over.

The defendant, in his plea, said that he received the said sum of £20 for goods sold on behalf of the plaintiffs, but he denied that he had unlawfully failed to pay over the said sum. He also said that he was wrongfully and unlawfully, and without good cause dismissed from the plaintiffs' service on the 26th May, without receiving any salary for that month. He said that he had faithfully carried out his duties under the contract. He had been receiving £12 a month wages. He prayed that the plaintiffs' claim be dismissed, with costs. In reconvention, he claimed £10, as and for salary due to the 26th May, and £104 for damages sustained by the aforesaid breach of contract and wrongful dismissal. The defendant had contracted for three years, and had actually served two years and three months.

The plaintiffs, as a plea in reconvention, admitted having paid no wages to the defendant for May, but said that defendant was entitled to no wages, as he had been dismissed.

Mr. Close (with him Mr. M. Bisset) was for the plaintiffs; the defendant was represented by Mr. W. P. Buchanan.

John Blake, an assistant of the plaintiff firm, said that on the 26th May an assistant named Duke made a report to him in regard to Heathorn. Later in the day, witness saw the defendant. Heathorn's duty was to sell goods, and if he sold anything for cash it would be his duty to hand the money to the clerk in charge of the cash register. He taxed the defendant as to a sale he had made of a ball valve. He asked the defendant where the money was. Heathorn replied, "Upstairs." Further pressed, the defendant said that it was left there because the girl said she might want to change the article, and he would leave the money there until he saw whether she changed it. Witness and Heathorn went upstairs, and ultimately they proceeded to some fixtures, where the cash was covered with fittings. The amount was 3s. 6d. He told the defendant he ought to have put the money in the till. Defendant said, "Oh, I am not the only one that does it." Witness challenged him to mention a single case that he knew of. The defendant then said that he could not mention any particular case, but he had thought they did. Witness said that it would be impossible to continue the defendant in the firm's service.

Cross-examined: He did not know of any other case of misappropriation by the defendant except the one he had mentioned. The defendant came out from Home with good credentials. Defendant was engaged at £10 a month. He had not given satisfaction; he had not carried out his duties in a business-like way, he was somewhat neglectful. They had no anxiety to get rid of the defendant. He did not say the defendant purposely embezzled; he said that the money was where it ought not to be. Previous to this case, money had been found among goods in the store. They had had a watch placed, but they could not discover who removed the money.

Waller Duke, assistant, employed by the plaintiffs at their Plein-street store, said that on the 26th May he saw the defendant with a little girl upstairs. The little girl went away with a parcel, and Heathorn went to the back part of the department. The little girl went away, and paid no money. Witness went to a desk near the cash till, and kept a watch, but the defendant paid nothing into the till. Witness had had occasion to report a previous sale by Heathorn. Heathorn was, in consequence, removed to another department.

By the Court: It was a well-known rule in the establishment that cash should be at once placed in the register.

Charles Henry Macdonald, book-keeper in the plaintiff firm, corroborated the evidence of Mr. Blake. He said he told the defendant that it was evident this misappropriation had been going on systematically, and that it would be best to make a clean breast of the matter. Defendant made no reply.

Cross-examined: The amount of £20 could not be definitely proved. They claimed that sum as an approximate amount. They could not check every small sale in the shop. They dismissed the defendant because they thought he was not honest, and this was one of the proofs.

Charles Murphy, manager of the plaintiff firm, said that he was absent through illness on the 26th May. He was waited upon by the defendant, but witness could not see him, and defendant then saw him on the 30th May. Witness told him that he had violated the confidence of the firm, and that they could employ him no longer. He told the defendant that he ought to have gone upstairs and brought down the ball-valve. He told the defendant when he entered the firm's service that he must pass money into the till at once. He also informed the defendant he had had suspicion of him for twelve months.

Cross-examined: It was not after they had a suspicion of the defendant that they increased his salary. He saw the defendant take out the parcel of brackets, but he did not say anything, because he was willing to give the defendant every chance. It was untrue that a few men had been dismissed on account of the depression; they would not dismiss a man on that account.

Mr. Close closed his case.

For the defence,

Leslie Heathorn (defendant) stated that he was engaged in London to come out to the plaintiffs' employ. He had good testimonials from Home. There was never any complaint made to him about his work, neither was there any mention made to him about the transaction over a basket. It was true that he took away some articles in his lunch basket, but he paid for them. They had not in stock the particular valve that the little girl wanted, and he suggested to her that she could have the article on approbation. He left the money at the place from where he took the valve. After dinner, he saw them go to the till, and then he was asked to go to the office, where he explained to Mr. Blake that the money was upstairs. It was not correct to say that it was covered up. When mention was made about two shillings that had previously been missed, he said that he was not the only one liable to take the money. He had earned no money for three months, and had suffered damage through having to dispose of his furniture.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: He contradicted Mr. Blake's statement that the money was hidden. The money was left there by mistake while he was screwing on the valve.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He put the money underneath the shelf from which he took the valve.

Cross-examination continued: Witness said he could not explain why he did not tell Mr. Murphy that he had paid for the brackets he took from the place.

Re-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Any clerk might easily have gone to the same place for a valve directly afterwards.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why didn't you put the money in your pocket?]

Witness: I didn't think of that.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why did you tell Mr. Blake that you put the money on the shelf in case the girl came back?]

Witness: I didn't tell him that, my lord. I merely said that the girl might come back.

Mr. Blake (recalled by his lordship) stated that the defendant said nothing about forgetting to put the money in the till. The defendant must have moved the fittings to place the money where he did. Defendant had to push the fittings back to get the money.

Mr. Macdonald (recalled by his lordship) stated that the defendant said that he put the money beside the fittings in case the girl came back with the article.

Mr. Buchanan closed his defence, and counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: The decision in this case must depend entirely upon the question whether the conduct of the defendant was such as to justify the plaintiffs in dismissing him. If the putting away of the money was a mere act of forgetfulness on the part of the defendant, I quite agree with Mr. Buchanan that it would not be such an act of misconduct as to justify dismissal. The defendant's case in court to-day is that it was a case of mere forgetfulness. He says that he sold the articles to the girl, and put the money into the pigeon hole beneath a place where the articles were, and forgot all about it, and forgot to put the money into the till. Unfortunately, however, this statement is quite inconsistent with the excuses which the defendant made both to Blake and Macdonald. When confronted with them, he said he put the money there because there was a possibility or probability of the articles being returned and of the money being required for repayment for the articles. The two statements therefore are wholly inconsistent, and this fact goes far to show that it was an improper act on the part of the defendant in putting the money there, and that the object was to remove the money for his own purpose when there was no longer any probability of his being searched personally on the premises in order to ascertain whether the money was on his person. The evidence shows that the rules of the establishment were clear and distinct that the salesmen were bound, immediately after making a sale, to place the money in the till, and I don't well see how large establishments like Robertsons could be carried on unless some rule of that kind were strictly enforced. The defendant was informed on entering the service of the plaintiffs that this was one of the rules of the establishment, and he knew therefore it was his duty on receiving money from any customer to deposit it forthwith in the till, but on the 26th May, 1904, he did not perform this duty, and the sole question is, was it a mere case of forgetfulness, or a deliberate act? If it was forgetfulness, the plaintiffs are in the wrong. If a deliberate act, the defendant is in the wrong, because if it was a deliberate act it could only have been with a view to dishonesty. The defendant's own statement is that the money was placed there, and not hidden, but placed there openly, where it could be seen by anyone. The statement of Blake is in direct conflict with this. He went with the defendant upstairs to see where the money had been placed. He looked over the shoulder of the defendant when he reached the place, and he saw there were some fittings placed upon the money, and that these fittings had been removed before the money could be got. Well, if this is true, it was an act of concealment—an act of deliberate concealment, which could only have been for improper purposes. The position of a salesman in an establishment of this kind is a very confidential one, and the owners of the establishment have to depend mainly upon the honesty of the men they employ, and in proportion to the confidence placed in such persons must also be the honesty of the persons so employed. It would be a dangerous thing in commercial establishments if such a thing were to be overlooked on the part of any salesman employed, and treated as a minor offence, and as no misconduct at all. In my opinion, therefore, the concealment of the money was for an improper purpose; it was, therefore, misconduct, which the plaintiffs were quite justified in treating as a cause of dismissal. If this cause of dismissal was good, it was, in my opinion, an act equivalent to leaving the service of the plaintiffs. The clause therefore of the contract, in my opinion, does come into operation, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover £24 3s., which they advanced in order to enable the defendant to come to this country. The only other question is whether the defendant is entitled to recover any portion of his salary? The misconduct took place during a current month, and, in my opinion, as the misconduct was of such a nature as to justify the immediate dismissal and to amount to an act of leaving the service, the plaintiffs are not liable, in accordance with the decision of the case of Bassamradoo v.

Morris (6 Juts 28) for any portion of the current month's salary.

The judgment of the Court will be for the plaintiffs in convention for £24 3s., and in the claim in reconvention, with costs.

GENERAL MOTION.

Ex parte ARONSTEIN.

Mr. Gardiner moved as a matter of urgency for an order for the attachment of the respondent, Benny Maisel, who was expected to leave the Colony. On the 27th July last a judgment was obtained against him for £100, and the taxed costs amounted to £69 7s. 1d., in addition to a sum of £1 9s. 6d. for the issue of a writ. The judgment was given against him in his individual capacity, and certain goods in Roelandstreet to the value of £15, or £20, had been attached. His client was informed that the respondent intended going to Johannesburg without making any provision as to the payment of the judgment, and he prayed for an order for the arrest and detention of Maisel until he gave satisfaction as to the payment of the money, and also for an order declaring executable £41 13s. 11d., to the credit of Maisel Bros., in the African Barking Corporation.

An order was granted on three conditions: (a) That the proceedings for civil imprisonment be forthwith instituted; (b) that the order for arrest be discharged on the defendant paying or giving security for the payment of the judgment, and costs; and (c), that the respondent be at liberty to apply for the discharge of the arrest. There would be no order as to the £41 13s. 11d., until notice had been given to the respondent.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

ADMISSION.

{ 1904.
Aug. 2nd.

Mr. Burton applied for the admission of Arthur R. O'Brien as an attorney.

The application had been adjourned from the previous day as a certificate had not been received from the Secretary of the Law Society, Cape Town. Mr. Burton now read a communication from the secretary of the Incorporated Law Society, Cape Town, stating that the Law Society had no objection to Mr. O'Brien being admitted as an attorney.

The application was granted.

TRIAL CAUSE.

YOUNGHUSBAND V. BROCKLEBANK.

Mr. Burton appeared for the plaintiff. The defendant appeared in person.

Mr. Burton said the defendant was called from pleading. The action was for £113 12s. 6d., composed as follows: £93 12s. 6d. was claimed for wages due, and £20 for wrongful dismissal. The declaration of the plaintiff stated that the defendant was lessee of the Altona Hotel, Woodstock. On or about April 6, the defendant engaged plaintiff as manager of his bar at £8 per month. The defendant wrongfully dismissed plaintiff from his service, for which he claimed £20.

The defendant said he admitted the claim for wages, but did not admit the second claim, as he contended he did not dismiss plaintiff.

The Court made an order, giving judgment for the claim for wages, with costs.

RAGANELLI V. LIPSCHITZ. { 1904.
Aug. 2nd.
" 3rd.

Building contract — Branch — Penalty—Extras.

In this action the plaintiff claimed £180 9s. for work and labour done, £100 damages sustained by plaintiff by reason of defendant failing to keep him supplied with building material, and £100 damages for wrongful dismissal, amounting in all to £380 9s., with costs.

The plaintiff's declaration stated that he was a contractor carrying on business at Cape Town, and the defendant resided at Middleburgh. By an agreement entered into on the 29th October, the defendant through his agent, Mr. Wiener, contracted to employ plaintiff to do the whole of the excavators', masons', and bricklayers, and drainers' work in connection with the erection of certain four two-storied and two one-storied buildings situate in Cornwall-street, Woodstock, and to pay plaintiff the sum of £542 for the completion of the erection. In breach of the agreement the defendant on or about the 5th April refused to allow plaintiff to continue the erection of the buildings. By that wrongful act, plaintiff suffered damages to the extent of £200. Plaintiff had at all times been willing to complete the erection of the buildings. Beyond the work mentioned in the agreement, plaintiff claimed as extras for work done and performed at the request of the defendant the sum of £80 9s.

Defendant's plea and claim in reconvention stated that he admitted the agreement was entered into. One clause of which was that the work was to be completed by the 1st of March, under a penalty of 10s. for every day that the work remained incomplete thereafter. That plaintiff was to give his personal attention to the work, and in case of default, the defendant would be entitled to cancel the agreement, and give the work into other hands. Defendant held that he had carried out his part of the contract. Plaintiff did not complete the work by the 1st March, and that he executed what work he did do in an unworkmanlike manner, and that he wasted the material. Defendant paid plaintiff £396 for work done by him, and the completion of the work had, through plaintiff's negligence and improper work, cost defendant £215 11s. 3d., making a total of £611 11s. 3d. Further, in consequence of plaintiff not completing the work for 70 days after the date agreed on, defendant was entitled to recover £35. Therefore, there was a sum of £97 11s. 3d. due to defendant.

Plaintiff's replication stated that he admitted he did not complete the work by the first of March, but that defendant had not hitherto made any claim against him. The cause of the work not being proceeded with was because defendant did not keep the material supplied. Plaintiff admitted receiving £392.

Mr. Pyemont for plaintiff; Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Roux) for defendant.

Joseph Raganelli (the plaintiff), stated he was a builder and contractor and surveyor. He had been in Cape Town two years. He entered into agreement with the defendant to carry out certain building work for £542. He based his estimate on the plans which were shown to him by the architect. He proceeded with the work. Witness engaged a man named Bopener to do the inside plastering, and a man named January to do the outside plastering. He engaged him in February. He was only at work three or four days for want of material. Bopener completed the inside plastering by the end of February. He was not paid at once, because the defendant stopped payment. Bopener was paid on the 16th March. Scaffolding was necessary to do the outside plastering. Defendant was to supply all material. The work could not be proceeded with, because the defendant failed to give the scaffolding. Witness spoke to the architect, and he told him he could claim from £15 to £20 from defendant, because of his failure to supply the material. In February disputes arose with defendant, because he was not supplying sufficient money weekly. The contract was broken, and defendant asked witness to sign a paper to the effect, but he refused to do so. Just before that witness advertised in the "Cape Times" for plasterers, and got one named Myer, who did not do the work satisfactorily, and was dismissed. Another man was engaged to complete all the plastering work. A few days after witness saw the defendant's agent, who said the work had been given to another contractor, because witness had been negligent. Witness told him that he had entered into a contract with plasterers, and would get on with the work. The agent then tried to prevent witness going on with the work, and said that if he went on the ground, he would assault him. Witness notwithstanding the threats went on the building. Witness did that to assert his right to the work. He then left and consulted a lawyer on the subject. At that time the plastering, cementing, and drainage of both buildings had to be completed. Witness had a man to do that work at £65. The defendant showed witness a number of changes in the plan which he required made. In some instances witness followed the design in the plan, but had to take it out again. The extra concrete on the stocks was also ordered by the Town Engineer.

[Buchanan, J., here intimated that he would probably have to send somebody to inspect the building.]

Witness (continuing) said that the amount of the extras had been added to each weekly claim of the £392, received by him, £24, was on account of extras.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness had originally claimed £290 and £500 damages. He could not tell the value of the work done since that. It was not true that the balustrade was taken down because of its being inferior work. The scaffolding was masons' work, but the architect did not tell witness that he would have to do that work as part of the contract. Witness did not expect to make a large profit out of the price he tendered. When witness was busy building, he required at least 50,000 bricks a week. The Building Inspector did not tell witness to take a wall down. Witness denied that for a whole week in March he did not do more than 2½ hours' work on the building. It was not a fact that witness was always quarrelling with his workmen and discharging them. Defendant's agent told witness that if he entered on the works he would get the plasterer to knock him down. Witness did not know that a man named Viller had received £120 for finishing the work for witness.

Jacobus Bopener stated he was a master plasterer, and during the month of February undertook a sub-contract for plastering the inside of the house in question. He did not begin plastering at once. Plaintiff did not pay witness, so he went to defendant's agent and asked for payment. The latter sent him to the architect, who assured him he would get the money. Witness got the money on the 16th March. Plaintiff wanted witness to do the outside plastering, but he was afraid to do it, because he feared he would not be paid. A man named January did it, but left it.

John Adams stated he was assistant to last witness. He corroborated his evidence.

Mr. Pyemont closed his case.

William Harrison Gray stated he was an architect, and had been in practice in Cape Colony sixteen or seventeen years. The agreement was entered into in October, and work, which was commenced in November, was kept up well for a fortnight, after which it fell off. Plaintiff was repeatedly quarrelling with his staff and changing his men. Witness never saw a shortage in the supply of material. Witness weekly advised Mr. Wiener (defendant's agent) as to the amount to be paid to the plaintiff. Plaintiff had received £396 on account, which was rather more than he was entitled to. Certain work which had been done had to be taken down and replaced. Owing to plaintiff not conducting the work properly, plaintiff consented to a man named Viller taking the work over and completing it. Viller started at once on the work and stuck at it. He got the balance (£80) which was due to the plaintiff. Witness did not order the plaintiff to leave the works. Witness considered that through the plaintiff's negligence large number of bricks were broken. The plaintiff used 324 barrels of cement, and he should not have used more than 200. Cement was 12s. 6d. per barrel.

Thos. L. Wood stated that he had examined the work, and considered nothing should be allowed for scaffolding, as that was part of the plaintiff's duty. The plaintiff, he thought, was entitled to £1 16s. for the work on the windows, £7 for the grates, and £4 10s. for the fire wall, making a total of £13 6s. The value of the work to be completed on the 28th March last, as pointed out to him, would be about £98, made up as follows: Plastering, £60; yards, etc., £15; drainage, £15; and sundries, £8.

W. H. Gray (cross-examined by Mr. Pyemont) stated that the plaintiff's testimonials, he believed, were good. During the first fourteen days the men fairly well understood their work as regarded the concrete and brickwork. The levelling was not done by the plaintiff himself. At the time of taking the contract, the plaintiff did not ask him for specifications. Witness went over the work each Saturday, and made a note of what was done. He arrived at 324 barrels of cement from the account sent in by Messrs. Small and Morgan. The wall in the back yard was not originally shown on the plan, but it was paid for. He was not aware that Mr. Vyner paid any sums on account of extra concrete. It was usual to say all scaffolding to be provided for by the contractor without extra charge, but that was not put into the contract. The plaintiff was not asked to sign a paper giving over the plastering to Mr. Villa. A memorandum was drawn up to the effect that Villa should do the "bossing" of the plastering, and that Joseph Angelitta should do the work for £80. The work which the plaintiff did was bad right through. Witness had been practising in this colony as an architect and surveyor for six years, and in England for twenty-five years.

Re-examined by Mr. Gardiner: One of the windows at the back was decreased in size, and the expert had allowed for that.

By Buchanan, J.: £103 11s. 6d. was paid to Villa for work that should have been done under the contract.

Horace Vyner stated he acted for the plaintiff in the contract. Witness was on the works all the time. Plaintiff said he had taken a cheap contract on, and asked witness to help him. It was clearly understood that witness was to be paid for clearing the site. Raganelli was on the work regularly at first, but later on he seldom appeared. At the interview at the end of March, he saw Raganelli and Villa, and Mr. Gray asked him if he minded if the latter finished the work, and witness said he did not mind as long as the work was done. Five or six days afterwards, Raganelli came down, and said he would dismiss the men, whom he called from their work, but witness impressed on them to remain. He never noticed the men stop for want of material. He had been offered £7 10s. each for the houses on the 1st March and £14 for the shop and house.

Cross-examined by Mr. Pyemont: He did not know Villa before the 29th March. Witness paid the money to Gray, who distributed the money among the workmen. He did not think that Villa had a paper in his hand at the interview. The defendant was not asked to sign any document.

Joseph Villa stated that he introduced Raganelli to Gray in order that he might get work. At the interview at the end of March, he suggested that Angelitta should take over the plastering for £80, and this Raganelli agreed to, and the money was to be paid to Mr. Gray. Witness got nothing for his services.

Cross-examined by Mr. Pyemont: At the interview Mr. Gray had a little memorandum for Raganelli to sign, but the latter refused to sign it. All that was on the paper was with regard to the deduction of £80.

Wm. Ryan, cartage contractor, stated that he contracted for the conveyance of material to the building, and he always noticed plenty of stuff on hand for the work.

George Wm. Rowley, building inspector. Woodstock, stated that for the first three weeks everything went all right, but after that he had frequently to complain to anyone he found on the building. There was always plenty of material on the premises.

Cross-examined by Mr. Pyemont: About March 8 he had to complain about the wall. It was altered about the 18th. The wall was built most irregularly, the bricks not being properly laid.

John Mitchelmore, builder and contractor, stated that the job could have been done with 200 barrels of cement at the outside.

The plaintiff, recalled, by Mr. Pyemont, stated that he did not ask Wiener to clear the site. The clay which Wiener used for daga gave him a lot of trouble. Witness cleared the rubbish from the cottages. He estimated 210 casks of cement were used on the job.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He could not say how many casks Villa used to finish the work. Wiener was never asked to clear the site.

By Buchanan, J.: There was no necessity to clear the site for the cottages.

Mr. Gardiner closed his case, and counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Buchanan, J. said the plaintiff, according to the contract produced, dated the 9th October last, agreed to do the plastering and other work in connection with the erection of certain cottages and shops for the defendant for the sum of £542. He complained that on the 5th April he was wrongfully prevented from completing his contract, whereby he suffered damages in the sum of £200, and he claims £200 damages and £180 9s. for work and labour done. According to the terms of the contract, the work was to be done in a thorough and workmanlike manner, and to the satisfaction of the architect, Mr. Gray. Moreover, the contractor was to give his personal attention to the work, and in case of any default, it was lawful for the proprietor to cancel the agreement and give the work into other hands. The work was to be completed by the 1st March next ensuing, but the plaintiff was at the buildings until the 28th or the 29th March. At an interview in Mr. Gray's office, on the 29th, plaintiff admitted his inability to complete the work. Mr. Villa had introduced plaintiff to the architect, and as a fellow countryman he came forward to assist plaintiff. The plaintiff then agreed to hand over the work to Villa, so there was no breach on the part of the defendant. The amount of the contract was £242, but, in carrying out the contract, the plaintiff did certain extras. These extras were £7 for a fire place, £1 16s. to build up the windows at the back of the house, and £4 10s. for a fire wall, making £13 6s., as estimated by Mr. Wood. The plaintiff alleged there might be a great many other extras, but after hearing Mr. Wood, I have no doubt there were no such extras. One of these extras was for the erection of scaffolding. There was no mention in the contract about scaffolding, and Mr. Wood stated that that was part of the plaintiff's duty. Moreover, Mr. Gray said he had told plaintiff to allow for the labour in his original tender. Nothing could, therefore, be allowed on that claim. The utmost the plaintiff could be allowed for extras was £15 6s., which, with the contract price, made a total sum of £555 6s. Against that he had received £396 in cash, and Mr. Wood estimated that the work undone amounted to £98. The amount actually paid to Villa to complete the contract was £103 11s. 3d., and the defendant was entitled to add to the £396, making £499 11s. 3d., which being deducted from the contract amount left a balance of £55 4s. 9d. That would settle the claim in convention. The defendant claimed damages in reconvension. In the first place, he claimed for cement which he contended had been unnecessarily used in the work done by plaintiff. On that point I do not think that the evidence is at all clear, and I cannot admit that claim. There was another claim for levelling the ground, which the defendant said was not done by the plaintiff. By the contract the plaintiff undertook to level the ground where necessary, but he says that it was not necessary to do more than he did. It appears that some levelling was done, with the object of getting the sub soil, which was extracted and used for building material. I should have liked better evidence on that point, but, in the absence of evidence, and considering that Mr. Wood, who was on the spot, did not recommend the payment of the claim, I am not prepared to allow anything on that item. There only remains the claim for £35 for not completing the work at the stipulated time. Here there was clearly a breach of contract on the plaintiff's part. He was to finish the house by the 1st March, but he was at the work until the end of March, by which time he entered into a sub-contract to complete the work by the 1st May. On his own showing the plaintiff did not expect to complete the work till then, and I will take that as the date when the work might reasonably have been finished. It has been said that these damages should not be allowed, because there were certain extras. Well, I admit that extra work might do away with a time penalty in a building contract, where it was shown that the extra work was of such a substantial nature as to prevent the work being completed in proper time, but the extras in this case are so trifling, and not sufficient to prevent the completion in due time of the contract. Taking 31 days up to the 1st May, at ten shillings a day, that would make £30 10s. Deducting that from £55 4s 9d. would leave a balance of £24 14s. 9d. in favour of the plaintiff, for which judgment will be entered, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.)]

TRIAL CAUSE.

TEMPEST V. TEMPEST. { 1901.
Aug. 3rd.

This was an action brought by Clara Tempest, of Cape Town, against her husband, Alfred Tempest, a butcher, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which divorce, on the ground of malicious desertion. Mr. Gardiner appeared for the plaintiff; the defendant was in default.

Clara Tempest (the plaintiff) said she was married to the defendant at Bradford on the 27th August, 1897. Defendant came out to South Africa in March, 1898, intending to obtain employment in Cape Town. Witness understood that he had obtained a situation with Tregidga's, the butchers, and she followed him to the Cape in December, 1898. They lived together at Newlands until September, 1899. Defendant was then arrested on a charge of embezzlement of his employers' moneys, and he was convicted, and sentenced to four months' imprisonment. When he was liberated from prison, witness saw him about the beginning of 1900. The defendant joined the Railway Pioneers and other corps. Witness saw the defendant on the disbandment of the corps. In January, 1903, he came to Cape Town. He then went to Port Elizabeth in search of employment, but returned to Cape Town again, and afterwards proceeded to Johannesburg. Witness was at that time supporting herself as a waitress at the Hermitage Hotel. The defendant obtained employment in Johannesburg, but told her to remain in Cape Town until he sent for her.

Correspondence which had taken place was read.

Witness (proceeding) said she had not seen the defendant since he was in Cape Town in 1903. He was in the habit of asking her to go to Johannesburg when he was out of work, but when he had employment he said nothing.

A decree of restitution of conjugal rights was granted, with costs, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th September, failing which rule to issue calling upon the defendant to show cause on the first day of next term why a decree of divorce should not be granted, with costs, service to be in the same manner as directed in regard to citation.

Postea (October 17.) The rule was made absolute.

BRINK V. AVENANT.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Van Zyl) appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner), appeared for the defendant.

Mr. Burton said he had to apply for a postponement of the hearing. It was extremely unfortunate, because this was a country case, and the witnesses had come in for hearing, but he had to put in an affidavit by the plaintiff's attorney, Mr. Van Ryneveld (Messrs. Dempers and Van Ryneveld), who stated that a most material and important witness for the plaintiff was Mr. Izak Meiring, surveyor, of Worcester. A certificate was annexed from Dr. Hugo, of Worcester, saying that Mr. Meiring was confined to his bed with a feverish attack, and would be unable to travel for some days. The question, said counsel, was one as to the ownership of a certain strip of land, which the parties respectively claimed as their property, and the declaration in the case was based upon a plan of this property framed by Mr. Meiring, as the only person who could explain the position to the Court.

Mr. Schreiner said that his client was not a wealthy farmer, and he had had to bring witnesses from Sutherland, Swellendam, and Worcester.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is most unfortunate that all this expense should have been incurred and wasted. I am afraid your client will have to pay the costs.]

Mr. Burton said that it was unfortunate for the plaintiff that his chief witness should not be present, because in all other respects his case was ready. He thought the costs should abide the result.

Mr. Schreiner contended that the costs of the day should in any event be borne by the plaintiff, who was responsible for the set-down. The costs ought not, he submitted, to be put on the small man.

Mr. Burton, replying to the Court, said he could not, in justice to his client, go on with the case, and lead the evidence that he had in court, leaving over the evidence of Mr. Meiring until another day.

The order of the Court was that the case should be postponed, the plaintiff to pay the costs of the day, and leave granted to the plaintiff to join as co-defendants the owners of any land interested in fixing the boundary.

FRIEDMOND V. SOLOMON. { 1904.
Aug. 3rd.

Negligence — Neighbouring proprietor—Injury to property.

This was an action brought by Johannes Friedmond, merchant, Loop and Waterkant streets, Cape Town, against Joseph Solomon, also of Cape Town, owner of certain premises adjoining the plaintiff's, to recover a sum of £29 in respect of damage alleged to have been done to certain musical instruments in consequence of building operations negligently and carelessly carried on by the defendant, his servants, or his agents.

The plaintiff's declaration stated: 1. That he was a merchant in Cape Town, and defendant a resident there, and owner of certain property separated from plaintiff's premises by a party wall. 2. That in or about July 1903 while building on his land defendant so negligently carried on his operations that rain and other water was wrongfully and unlawfully caused or allowed to flow from defendant's premises to plaintiff's premises, flooding the same. 3. By reason of the said negligent conduct certain goods belonging to plaintiff were in part totally destroyed, and in part seriously damaged by water and the dampness occasioned thereby. Plaintiff estimates his damage at £29 10s. 5d., for which defendant is liable, but which he refuses to pay.

Wherefore plaintiff claims: (a) Payment of the said £29 10s. 5d. as and for damages (b) interest on the said sum a tempore morae (c) alternative relief (d) costs of suit.

Defendant's plea: 1. Admits par. 1 of the declaration. 2. He admits that in or about July 1903 certain building operations were carried on on his said property. 3. He denies negligence or that plaintiff's goods were destroyed or damaged by water owing to his negligence. 4. He has no knowledge of any such damage, and is not liable therefor. Save as above he denies paragraphs 2 and 3.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan (with him Mr. Van Zyl) for plaintiff; Mr. Burton for defendant.

Johannes Friedmond, merchant, corner of Loop-street and Waterkant-street, said he was a seller of musical instruments. Next door to his premises was the defendant's building. There was a common lane running behind from Waterkant-street. There were main water pipes from the defendant's building emptying into the lane. The lane was now cemented, but it was not formerly. Witness became owner of his premises in 1900, and had them rebuilt. There were cellars below his premises underneath the level of the ground, but not below the level of the lane. He had his musical instruments on shelves in the cellars. Solomon rebuilt his premises from about February to September, 1903. Before that time witness had had no water or dampness in his cellars. During Mr. Solomon's operations water found its way on three different occasions into the cellars of witness's premises. He found water coming in from the next door basement on May 28. Solomon was excavating a cellar alongside the party wall and the lane. There was a foot of water in the excavation near the party wall. Water was soaking through the party wall. On the 20th July more water came through the party wall, the water this time being all over the cellar. The wall was very damp all along. The water could not possibly flow down the lane, on account of the rubbish which had been left about. He had frequently complained to the defendant about the way in which the operations were being carried out. On the 20th July some of the instruments were destroyed, and others were a good deal damaged. A lot of the mischief had been done by the dampness.

Cross-examined: He did not claim for any damage that may have been done in May. He did not take the damaged goods away on the Sunday. He had these goods packed in a case on Solomon's account. The other goods had been repaired, or sold at reduced prices. He had sold about one-third.

Witness (replying to the Court) said he was musical, but he believed Mr. Solomon was not musical.

Further cross-examined: The cellar was not damp in the ordinary way.

Austin Cook, architect, Cape Town, also gave evidence as to examinations he had made of the premises, and said he found water trickling down the party wall into the plaintiff's cellar.

In cross-examination, he said water could not get in from any other place but the party wall.

Henry Alexander Paterson, a builder, stated he was called on as an expert to examine the place. The party wall was quite damp, and there was about an inch and a quarter of water at the foot of the stairs. The water was oozing through the party wall. Witness examined the drains, and found them running quite clear.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Witness said he showed the state of the place to Olive, who passed no remarks about it. The water would pass through any party wall that might be erected.

Arthur Littlefield stated that at the time of the occurrence he was a shop assistant to the plaintiff. He found the water oozing through the wall on the morning of the 25th May. Witness sorted out the damaged goods. A large number were damaged.

Frederick Friedmond, son of plaintiff, also gave evidence as to the damage sustained. He found that most of the goods packed on the lower shelves were injured. He made out a list of the articles damaged, and only charged "landing prices."

Richard Gascoyne Anderson stated he carried on the business of music-seller in Loop-street. He was called in to see the damaged articles, and he considered the plaintiff had put a very low estimate on them.

Mr. Buchanan closed his case.

Joseph Solomon (the defendant), stated he first heard from the plaintiff in May that the water was oozing into the place. Witness a couple of days later saw the plaintiff and Mr. Cook examining his property. They told him that the rain was percolating through the wall. Witness went with them to the basement of plaintiff's house. They examined it closely, but could not see where the water came through.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: The statement made by plaintiff to the effect that witness refused to examine the place was incorrect. Witness took up the position that the builders were responsible.

Joseph Rosenberg stated he was an architect, and had superintended the erection of defendant's house. The excavations were properly carried out. During the wet season the water in the basement of defendant's building was not more than one inch deep.

Frank Murray stated he built the house for the defendant. In August, witness examined the place, and found that the party wall was damp, but the concrete floor was dry. There was no water at the plaintiff's side of the floor.

The plaintiff, recalled, stated that he had to carry the water in the basement in both May and July out by means of buckets. On the last occasion there were 35 buckets. About half of the water soaked away. He made a mistake in his direct evidence, when he stated there were three feet of water, he meant inches.

Mr. Burton closed his case, and counsel then proceeded to argue on the facts, after which

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff claims damages for injury alleged to have been done to musical instruments through the negligence of the defendant in allowing water to congregate in his basement, which percolated through the wall to his (the plaintiff's) basement. It appears that the basement of the defendant's shop, in which he stored musical instruments, was something like five to six feet below the surface of the surrounding ground. The basement of the defendant's house was also of the same depth, but owing to the sloping nature of the ground, the basement of the defendant's property was about six inches higher than that of the plaintiffs. According to the plaintiff there had been some injury done in May. The water forced itself through, and about a foot of water stood there. It, however, appears that there was not much damage done then. The damage was done at a subsequent date—in July. Under examination-in-chief, the plaintiff said that such a quantity of water came in between the Saturday and Monday as to cover three feet. His own witness put it at three inches. The plaintiff was recalled, and said he made a mistake, and that he meant three inches. He also said that there was about one foot earlier in the day, but that it had soaked through the ground. That was his final statement, after repeatedly giving different versions. It is quite true that water will go downwards, but if there is sufficient pressure behind it, it will go upwards. The question that arises is was there sufficient pressure to force it through. In my opinion there was not sufficient pressure to force so large a bulk of water through the party wall as to fill the basement to the extent of one foot. Therefore, that large quantity of water must have come in some other way, and if it did not come through that plug-hole. The only other way it can be accounted for is that the pressure of the water in the saturated sub-soil all round the building may have been sufficient to force the water through. I am quite satisfied that the damage was not caused by the water oozing from the defendant's side. It seems to me wholly incredible that a foot of water could have been forced to percolate by a pressure of six inches. The plaintiff, therefore, in my opinion, has not proved his case. Mr. Olive, an intelligent witness, who is wholly impartial, did not find that great dampness which would have existed if this large quantity of water had come through. He is a trustworthy person, and great reliance is placed by the Court on his evidence. There will, therefore, be absolution from the instance, with costs.

PRICE AND CO. V. WEBNER.

Plea—General denial—Exception.

The defendant by his plea referred to each paragraph of the declaration and denied the allegations therein contained.

Held, there was no ground for exception taken to the plea, but the costs of the exception were allowed to stand over until it should appear at the trial whether or not every allegation was intended to be denied.

This was an argument on an exception taken by the plaintiff to the defendant's plea.

The declaration of the plaintiff stated that he carried on business at Cape Town as a house furnisher. At the special request of the defendant, plaintiff supplied him with furniture for £196 13s. 1d. Defendant paid £100 on account, and refused and neglected to pay the balance. In or about February plaintiff, at the special request of the defendant, supplied him with more furniture, to the value of £44 0s. 1d., but defendant refused to pay for that.

The defendant's plea specifically denied all the paragraphs of the declaration.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Alexander for the defendant.

Mr. Gardiner held that defendant did not comply with Rule 330d of the Court, which stated that it was not sufficient for a defendant in his plea in convention, or for a plaintiff in his plea in reconvention, to deny generally the allegations alleged by the declaration, as the case might be, but each allegation must be dealt with specifically.

Mr. Alexander submitted that his client had dealt with each paragraph specifically.

His Lordship inquired if the defendant denied that he got the furniture.

Mr. Alexander replied in the affirmative.

His Lordship: Does he deny that he paid £100?

Mr. Alexander: Yes.

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant, by his plea, has specifically denied the allegations in each paragraph of the declaration. He has not repeated verbatim the particular allegations which he denies, but by referring to the different paragraphs, he must be taken to have denied the allegations contained in each. The defendant takes a risk upon himself by adopting this form of plea, for he must be held also to have denied the payment by him to the plaintiff of a sum of money as alleged in the declaration. At the trial the Court will be in a better position to judge whether the plea is not really an evasive one, and the question of costs will stand over until then, but the exceptions to the form of the plea must, for the present, be overruled.

Thereafter amended declaration and plea were filed, and on the 26th October, 1904, judgment was given for plaintiffs, with costs, including the costs of the exception, it being admitted in the amended plea that £100 had been paid on account.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ADMISSION.

{ 1904.
{ Aug. 4th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the admission of Henry George Willmot as an attorney and notary.

Application granted and oath administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

ESTATE BOYES V. COETZEE.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £110, with interest at the rate of 9 per cent., the bond having become due by reason of no interest having been paid; counsel also applied for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

DE WAAL AND CO. V. COLYN.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £10 3s. 5d.

Order granted.

ARDERNE V. BENNAN.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent, provisional order having been given on the 15th July.

The defendant said that the bond on which the petitioner had taken proceedings was not yet due. He could not appear to oppose judgment at the time, because of an accident.

The matter was ordered to stand over, pending production of the bond.

Subsequently the bond was produced, and the Court granted an order for final adjudication.

HEYDENRYCH V. FRAME. } 1904.
 } Aug. 4th.

Provisional sentence—Conflict of evidence.

The plaintiff sued defendant on an acknowledgment of debt signed by her as surety and co-principal debtor on behalf of her husband (an insolvent). The husband alleged that this debt had been paid, and in this he was supported by the affidavit of another deponent, but no receipt was produced.

Held, that provisional sentence must be refused and the parties directed to go into the principal case.

This matter was standing over from May 14th (14 C.T.R., 377) pending the production of further affidavits by the defendant. The plaintiff sought provisional sentence for £146, on an acknowledgment of debt.

The affidavit of J. A. Reid, a member of a firm of solicitors in Glasgow, acting for the trustees of the late Thomas Frame (father of A. K. Frame) stated that on the 20th August, 1895, there was laid before a meeting of the said trustees a letter from Messrs. Reid and Nephew, solicitors, Cape Town, applying for an advance of £1,000 on behalf of A. K. Frame, to extricate him from his then difficulties, and afford him an opportunity of retrieving his position, and strongly urging his trustees to come to his assistance. Certain communications took place, and in the end the trustees advanced a sum of £1,000 to free A. K. Frame, and those dependent on him, from financial difficulties.

The affidavit of Alexander K. Frame, of Claremont (husband of the defendant), stated that on the 2nd of December, 1893, he borrowed from the plaintiff the sum of £200 sterling, for which he gave a written acknowledgment for £230, principal and interest. The acknowledgment was annexed to the affidavit, and was signed by the defendant, Johanna Margaret Frame (born Duminy). The money was to be repaid in certain instalments. The acknowledgment was also signed by A. K. Frame, as surety and co-principal debtor. He made payments from time to time, and there were several renewals. On the 5th February, 1896, the balance due from him to the plaintiff, was £146, for which amount the acknowledgment was given that was now sued upon. He denied that he asked the plaintiff not to include the amount owed to him by his wife in the statement that he made out. The advances made to him by his father's trustees were made in order to clear the defendant as well as himself from financial difficulties. He admitted that he was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of £300. He complained of the high rate of interest charged by the plaintiff on the loan of £200, and said he did not wish his father's trustees to know that he had been foolish enough to borrow money at the rate of 30 per cent. per annum. As to the £300, he consented to grant three drafts of £100 in place of all the other documents in view of plaintiff agreeing not to accept the full amount of his claim. The old documents were destroyed.

The plaintiff's answering affidavit stated that the £200 borrowed from him on the 2nd December, 1893, was lent to the defendant, and the said A. K. Frame simply signed as surety. With regard to the interest, it was true that he charged at the rate of 2½ per cent. per month. He contended that the interest was none too high, considering the great risks he ran of losing the principal, and the trouble he was put to. He did not think anyone else in Cape Town would have granted the defendant more favourable terms for the loan. He denied absolutely that the defendant was not the principal debtor. He did not know anything about a payment having been made by the Frame trustees to clear the defendant's indebtedness. At the time no reference was made by A. K. Frame or Reid and Nephew about settling the defendant's indebtedness to him. Deponent said that he had only brought the action, because the period of prescription was approaching.

Mr. Burton for plaintiff; Mr. McGregor for defendant.

De Villiers, C.J., said it would be interesting to know how much the parties had actually paid to the plaintiff in principal and interest.

Mr. Burton said that he could not know how much had been paid, but he would remind his lordship that this question of an exorbitant rate of interest might be carried too far. It must be borne in mind that the defendant had practically no security to offer, and that the loan involved a good deal of trouble.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J., said I am bound to attach considerable weight to the statements made by Mr. Wilson, who was a clerk in the employ of Messrs. Reid and Nephew at the time the statement between the plaintiff and defendant was made. Application had been made to the trustees in Scotland for money to enable Frame to settle all his liabilities. At that time his liabilities were direct as well as indirect to Heydenrich. He was liable directly for notes signed by himself, and also for notes that he had signed as surety. It is clear that the intention of Frame at the time was to obtain money from the trustees, to enable him to pay all his debts. In obtaining the money on behalf of Frame, he considered that he was obtaining money to free him from all liabilities. The trustees so understood it, it appeared to me that Frame so understood it, and Mr. Wilson, the clerk of Reid and Nephew, also so understood it. And he went further, and said that the plaintiff himself must have so understood it. He (Mr. Wilson) said: "In consequence of communications, the said Alexander K. Frame handed me a cheque for £993 odd to settle the liabilities of himself and his wife (the above-mentioned defendant). Acting on behalf of Reid and Nephew, who entrusted the whole transaction to me, I notified the above plaintiff to forward his full claim to me for adjustment. The plaintiff handed me his account to March, 1896, and on the 5th March, 1896, I paid him £300 on account, and later on gave him £55 his account included all liabilities of defendant and her husband. 14s. in full settlement of balance. In thus paying the plaintiff, I took it that The clerk made a mistake—and I take it a serious mistake—in not obtaining a proper receipt from Heydenrych. There may have been at the time reasons why the original document should not be sent to Glasgow, and at all events here was a definite statement made by a clerk of Reid and Nephew, which, if it were true, would put an end to the plaintiff's claim. The plaintiff himself denied it; but in a matter of this kind, where there is a direct conflict of evidence, it would be a great advantage to hear and see the witnesses personally. No doubt there is another point, somewhat against the defendant, and that is that on the last occasion it was stated that the documents and receipts had been forwarded to Glasgow. An application was made to the Court for postponement, in order to enable the defendant to get these documents from Glasgow. The documents had now been sent, and they did not support Frame's statement, but the very fact that he was then so confident that if the documents were obtained showed, at all events, that the defendant believed at the time that the documents which had been sent to Glasgow would assist him. On further consideration, the defendant said now that after the payment of the £350, the documents were destroyed by the plaintiff in his presence. It is to be regretted that that statement was not made before. At the same time, if the statement were true the defendant ought to have an opportunity of confirming that statement before the Court. Under all the circumstances, I think this is a case in which the Crown may fairly order the plaintiff to go into the principal case, in order that the facts may be fully investigated by the Court. The order of the Court will be that the plaintiff go into the principal case, costs to abide the result.

ESTATE LANDSBERG V. RAHMAN AND AHMED.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendants' estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

MYBURGH V. AMARDIEN.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence on two mortgage bonds of £650 and £50 respectively, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 1st January, 1904, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

MURRAY AND CO V. HORNBURGH AND BARRE.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the final adjudication of the defendants' estate. Mr. W. P. Buchanan appeared to oppose on behalf of the defendants, and asked for a postponement pending an action to be brought by his clients against one Gilbert Windgate for the recovery of £1,094 7s. 4d., which they alleged was owing to them by reason of a sub-contract, which they held from Windgate. It would not be to the benefit of the creditors to sequestrate the estate. The liabilities were £600, and outstanding accounts amounted to £1,094. Counsel contended that under the Ordinance his lordship had discretion to delay the final adjudication.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is the plaintiff prepared to give the defendants an opportunity of bringing their action?]

Mr. Bisset: The plaintiff wishes to arrive at some finality in the matter, but I have no instructions on that point.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the plaintiff doesn't consent to the superseding of the order, I do not see how I can help the defendants. Better let the parties consult, it may be to the benefit of both.]

Subsequently, Mr. Bisset said he had seen his clients who did not see their way clear to consent to a supersession of the order. Accordingly he must press for an order for final sequestration.

Mr. Buchanan said that plaintiffs were really sureties for the performance of the work undertaken by the defendants. If defendants' claim was a good one, then their assets were three times in excess of the liabilities. It was true that an act of insolvency had been committed, but he submitted that notwithstanding this, it was competent for a debtor to prove that his assets were sufficient to discharge his liabilities.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why don't they pay? That is the best test of their solvency.]

Mr. Buchanan said it might be that the assets were not readily available.

De Villiers, C.J., said the Court might authorise the Master to appoint a curator, with power to proceed with the action. If it were true that defendants had a good claim it would be very hard that they should be declared insolvent.

After further argument,

De Villiers, C.J.: On the whole, I think the case ought to stand over until Thursday. By that time, counsel for the defendants will be in a position to state definitely what they intend doing. I am afraid that if a curator were to bring this action it would necessitate continual applications to the Court. There would be a difficulty about money to prosecute the action, and the simpler course would be that the estate should be sequestered, and that the trustee should bring the action, and if he succeeds there will be a balance to be paid to the insolvents.

The case was ordered to stand over until Thursday next, the Chief Justice remarking that in the meanwhile the plaintiff could reconsider the matter.

Postea (August 11th). Final adjudication granted.

KICHNAN V. MARAIS.

Dr. Greer moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £20. Since the proceedings had been instituted he understood that the principal sum had been paid, and he now asked for costs.

Granted.

PURCELL, YALLOP AND EVERETT V. PFAFF.

Mr. Gardiner moved for a decree of civil imprisonment against the defendant on an unsatisfied judgment for £26 12s. 4d., together with £7, and 8s. 6d. costs.

The defendant appeared in person, and stated that he owed other money. He could only offer 10s. or 15s. a month for the first few months.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That's a small sum!]

I couldn't do any more than £1. I will be able to pay more when things get good.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are you prepared to swear you have no means?]

Yes.

Decree of civil imprisonment granted, with costs, to be suspended upon payment of 15s. for four months, and after that £1 per month, until the debt is satisfied. The first payment to be made on the 15th August.

GORDON AND ANOTHER V. FOY.

Mr. P. Jones moved for judgment for £500 on a mortgage bond, with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum. The bond has become due by reason of non-payment of interest, and counsel also asked that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Order granted.

FORREST V. ALEXANDER.

Mr. Sutton moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £600, with interest, and to have the property specially hypothecated declared executable.

Order granted.

FIELD AND CO. V. LEWIN.

Dr. Greer moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

MIDDLETON V. PORTER AND } 1904. BARENDORF. } Aug. 4th.

Mr. P. Jones moved for judgment under Rule 329d, for an order compelling the defendant to give transfer of certain land and buildings at Plumstead. The plaintiff had fulfilled the conditions of sale. Counsel also asked for judgment for £16. for rent of the buildings, which had been collected by the only authorised agents of the defendants.

Order granted.

VAN DER HOFF V. PADDON.

Mr. Sutton moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £58 12s. 6d., quitrent and stamp duty, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT V. CONNOLLY.

Mr. Nightingale moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £240 10s., quitrent and stamp duty due to the Colonial Government.

Order granted.

BASSON V. VAN EKENEN.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £35, the value of cart and horses, with interest and costs of suit.

Order granted.

MAMEWEEKE V. OLINSKI.

Mr. Pyemont moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £157 6s. 8d. for goods sold and delivered, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

WELLS V. WELLS.

This was an application for an order declaring the respondent of unsound mind. The affidavits of Dr. Dodds and two other medical men, who had examined the defendant William Wells, stated that although the respondent, who was at the Valkenberg Asylum, had got over the most acute symptoms, yet at present he was incapable of managing his own affairs.

Mr. Struben appeared for the applicant, and Mr. Gutsche represented the curator ad litem.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are you satisfied as to his insanity, Mr. Gutsche?]

Yes, my lord, I cannot oppose this application. I would suggest that a son of the defendant's by a previous marriage be appointed as curator, jointly with his wife, Hanna Wells.

De Villiers, C.J., said he did not think there should be any division, and he would appoint the son, Wm. Chas. Wells, of Salt River, as curator of person and property.

BLACKALL V. ROBERTSON.

This was an application for an order declaring the respondent of unsound mind, and for the appointment of a curator in the administration of the estate. By a previous order the Court had allowed the matter to be proved by affidavit, and the affidavit of Dr. Jane Waterson, the medical attendant, set out that Mrs. Robertson was in her 91st year, and suffered from brain weakness, due to advanced age. There was no probability of an improvement. Other affidavits set out that the respondent was so weak that she could not write her name or distinguish one document from another.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Has she any property?]

Mr. Jones: Considerable property, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Whom do you suggest as curator?]

Mr. Jones: Mr. Roos, my lord.

Mr. M. Bisset: I am also advised that Mr. Roos would be a suitable person. I have seen Mrs. Robertson, and am satisfied she should have a curator appointed.

An order was granted declaring the respondent incapable of taking care of her property, and appointing Mr. Roos as curator.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte METELEERKAMP. { 1904.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved to have a rule nisi granted under the Derelict Lands Act made absolute.

Rule made absolute.

NGONO V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Transkeian Territories — Governor's Proclamation — Ultra vires.

The Governor, acting under powers conferred on him by Statute, issued a Proclamation, whereby it was enacted, inter alia, that in case a certain general rate assessed in the Transkeian Territory should remain unpaid for a period of three months, it should be lawful for the Magistrate to issue his warrant, authorizing the levy of the amount by sale of the goods and chattels of the defaulter. The petitioner being in default, some of his goods were attached under such warrant, whereupon he applied for an interdict, restraining the sale on the ground that the enactment was ultra vires.

Held, that the provision as to levy of goods was within the power of the Governor in regard to rates actually due.

The Proclamation further enacted that should the proceeds of the sale be insufficient to meet the payments due, the defaulter shall, on conviction, be liable to be punished as an idle and disorderly person.

Held, that until the petitioner had been proceeded against under this part of the Proclamation, the Court was not in a position to decide as to its validity.

This was an application for an interdict against the Colonial Government. From the applicant's affidavit it appeared that he was a native peasant farmer, resident in Qumbu, in the district of East Griqualand, and occupied land under the system known as the Communal Tenure System. The petitioner was still a taxpayer, and he also paid hut tax. On the 13th May, His Excellency the Governor issued a proclamation, which was duly published in the "Gazette," under which a system of local government was established in the Native Territories, including the district of Qumbu. Petitioner never admitted the legality of the said proclamation, and he never agreed to come under the operation of such law, and he had always challenged the right of the Governor to make such a law. Notwithstanding his protests, the Colonial Government, through the Resident Magistrate, had seized certain goods and chattels, belonging to the petitioner, and he prayed for an order restraining the Colonial Government from selling or disposing of the goods and chattels, and if sold, for an order restraining them from parting with the money, pending an action to be brought to determine the legality of the seizure, and of the proclamation itself.

Mr. Burton was for the applicant, and the Attorney-General appeared for the respondent.

Counsel said that the property of the applicant had been summarily seized under Proclamation 152, of 1903. That proclamation extended the operation of Proclamation 352, of 1894, providing for the establishment of Councils for the administration of local affairs in certain districts in the territory of the Transkei, and embraced and amended the first proclamation which provided for the establishment of these Councils, and made the proclamation applicable to certain districts in the Transkei Territories, including the district of Qumbu, of which the applicant was a resident. There were provisions for the establishment of these district Councils, first of all for the administration of local affairs, and then for the establishment of a general Council to administer the affairs of the various districts together. Then came the portions of the proclamation to which he wished to refer: the portions dealing with the general rate. Section 19 provided that it shall be lawful for the Governor to levy an annual rate to be paid by every native occupier of land or of a hut. The next section defined that the rate shall be not less than 10s., and shall be due and payable at the offices of the Resident Magistrate of the several districts. Then section 21 provided that in case the rate shall remain unpaid for a period of three months from the date on which it becomes due, the operations of clause 25 shall be deemed to apply. Clause 35—and it was the terms of this clause which applicant really wished to have decided—provided that it shall be lawful for the Magistrate to issue his warrant requiring the Messenger of the Court to levy and raise the amount by sale of the goods and chattels of the person making default. Should the proceeds of such sale not be sufficient to meet the payments due, or should the person in default not be in possession of any property, he shall, if found at any time at any place within the district, be taken and deemed to be an idle and disorderly person and on conviction thereof shall be subject to the provisions of the Vagrancy Act, and shall be liable to the penalties therein prescribed, and on a second or subsequent conviction shall be liable to be imprisoned, and kept to hard labour for a period not exceeding twelve months, provided that on payment of the rate he shall be relieved from this operation of the section.

Mr. Burton said the question was whether, under the powers given by Act 29, of 1897, Parliament could be taken to have given the power to the Government by proclamation to make a law, which he submitted was inconsistent with the general principles of the law of this country. He contended that what this clause did was to make a substantive criminal offence of the non-discharge of a civil liability.

De Villiers, C.J.: Shouldn't you wait until the mischief is done; until he is declared an idle and disorderly person?

I submit that a summary seizure of his goods has introduced a method of procedure which is also not in accordance with the general principles of our law. I say at once that my case with regard to that is not so strong as in the case of being convicted as an idle and disorderly person. Here there was power given to make a summary seizure without notice being given to and a demand made on the person affected, whereas under the law of the Colony it was required that a demand should be made before the Magistrate could issue a warrant in respect of rates. This proclamation did not provide for the giving of notice; it merely provided that if the tax were not paid within three months of its becoming due, the Magistrate should order the seizure of his property.

The Attorney-General pointed out that section 35 was taken word for word from section 36 of the Glen Grey Act. The Governor was given the additional power of applying any part of the Glen Grey Act to the Native Territories. The provisions were exactly similar in both Acts, excepting that in one instance the tax was 5s., and in the other 10s.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Legislature has conferred large powers of legislation upon the Governor in regard to the Transkeian territories, and by Act 29 of 1897 these powers were clearly defined. It is there enacted that the Governor may by Proclamation repeal, alter, amend and modify the laws, statutes, and ordinances now in force within the Transkeian Territories, Tembuland, and Pondoland, and make new laws applicable to the said territories, and may repeal, modify, and amend the same. Acting under these powers, the Governor has, by the 35th section of the Proclamation now in question, read in connection with the 21st section, enacted that in case the general rate shall remain unpaid for a period of three months from the date on which it becomes due, it shall be lawful for the magistrate to issue his warrant requiring the Messenger of the Court to levy and raise the amount by sale of the goods and chattels of the person making default. On behalf of the petitioner, it is claimed that the Governor had no power to make such a provision. In my opinion, however, such a provision is by no means inconsistent with the general powers which the Legislature intended to confer upon the Governor. Similar powers have been conferred in this country on local bodies, and even therefore if this rate for the purposes of which this levy is allowed is treated as merely a local rate, I consider that the Governor has ample power, under the authority vested in him, to make provisions of this kind. The petitioner does not allege that the rate is not due, except so far as he denies the validity of the proclamation together. Mr. Burton, however, contended that the consequences of non-payment are so serious that he is entitled to object altogether to this clause coming into operation. In my opinion, however, the objection should be made when there is any attempt to put the objectionable part into operation. Now, the part which Mr. Burton contends is really the objectionable part is as follows: Should the proceeds of such sale not be sufficient to meet the payments due, or should the person in default not be in possession of any property, he shall, if found at any time at any place within the district, be taken and deemed to be an idle and disorderly person, and on conviction thereof shall be subject to the provisions of certain acts—which practically make it a criminal offence—and shall be liable to the penalties therein prescribed, and on a second or subsequent conviction shall be liable to be imprisoned and kept to hard labour for a period not exceeding twelve months. Well, those provisions are certainly very drastic, but the difficulty has not arisen yet. The petitioner has not yet been treated harshly under this part of the section, and therefore the time has not yet come for the Court to express any opinion on the point, although I am bound to say this: that, seeing that similar provisions are contained in the Glen Grey Act, it would probably be a difficult matter for the petitioner to succeed even with this second and more serious objection. Judicially, however, I am not in a position to express any opinion on the second objection. Petitioner has not yet been treated as an idle and disorderly person, and this question does not yet arise for decision. The only question which does arise for decision is whether the levy is illegal. In the absence of any statement by the petitioner that the money is not owing, I am not prepared to say that it is illegal. The application must therefore be refused.

I think the applicant should pay the costs.

Sampson, A.-G., K.C., said that, as the costs were small, and as the applicant had come to the Court, and not taken the law into his own hands, Government would not press for costs.

B.S.A. ASPHALTE CO. V. } 1904.
CAPE TOWN GAS CO. } Aug. 4th.

This was an application on notice of motion calling on the respondents to show cause why a certain trial case should not be postponed for a period of three months. From Counsel's statement it appeared that it was alleged that the Gas Company had broken contract with the plaintiff company in regard to the supply of coal tar. The Court ordered the parties to go to trial, and the plaintiff then filed his declaration. The main point in the case was the supply of coal tar to Messrs. Nuttall, a competing firm, and now the defendants had given an assurance not to supply them. The application was based on the ground that the principal witness for the defence was in such a state of health that he could not even be examined on commission. The affidavit of Dr. Lansberg set out that Mr. Edward Patrick Reilly, the manager of the Gas Company, was suffering from nervous prostration, and was unfit to give evidence. He had ordered him to take a long sea voyage. The affidavit of Mr. Buissinne, attorney, set out that it would be impossible to go to trial without Mr. Reilly's evidence.

The affidavit of Dr. Hewat stated that Mr. Reilly was suffering from complete nervous prostration, as the result of a gas explosion. Mr. Reilly, in his affidavit, stated that he was unable to do any business, and, as a result of his state of health, the board of directors in England had granted him three months' leave. He was desirous of taking a sea voyage round the East Coast on August 6, and expected to return to Cape Town early in November.

The answering affidavit of Andrew Allen, managing director of the plaintiff company, set out that Dr. Hewat was a local director of the company. He had frequently seen Mr. Reilly since the accident, and believed he was enjoying good health. The proceedings had been pending some time, and Mr. Reilly had ample opportunity to prepare his evidence. Since the explosion Mr. Reilly had attended a meeting of the S.A. Brickfields Company, and was able to criticise the affairs of the company. He believed that Mr. Reilly was leaving for England in connection with the business of the Gas Company, and, in any case, his evidence was not very material. The books of the defendant company could be inspected and reported upon by an accountant. Nuttall and Co. were still being supplied with coal tar, and to have the proceedings delayed meant further loss to the plaintiff company.

The affidavit of George Gee set out that when the defendant complied with the discovery order it would be found that Mr. Reilly's evidence was not very material.

The replying affidavit of Mr. Reilly set out that Dr. Hewat was not a local director of the Gas Company. He was not leaving for England on the company's business. No coal tar had been supplied to Nuttalls since the 2nd July, 1904, or to any other competing firm.

Mr. Schreiner for the applicants (defendants in the action); Mr. W. P. Buchanan for respondents.

Mr. Buchanan pointed out that Mr. Reilly himself had admitted that he attended a meeting of shareholders and criticised the balance-sheet. There was no reason why it could not be arranged to take his evidence on commission.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Perhaps he would not be able to undergo cross-examination at your hands?]

Mr. Buchanan said he could not see how he could be very hard on Mr. Reilly. He was able to give help in filing the plea, and moreover, all the facts of the case must be in the hands of his attorneys. There were plenty of officials who knew the affairs of the company, and he did not see how Mr. Reilly's evidence was material to the case.

De Villiers, C.J.: If I thought that a postponement of the case would seriously prejudice the plaintiffs I certainly would not consent to it, but it appears to me there is no reason to fear any prejudice from a postponement for about three months. It is not alleged that the defendant company is not well able to pay any damages that may be awarded for past and future breaches. It is not alleged that the plaintiff company is in any serious or immediate want of the money. Therefore, I consider three months' postponement cannot seriously prejudice the plaintiffs. The defendants allege that it is absolutely necessary to have Mr. Reilly's evidence in person, and that the medical evidence is to the effect that he is in such a state of nervous prostration he could not give his evidence—such evidence as he would if in a proper state of health. Under the circumstances, the Court will grant the postponement. There is also a practical consideration which should not be lost sight of. For instance, it is not likely this case will be heard before the November term owing to the state of the list. If the case were set down even now, it is not likely it would be heard, and the chances are it would be postponed until the November term. Upon the whole, the Court is of opinion that the case should be postponed until the first Tuesday in November, and the costs of this application will be costs in the cause.

KELLY AND CO. V. HEERMANN.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved as an unopposed motion for the appointment of a commission to take evidence of certain witnesses in the Transvaal.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan, who appeared for the plaintiff, suggested that the commission should be a joint one, and that it should be expedited.

Application granted, on condition that the defendant proceeds as expeditiously as possible with the commission, with leave to examine witnesses on both sides, the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Petersburg to act as commissioner; costs to be costs in the cause.

APPEAL CASE.

MABONA V BLACKBEARD. { 1901.
Aug. 4th.

Master and servant—Authority—
Delict—Damages.

The defendant being sued in a Magistrate's Court for the illegal seizure of the plaintiff's ox, raised the defence that he had committed the act in the performance of his duty as the servant of B.

Held, that as the act complained of was in its nature a tort or delict against a third person, the defendant was liable whether or not liability also attached to his master.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Resident Magistrate of Middle-drift, in which the plaintiff's case was dismissed, because he sued the defendant's servant instead of the master.

From the record in the Court below it appeared that the applicant summoned one William Blackbeard to recover a certain ox, valued at £18 10s. The defendant put in a plea that he was the wrong person to be sued, as he was merely acting on behalf of Henry Blackbeard, in whose employ he was engaged as a clerk. The evidence of Wm. Blackbeard showed that the plaintiff was indebted to Henry Blackbeard in the sum of £10, and he took the ox in question. The Magistrate dismissed the case, because he held that the defendant was not the right person to be sued.

Mr. Close for the appellant. Respondent in default.

Mr. Close: The Magistrate has assumed that if a servant commits a tort only the master and not the servant is liable. The master is not always liable for torts committed by his servant. Here the servant was acting outside the scope of his authority. See Pothier on Obligations (p. 463). As to the English law see Broomes Legal Maxims (p. 843), where he treats of the maxim Respondent superior. With regard to Colonial cases, see Binda v. Colonial Government (5 Juta. 284). A man may at his own choice elect to sue either the tort-feasor or his employer. The case should be remitted back to the Magistrate for trial on the merits; into which he does not appear to have entered.

De Villiers, C.J.: For the purpose of this case, it must be assumed that the seizure of the ox was an illegal seizure. The seizure was effected by the defendant, and he is liable for this illegal act of his. The Magistrate seems to have been somewhat misled by the law, which allows the master, under certain circumstances, to be sued for the torts of his servant. Where the servant acts within the scope of his authority, the matter is liable, but the fact that the master is liable does not free the servant from liability. He can only lawfully obey the lawful commands of his master, and if he commits an act which in its very nature is a tort or delict against a third person, he is equally liable for damages to such person. The principles laid down by Voet (17-1-6) as to mandatories are equally applicable to servants. The ox was seized according to the summons, on the plaintiff's property, and if the facts are there correctly stated the defendant should have known that he was doing a wrongful act. The Magistrate, therefore, erred in allowing the plea in abatement, and the appeal must be allowed with costs in this Court. The case will be remitted to the Magistrate to be decided on its merits, and the costs below will be costs in the cause to be decided by the Magistrate.

LONDON AND WESTMINSTER BANK AND OTHERS V. RECEIVERS OF THE GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAY AND OTHERS, AND OFFICIAL LIQUIDATOR OF THE GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAY V. RECEIVERS OF THE GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAY AND OTHERS.

Mr. McGregor (with him Mr. W. P. Buchanan) was for the applicants, Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington), was for the first respondents, and Mr. Close (with him Mr. Bisset), was for the respondent Hills.

Mr. McGregor said the application was for leave to appeal to the Privy Council against a recent decision of the Supreme Court. As the appeal was likely to be delayed for a couple of years, he thought the Court might give some expression of opinion as to the distribution of the funds.

De Villiers, C.J., said there was no application to that effect before the Court. An application at any future time would be considered, but there would only be leave granted at present, subject to the ordinary conditions, to appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. Schreiner pointed out that there had been absolution from the instance in the previous cases, and he thought his clients should have their costs in the meanwhile.

De Villiers, C.J., said the Court could order execution as to costs, when security could be given.

Mr. Schreiner thought the appeal should be expedited. It ought not to be left hanging over.

De Villiers, C.J.: We have no control over the Privy Council. They may expedite it as much as they like, but it won't be heard for two years.

Ex parte SAVAGE AND SONS, LTD.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for an order authorising the registration of a certain bond in the name of the applicants. In 1898 the applicants took over the business then carried on by Wm. Savage and Sons, but a certain bond for £10,000 remained unregistered under the name of the old firm. It was through a mistake of an articled clerk that the bond was not registered in the Deeds Office, King William's Town.

Mr. Schreiner: The bond would have been registered at King William's Town but for the necessary delay. We now wish to have the new bond registered under Ord. 3 of 1827.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The only question is whether notice ought not to be given to Vrede and Sons.]

There is now no Port Elizabeth firm of that name.

A rule was granted, calling on Wm. Savage and Sons, of East London, to show cause on the last day of term why a. order should not be granted as prayed, the firm named to be informed that if they did not appear to show cause, there would be no costs.

HUMPEL V. HUMPEL.

Dr. Greer moved on behalf of the plaintiff—the wife—for removal of the trial to the Circuit Court at King William's Town.

The Court granted the order, subject to notice being given to respondent, who is at present confined in the Pretoria Gaol.

TRIAL CAUSES.

COHOON V. COHOON.

{ 1904.
Aug. 5th.

This was an action brought by Amelia Kathleen Cohoon, of East London, against her husband, supposed to be in Johannesburg, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a judicial separation, with maintenance at the rate of £10 a month. Mr. McGregor appeared for the plaintiff; the defendant had been barred from pleading.

Amelia Kathleen Cohoon (the plaintiff) gave evidence. She said she was born in this colony. On the 10th October, 1894, she was married to the defendant at the Church of the Immaculate Conception, in Johannesburg. She was then a hospital nurse, and her husband was a guard in the service of the C.G.R. They were married in community of property. They first lived in Johannesburg for two months, and afterwards at Viljoen's Drift, where they lived four years. Afterwards they resided at Kroonstad for some months. Then they went to Port Elizabeth, and resided there six months. After that the defendant left for Beira, where he had got a position as guard on the railway. Witness went to Durban with him, where it was arranged that he should send or come for her. She stayed there for 12 or 18 months. He only once communicated with her, and he then sent her £2. Witness supported herself by nursing and assisting in a shop. She saw him about 12 months after he had gone to Beira; they remained together at Durban for six months. The defendant deserted her at East London close upon three years ago; witness was now engaged in nursing.

By the Court: The defendant would be able to pay her £10 a month. She did not know where the defendant was. He was in Johannesburg when she last heard of him. She would be satisfied if he paid her £5 a month.

Decree of restitution granted, with costs, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 15th September, failing which, rule to issue calling upon defendant to show cause on the 20th October why a judicial separation should not be granted, with £5 a month for maintenance, until a further order of Court, personal service to be effected, if possible, failing which, one publication in the "Johannesburg Star."

Postea (October 20th). The rule was amended and the return day extended to November 30th. Defendant to show cause on December 12th.

Postea (December 12th). The rule was made absolute.

MIHALY V. MOSKOVIK.

Fraud on mortgagee—Bogus receipt.

This was an action brought by Mina Mihal, a widow, carrying on business as a general merchant at Wynberg, against her son-in-law, Wm. Moskovik, builder and speculator, of Wynberg, to recover certain debt.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff lent and advanced to the defendant sums amounting in all to £215, and that the defendant had purchased and the plaintiff had sold and delivered articles of general merchandise for £10 11s. 2d. The defendant had repaid £60, and the plaintiff had demanded the balance of £155 from him, but this he neglected and refused to pay. The plaintiff therefore claimed payment of £155, balance of capital of loans, and of £10 11s. 2d., price of goods sold and delivered, together with interest a tempore morae, alternative relief, and costs of suit.

In his plea, the defendant said that he received a sum of £180 from the plaintiff for safe custody, but as to the smaller sums, which went to make up the balance of the £215, he said that he supplied goods to the plaintiff. He had tendered to the plaintiff the balance of the money that she handed to him for safe custody, after he had previously returned £60 to her. She refused the tender. He prayed that the claim should be dismissed. For a claim in reconvention, the defendant said the plaintiff owed him a sum of £194 14s. for work and labour done, materials supplied, and cash advanced at her special instance and request. He claimed the said sum of £194 14s., together with interest a tempore morae, alternative relief, and costs of suit.

Mr. Buchanan (with him Mr. Sutton) was for the plaintiff; Mr. Percy Jones was for the defendant.

Mr. Buchanan said that the plaintiff's contention was that the defendant owed her £166; defendant admitted that he owed her that amount, but said that she owed him a larger amount. He submitted that the onus of proof was on the defendant.

Evidence was then called for the defendant.

Wm. Moskovik (the defendant) said he was a builder residing at Wynberg, plaintiff being his mother-in-law. At the time plaintiff and her other daughter, Sarah, were staying with witness and his wife. The plaintiff came out in May, 1903. While they were living together certain money amounting to £180 was handed to his wife for safe custody, the money was paid into his account in the bank, and the deposit slip was entered in the plaintiff's name, so that they would know how much was hers. He did not open a separate account for the plaintiff. He erected a building for the plaintiff the price being £150. About two months after he deposited the money she asked him to let her have £60, he drew this amount and handed it to one Hirsch, upon Mrs. Mihaly's instructions. As to the balance of £120, about the commencement of September she hired a shop at £10 a month in Main-road, Wynberg, taking with her her other daughter, Sarah. The plaintiff took £20 for rent and furniture;

witness's wife gave her the money. Sarah had some ground in Constantia-road, and the plaintiff talked about building a shop on the land, but nothing then came of the matter. This was before he made the payment of £20. Witness said he could not erect the building for £120, and plaintiff said she could get somebody to do the work for that amount. He handed her a cheque for £120, but she declined to accept it, and he thereupon destroyed the cheque. In September plaintiff and her daughter left him, and lived at the shop in the Main-road. He got some timber for the shelves at the shop on behalf of the plaintiff, and spent £5 14s. There were no counters in the shop, and plaintiff asked him to lend her two that he had in his shop. He lent her two scales, glass jars, and a dressmaking figure. These had not been returned to him, and, as a matter of fact, had been sold by the plaintiff, when she gave up the shop. He valued these goods at £12. Witness stood security to the merchants for £50 on behalf of the plaintiff. He withdrew subsequently. In October the plaintiff approached him with a view of building a shop on the vacant ground, according to a modified plan drawn by his brother. In the meantime he had bought a portion of the old Barracks in Cape Town, that he had to pull down within a specified time. The plaintiff pressed him to proceed with her building, but he refused to do so, and she then said that, unless he built it, he must return her money. He gave her a cheque for £100, but this was not drawn against his account. He had no communication with the plaintiff's daughter as to the building. About Christmas time he had finished at the Barracks, and the plaintiff approached him again in regard to the building. He had some good old material, and he agreed to erect the building for £150, for the plaintiff, on her daughter's ground. He had £100 in his possession, and it was agreed that the plaintiff should pay him the balance in two instalments. He erected the building, and instalments were paid to his wife of £30, £2, and £3. He had certain groceries from plaintiff in lieu of the payment of the balance. Plaintiff let the shop, and house for £6 a month. The incoming tenant wanted counters, verandah and other things, and witness put in a partition and counter on the plaintiff's instructions at a charge of £7. He claimed that there was a balance due to him of £29 2s. 10d.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Sarah Mihaly was the wife of a man living in Hungary. In October, 1902, he sold her a portion of ground in Constantia-road for £650. The deeds said that she was to give him a mortgage bond for £350. She did not pay him the £300. She had paid him the £350. The bond was in favour of a Mrs.

Laurie. He had not claimed the difference of £300 from Sarah Mihaly. Sarah Mihaly was living at the house with him, and his children, while his wife was in England. He denied that improper relations took place between Sarah and himself, or that he was the father of the child Sarah had given birth to. Witness denied that he ever admitted being the father of the child, or that he had promised to build a house for Sarah. He admitted that he paid Mrs. Bouchall for taking charge of Sarah. At the time of this occurrence, witness had over £300 in the bank. The counters were worth more than £12. Witness put in new counters, for which he claimed £7. It did not surprise him to know that they sold them for 26s. On the 1st March witness gave a receipt to Mihaly for £350, as the amount due on the building. He did not receive that amount. He only got £250.

[De Villiers, C.J.: This receipt was given to enable the plaintiff to get a mortgage on the property.]

Yes.

[De Villiers, C.J.: And this is simply an attempt to defraud others. It is a scandalous fraud. I see the receipt is made out in the name of "S. Mihaly."]

Subsequently Mr. Jones said he thought he would be able to throw a little light on the case. The defendant said he had been approached by the plaintiff and Sarah Mihaly to enable them to raise money on mortgage, and in consequence the receipt for £350 was given.

[De Villiers, C.J.: This man is a party to the attempted fraud.]

Mr. Jones said he would like to hear what the plaintiff had to say.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If this man is a party to the fraud he will not get a penny.]

If your lordship thinks that, of course I will have to withdraw. I knew of this receipt before the case came into court. The defendant really did this because he was asked to do so by the women.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If a couple of women who know nothing of business can induce a business man like the defendant to act like this, I look upon him as a criminal.]

Then, my lord, there is no good going on with the case.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You can do so. But after his statement about that receipt, I cannot give judgment in his favour.]

This receipt was given to enable the women to raise money on the property. The defendant says the property really cost him more than he agreed to build it for.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is not the receipt for what he built the place for.]

Let us ask the plaintiff is she paid this amount.

[De Villiers, C.J.: No, she has not. The defendant is bound to this receipt, and he admits being a party to a fraud.]

Then I fear the counter-claim must drop, and we must submit to what your lordship will rule. Your lordship will have to make a ruling as to costs.

De Villiers, C.J., said he had to decide for whom the house was built. The defendant's case was that it was built for Mrs. Mihaly, and the plaintiff's was that it was built for Sarah. He did not want to hear the present witness further cross-examined with regard to this receipt.

In the face of your lordship's remarks, I do not see how I can go on with the counter-claim.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is no reason why you should not go on with your case.]

With your lordship's permission, I shall cross-examine the plaintiff and Sarah Mihaly as to the circumstances under which this agreement was signed.

Annie Muskovik, wife to the defendant, corroborated the direct evidence given by him.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Witness went on a trip to Hungary. When she returned, Sarah gave birth to a child. Witness denied admitting to Mrs. Bouchall that her husband was the father of the child. Witness wanted to send her sister back to Hungary, but she would not go, because she said she had as much claim on defendant as witness had.

Mr. Jones objected to the questions with regard to the adultery, as he contended they had nothing to do with the case. There had already been an action in the Magistrate's Court, in which Sarah Mihaly claimed £20 from a person for spreading the report that defendant was father of the child.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the question as to whom the property was built for was influenced by that point.

Makri Moskovik, civil engineer, brother of the defendant, stated that he made the plan produced for Mrs. Mina Mihaly. The building was to be for Mrs. Mihaly. His brother offered to erect the building cheaper than witness.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He did not know that the building was for Sarah.

Mr. Jones closed his case.

Mr. Buchanan called the plaintiff.

Mrs. Mina Mihaly, who stated that when she arrived here in May, 1903, she had £180, which she handed over to the defendant. In August Moskovik came down to see her about the shop in the Main-road. The defendant said that he would build a shop for her daughter, and allow her a certain amount of money per month, in order to make amends for his misdeed. He had only paid £60 out of the £180 belonging to witness. She lent her daughter £30, but that had nothing to do with the purchase price of the building.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: The defendant admitted that he was the father of the child. She denied that Mrs. Moskovik gave her £20 to buy furniture and to pay the rent. Her daughter received the rent of the shop. She denied that the house was to be erected for her for £150, and that she should pay £30 when the building was window high. She did not ask him for the £120, so that she could get somebody else to build the house. She did not give goods because she could not pay the account on the building.

Maggie Williams, a servant, stated she heard Mrs. Mihaly ask Muskovik for her money, and Moskovik told her in Yiddish that he would give it to her soon, and that he would build a house for Sarah.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: Witness understood Yiddish.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I will not hear any more evidence.]

Mr. Jones said he would like to cross-examine Sarah Mihaly.

His lordship consented.

Sarah Mihaly (examined by Mr. Buchanan) said the house was built for her by Muskovik, because he got her into trouble. He gave her the receipt produced, and only paid him £15 for furniture and fixtures. Witness did not ask him to make the receipt out for £350.

Cross-examined by Mr. Jones: The receipt for £15 was only for fixtures and work he did after the building was completed. Witness did not try to raise money on mortgage on the place. Witness bought the land on which the house was erected from defendant for £300. Witness, when she went to Worcester, left the receipt and transfer with Mrs. Muskovik, and when she returned they were lost. Defendant told her she need not bother about the receipt, as he would not ask for the money again. Witness sued Mrs. Cohen in the Magistrate's Court for defamation of character. Mrs. Cohen said witness was living with Muskovik; that was not a fact, as she had not lived with him.

By the Court: Defendant was the father of her child. She was a married woman. Her husband lived in Hungary, and she left him because he ill-treated her.

Counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff in this case claims £155, money given by the plaintiff to defendant, and a sum of £10 11s. 2d for goods supplied. The defendant admits having got £180 in his hands for the purpose, he said, of depositing it in the bank on behalf of the plaintiff. He has also received divers sums of money, amounting to £35. As to the shop account, the defendant seemed to doubt the accuracy of it, but he did not dispute it. That would make, altogether, a sum of £225 11s. 2d., received by the defendant from the plaintiff. These amounts having come into the hands of the plaintiff, it lay on him to show that he had returned the money or given the equivalent for the money, by his services. He has clearly proved that £60 has been repaid. In regard to the other items, such as timber, scales, counters, etc., I am inclined to allow £5. As to the other sums which the defendant claims to set off, and which by claim in reconvention, he seeks to recover from the plaintiff, the decision of the Court on these items depends on the question whether the house in Constantia-road was built by the defendant for the plaintiff, or for her daughter. The plaintiff was the mother-in-law of the defendant, and Sarah was his sister-in-law. It seems that during his wife's absence in England, Sarah had lived in his house, and had become pregnant. I am quite satisfied from the evidence given by Sarah that the defendant was the cause. That being so, it seems to me an extremely likely thing that the defendant would wish to assist her. It is only to be hoped that that was his desire, after having brought her into that condition. She previously bought land from him, and she managed to raise a sum of £350 on mortgage, and as to the balance of £300 she said she paid that to the defendant. But that point is immaterial for the purpose of the present action. The point is that the land and buildings belonged to Sarah Mihaly, and the presumption is that anyone in assisting in building a house on that land assisted the person who owned it, and not anybody else. That is the presumption in the present case. There was also the probability that as the defendant had been the cause of the sister-in-law being in that unfortunate condition he would assist her. Those circumstances would, in my opinion, have been sufficient to justify the Court in holding that the defendant had undertaken to build the house for Sarah and not for his mother-in-law. But the evidence of the plaintiff, is confirmed by the document which has been produced, dated the 18th March, 1904, which showed an indebtedness to the defendant, not by the plaintiff, but by Sarah of £350 for buildings and £15 for counters, etc. The receipt stated that the amount of £350 had been received from Sarah. The defendant had this document put into his hands, and said, "Oh, this was a mere make believe." According to his own account, this document was drawn up for the purpose of inducing the mortgagee to lend a further sum of money to Sarah on the security of the property, and he added that these women had perjured him until he gave it. I utterly disbelieve the story. I do not believe that a man in the position of the defendant—a man who admitted that he had managed to get properties so as to have landed properties rated at £23,000—would be such a fool as to be misguided by two women, one an aged mother-in-law and the other a sister-in-law, whom he had seduced. I consider his action in that matter a fraudulent one. It was an attempt on his part to enable this poor wretched woman to defraud other creditors, and I will bind him down to that document in which he admitted that he built for Sarah, and not for his mother-in-law. He had endeavoured at one time to defraud others, but now tried to defraud his mother-in-law. The judgment of the Court is for £225 11s. 2d., less £60 received on account, with costs.

TOOCH V. LE ROUX.

Lessor and lessee—Cancellation of mutual liability—Construction.

By agreement of lease the lessor was to be allowed to make improvements on the leased premises and to deduct the rent from the amount thus expended. While the lease was running, the lessor and lessee mutually agreed to the cancellation of the contract of lease, and reciprocally agreed to release each other from any further liability in respect thereof.

Held, that the effect of such release was to discharge the lessor from any claim for expenditure on improvements made before the date of cancellation.

This was an argument on exceptions. The declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff and the defendant both reside in the division of Oudtshoorn.

2. By a written agreement of lease dated the 14th February, 1901, the defendant let to one William J. A. Beckett, certain land and buildings known as "The Toll," situated in the division of Oudtshoorn, for a term of five years, commencing on the 1st January, 1901, and ending on the 31st December, 1905, at a rent of £10 per month; the plaintiff craves leave to refer to the several conditions of the said lease, when produced at the trial.

3. By one of the said conditions, it was agreed that the said Beckett should effect certain specified improvements to the said land and buildings, and should advance all the cost and expense of such improvements, and that for the repayment of such cost and expense, the said rent should be considered as a payment on account, and as a set-off until such cost and expense should be liquidated.

4. In pursuance of the said agreement, the said Beckett occupied the said land and buildings, and effected specified improvements thereto, at a cost and expense amounting at the end of August, 1903, to a total sum of £602 2s. 1d.

5. On the 27th August, 1903, the said lease was cancelled by mutual consent between the defendant and the said Beckett, by reason whereof there remained due and owing by the defendant to the said Beckett the sum of £279 16s. 1d., being the said sum of £602 2s. 1d., less the sum of £322 6s., rent for two years and eight months, as will appear more fully from a detailed account rendered to the defendant, which the plaintiff craves leave to produce at the trial.

6. Thereafter, on or about the 15th February, 1904, the said Beckett, for valuable consideration, lawfully ceded and assigned to the plaintiff, and for the plaintiff's benefit, all his right and title in and to the said debt of £279 16s. 1d., owed to the said Beckett by the defendant.

7. All things have happened, and all conditions have been fulfilled, necessary to entitle the plaintiff to claim from the defendant the said sum of £279 16s. 1d., but the defendant refuses to pay the same, or any part thereof.

Wherefore plaintiff prays for: (a) Judgment in the sum of £279 16s. 1d.; (b) alternative relief; (c) costs of suit.

Defendant's plea stated:

1. He admits paragraph 1.

2. As to paragraphs 2 and 3, plaintiff admits that on the 14th February, 1901, he entered into an agreement of lease in writing with W. J. A. Beckett, otherwise as to the true terms and conditions thereof, defendant craves leave to refer this Honourable Court to a copy of the said lease.

3. Defendant denies that the cost of the improvements at the end of August, 1903, amounted to £602 2s. 1d., but otherwise admits paragraph 4.

4. Defendant admits that on the 27th August, 1903, the lease was cancelled by mutual consent of the parties thereto, but otherwise denies paragraph 5. Defendant says that the cancellation was made in the terms set forth in the indorsement written on the original lease, and signed by the lessor and the lessee.

5. According to the true construction of the provision in the said indorsement that the lessor and lessee should be released from all further liability in respect of the lease, the defendant contends that he is not liable to the late lessee or to the plaintiff for the amount claimed in the present action or any part thereof, by reason that such amount if due was due at the time of the said cancellation, and liability therefor was discharged by the said indorsement.

6. Defendant has no knowledge of the allegations in paragraph 6, and does not admit the same. Defendant had no notice or knowledge of the said cession.

7. Defendant denies paragraph 7. And for a further plea, should this Honourable Court not uphold the defendant's contention as set out in paragraph 5 above, the defendant says:

8. He craves leave to refer to paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 6, 7, above.

9. In terms of the lease agreement it became and was the duty of W. J. A. Beckett, as a condition precedent to produce to defendant vouchers for the work done, but he has wrongfully and unlawfully failed and neglected to do this, and defendant contends that any action by Beckett or by plaintiff to recover money due in respect of the alleged balance owing by defendant is premature until the said duty has been complied with.

10. The defendant denies that the improvements and alterations have been effected upon the cheapest possible scale as required by the aforesaid agreement of lease.

11. The defendant is ready and willing and hereby tenders to debate the accounts and to pay such sum of money as may be found upon such debate to be due.

The following is a copy of the lease: Agreement made and entered into between Gabriel J. P. le Roux, jun., hereinafter called the lessor, and William J. A. Beckett, hereinafter called the lessee, both of Rietvley, in the division of Oudtshoorn.—Whereas the lessor agrees to lease certain business premises known as The Toll, or Rietvley, for a term of five years, commencing 1st January, 1901, and ending 31st December, 1905, upon the following terms and conditions: The lessee to pay an annual rental of one hundred and twenty pounds (£120) sterling per annum, which sum shall be a payment on account of certain improvements to the premises now in occupation of the lessee, viz., to build a bar room, take down the present room used as a bar, to continue the verandah to end of stoep facing the stables, to build a wall suitable to carry on the business of a bar for the use of coloured persons, to erect bedrooms in open space between present dwelling-house and cottage, and to carry out the verandah as far as the present outside bedrooms, all cost and expense of such work to be advanced by the said lessee, and for the repayment of such outlay the monthly rent of ten pounds (£10) sterling per month shall be as a set-off until such expense has been liquidated. The lessee agrees and promises to have these alterations done in a proper and workmanlike manner, and upon the cheapest possible scale, and shall produce for the information of the said lessor vouchers for the work done at the expiration of this agreement. And in consideration of this outlay the lessee shall have the option of renewing this lease for a further period of five years, computed from the 1st day of January, 1906, at a rental of one hundred and fifty pounds (£150) per annum, provided that the lessee retains the services of Mr. D. W. Beckett. And the lessor agrees that the lessee shall have grazing rights on his farm Rietvley for five sheep or goats, two horses, two head of cattle, firewood and water for domestic purposes free of charge. And it is further understood between the contracting parties that the premises shall be handed to the lessee in good order, and that at the expiration of this lease the property shall be handed to the lessor in like good order. We, the undersigned, hereby mutually agree to the cancellation of the above contract, and reciprocally release each other from any further liability in respect thereof.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers for plaintiff.
Mr. Close for defendant.

Plaintiff excepted to paragraph 6 of the plea as bad in law, vague and embarrassing, and constituting no answer to plaintiff's claim.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

De Villiers, C.J.: Under the contract of lease, the plaintiff agreed to let to Beckett premises upon the following terms: "That the lessee should pay the annual rental of £20 per annum, which sum shall be payment on account of certain improvements to the premises now in occupation of the lessee, who is to build or make certain additions, and for the repayment of such outlay a monthly rent of £10 per month shall be as stated until such expense has been liquidated." After this lease had run for some time, and after Beckett had made certain improvements, a cancellation was effected in the following terms: "We, the undersigned, hereby mutually agree to the cancellation of the above contract, and reciprocally agree to release each other from any further liability in respect of it." This is signed on behalf of the lessee and the lessor. In my opinion these words have only one meaning, and that is, that not only is the contract to be cancelled, but there is to be no claim by the lessee for improvements made before the cancellation of the lease. If the words "future liability" had been used, there would, no doubt, have been considerable force in the argument for the plaintiff. But the words actually used are "further liability," which are wide enough to include not only future liability, but liability already reciprocally incurred. The contract itself did not contemplate any payment by the plaintiff for improvements beyond the deduction of rent. The contract having been cancelled, rent was no longer payable, and as the lessee was a party to the cancellation, he could not thereafter claim the right to recover the amount previously expended by him on improvements. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the exceptions must be overruled, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

REX V. CHARTERIS. { 1904.
 { Aug. 8th.

Act 36 of 1902—Living on earnings of prostitution—Bribery—Interpretation of Statute.

A public officer charged with the duty of prosecuting or detecting offenders who corruptly accepts money or other valuable consideration for refraining from the performance of such duty is guilty of an offence at Common Law, but is not liable to prosecution for living on the earnings of prostitution in contravention of the 33rd section of Act 36 of 1902.

This was an appeal from a conviction by the A.R.M. of the Cape. From the record of the Court below it appeared that the appellant had been convicted of a contravention of section 33, sub-section 1 (a) of the Act 36, 1902, in that on certain specified dates he, being a male person, did wrongfully, unlawfully, and knowingly live wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution, and received from one Max Harris and divers prostitutes divers sums of money, which he well knew were the earnings of prostitution, and which sums of money he did wrongfully and unlawfully convert to his own use and treat as part of his own property. The appeal was brought on two grounds: (1) that the conviction was against the weight of evidence; (2) that the facts alleged by the witnesses for the prosecution do not in law constitute a criminal charge.

Mr. Van Zyl appeared for the appellant; Mr. Nightingale was for the Crown.

Mr. Van Zyl said that, as to the first ground of appeal, he would like to go over the explanation given by the accused, and also by other witnesses for the defence of the comparatively large sums of money which the accused had in the bank. He thought that was a very important circumstance, and, at any rate, it was a very suspicious circumstance, and might go a long way towards appearing to corroborate the evidence given by witnesses for the prosecution, and he submitted that once that matter had been satisfactorily explained, their lordships would be both very loth to uphold the conviction, and it was practically based entirely upon the evidence of accomplices, of people whose living was entirely made out of prostitution. In the first instance, he would like to draw the attention of the Court to the fact that the Crown brought forward no evidence to show that Charteris was a man of extravagant habits, whereas the evidence brought for the defence showed that he was a man of a saving turn. Counsel proceeded to quote from the evidence of certain witnesses for the defence as to the accused's extreme carelessness over money matters. Proceeding, he dealt with the accused's sources of income since he came out from Glasgow in 1901. When he arrived, the accused had £40 or £50 in his pockets. Then his salary commenced from the time he left Glasgow, on the 22nd December, 1900. The defendant got £90 a year, together with a plague allowance of £3 a month, and also an allowance of 30s. a month for arresting Kafirs in possession of liquor. When the plague allowance was stopped, accused's salary was increased from £90 to £110 a year, together with a plain-clothes allowance of £12. This he drew until the 27th December, 1901. Then he got £125, with £12 plain-clothes allowance. In May, 1902, he became sergeant, and got an increase to £150, with £12 plain-clothes allowance. This he drew until May, 1903, when he got another increase of £10, and so he was drawing from the police force a sum of £172 a year. He said that on a salary of £172 a year he was able to save £100 a year. In his evidence, he contended that he was able to save during the time he was in the police force £280 out of his earnings, which amounted to £516. Then they had it on record that accused was a great frequenter of the racecourse, and that he had the reputation of being a very lucky man there. While he was in the police force, he must have made £90 a year out of betting. It was also brought out in evidence that policemen got tips that other people, perhaps, had not always the privilege of obtaining.

Then there was the question of the carting partnership, which the accused said that he had had a profit of £100 from.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Have you been able to connect these payments with the sums deposited by him in the Savings Bank and the Standard Bank?]

No my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: For instance, did he get a cheque?]

No, the money was paid to him in cash. Your lordship will see that the amounts put down in the book are not very big, most of them are £5, £6, or sometimes £10 a month. Proceeding, counsel said it was very difficult to trace these amounts in the bank, as it appeared from the evidence of others that the accused was in the habit of allowing money to accumulate in his box, and he also seemed to have lent a good deal of money to other people. Then it appeared that he received profits amounting to £40 or £50 upon stock, so that from the partnership he might be said to have received about £140 or £150. It was true that the appellant's name did not appear in the books, but, considering that he was a member of the police force, it was quite consistent with what they might expect that he would not figure in the books. Taking all the sources of income that he had named, counsel submitted that they had more than amply accounted for the money that Charteris had in the bank. Coming to the charges made against the accused by the various witnesses for the prosecution, counsel said he would like to draw their lordship's attention to the fact that out of the 23 witnesses who gave evidence for the Crown, there were eight who gave evidence as to protection money being paid to and received by Charteris in connection with the profits, and in connection with women soliciting upon the streets. They were all interested witnesses, they were people who were carrying on this immoral traffic in Cape Town, people who certainly could not be considered to be actuated by any desire to see the police of Cape Town do their duty unflinchingly, people who could not have any interest in seeing Cape Town become a moral place, people who would thrive upon the immorality of the city, and people who must naturally be only too glad to be given an opportunity to show the police that they could, by making a strong combination against any one policeman, swear him into gaol, and who had an interest in terrorising the police force. Those were the eight witnesses who spoke as to protection or profits from women in the streets, and especially Harris, who naturally was anxious to improve his position, and who rightly or wrongly was under the impression, if he could bring a case against the police, that he would have some chance of his sentence being in some way modified. All the other seven witnesses were under the influence of Max Harris, and, what was more, they must all be regarded as accomplices in this case. Counsel thought our law was very clear on this point, that the accused ought not to be convicted upon the evidence of an accomplice, or of accomplices, unless there were very strong corroborative evidence. Counsel quoted the case of Queen v. Fixeboaz and Others (3, High Court, p. 495).

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that the law as laid down in that case had not been upheld in this Court, because the Ordinance was quite clear, and said that it should be competent to convict on the evidence of an accomplice, the only condition being that there should be independent evidence that the crime was committed. Only this very term the point had arisen, and the Court had decided to the contrary.

Mr. Van Zyl said that it might perhaps not be worth while referring to the case of Queen v. De Kock (1, Roscoe, p. 441).

De Villiers, C.J., said that it would be quite competent for counsel to argue that there was no evidence that Charteris had lived on the proceeds of prostitution, apart from the evidence of accomplices.

Mr. Van Zyl said that he would take up that position. Proceeding, he referred to the relations that existed between Harris and the accused, and submitted that it was an unfortunate necessity of the Act that friendly relations should exist between the police, and such persons as Harris in order to bring home cases under the Act. He would not deny, however, that the relations between Harris and Charteris seemed to have been unduly friendly, more so than the duties of Charteris strictly required. It was an unfortunate fact that the police were to a great extent dependent upon persons like Max Harris and others in these cases. Harris naturally wanted to prove to the women that he was on intimate terms with Charteris. It was for their lordships to decide between what might have been an unfortunate or a criminal intimacy, and counsel contended there was no evidence as to the latter. With regard to the gambling incident, he did not think that his learned friend would deny that certain policemen had particular duties. The fact that Charteris did not report a gambling-house did not justify the Crown in drawing the inference that he was concerned or interested in the gambling-house. The non-trapping of houses was a suspicious circumstance, but the evidence of Inspector Osberg and Inspector Clark went to show that the orders received from a superior officer were, that if a house was quiet and orderly, it was not to be interfered with. Therefore, many of these houses were allowed to go on without being trapped, and counsel contended that the fact that certain houses were not trapped did not amount to very much. If Charteris sent Home £600 to Scotland, there must have been some trace in the bank. All the circumstances which might be taken as corroborative did not prove that this crime was committed by the prisoner. The circumstances were merely suspicious, and some of them very suspicious indeed, but the prosecution must procure the strongest possible corroboration before the story could be believed. On the next point, the facts alleged by the witnesses for the prosecution did not constitute the crime the prisoner was charged with. Counsel submitted that the Act contemplated people who had no other possible means of sustenance, or who depended for their livelihood on the earnings of prostitutes.

[De Villiers, C.J.: A man might be very wealthy and live in part on the proceeds of prostitution.]

Mr. Van Zyl submitted that the accused did not fall under the section, as he was earning a salary more than sufficient to maintain him. Even if the money was paid to Charteris, it did not amount to the charge that was preferred against him. According to the evidence of the witnesses for the prosecution, the moneys were paid to the accused, not as the proceeds of prostitution, but in order that he should not interfere with certain brothels. The section was clearly directed to a class of men who really lived with the prostitutes, but in the present case there was no proof that any of the prostitutes paid money to Charteris.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Can the money be traced from the prostitutes to Harris, and then to Charteris?]

I submit not. The money might have been paid to enable these people to carry on prostitution. Counsel submitted that the indictment was absolutely wrong, and that Charteris should have been indicted for bribery. The prisoner might have been indicted also under Section 30 of Act 12 of 1882.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Mr. Nightingale, direct your attention to the question as to the living on the proceeds of prostitution. Supposing a person about to embark on a career of prostitution goes to a detective and offers him £100 to protect her, and she never earns anything, should not the Crown prove that the money came actually from prostitutes to the person charged?]

Mr. Nightingale: I think that is proved by the evidence of Harris. The evidence was that he was in concert with Charteris for the protection of certain brothels. Harris made the necessary arrangements with the brothels, and the money was paid to Charteris.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing a person keeps a shop close to a brothel, and the prostitutes buy what they require, and he lives wholly on prostitution, would you say that comes under the Act?]

Mr. Nightingale: I submit not, my lord. There is lawful consideration in such a case. Counsel (continuing) said that in a matter of bribery, directly the money was put down after a tender was made, the crime was complete, whether the bribee repented or not. Harris said that Charteris knew that the money was paid out of the earnings of prostitutes. Charteris well knew the source from which it came, and the consideration was a wicked and an illegal one. The money went towards Charteris's sustenance, and in that way the Crown made it out that Charteris was living on the proceeds of prostitution.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose you would admit that primarily this section is directed against a different class of people? I suppose in every town there are these men who live with prostitutes and keep them as mistresses, and then others in the place pay part of what they earn. Is that not the class of people against whom the Act was primarily directed?]

On the other hand the statute by no means excludes the class of persons to which we allege Charteris belongs.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The point is, was the Act intended to meet a case of this kind. Should you not have prosecuted him for bribery or a contravention of police orders? Here's a policeman whose duty it is to see to the punishment of persons keeping brothels, and he receives money. Surely that is bribery?]

I don't know whether he is not guilty of both offences. If the money was appropriated in the manner they said it was by Charteris, then the Crown contended he came within the terms of the Statute.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I think the 3rd sub-section seems to give some explanation: "Where a male person is proved to live with or to be habitually in the company of prostitutes, and has no visible and honest means of support, he shall be deemed, unless he can satisfy the Court to the contrary, to be knowingly living on the proceeds of prostitution."]

Your lordship will see that the crime of Charteris is an infinitely worse class of crime, and I contend that the Act does not exclude such a person.

[De Villiers, C.J.: His infringement of the law is an infringement of a policeman's duty. He receives money for refraining from doing his duty, and although he gets the money from a tainted source, does that make him live on the proceeds of prostitution more than if he were a shopkeeper living on the proceeds of prostitution?]

He gives nothing at all for what he receives. The law won't recognise the unlawful crime of foregoing his duty as a consideration.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing these women had not got the money by prostitution; that they had got it honestly?]

Precisely the same argument in that event, my lord, would apply to these other people.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Just so; and that is why the Legislature found it necessary to make this sub-section 3. Harris's case was different: he was habitually in the company of the prostitute—in fact, he lived with her.]

If that was so, here was Harris, a man habitually in the company of prostitutes and a man who was habitually in the company of Charteris, and the evidence is that Charteris was habitually at this man's restaurant, a place frequented by prostitutes. If the Court is satisfied that Charteris received this money from Harris, then it must also be satisfied in accordance with Harris's direct statement, that when Charteris took this money he knew it had come from this tainted source; and in appropriating it to his own use, as the Crown alleged, he certainly has been guilty of an infringement of this Act, although he may also have been guilty of an infringement of his duty as a police official.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Have you traced any deposits made by Charteris in the Post Office or bank, so as to connect them with payments made in any way to him either by Max Harris or anyone else?]

I have attempted to do that, and I have further attempted to reconcile the deposits with the dates of various race meetings, and there is no correspondence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: My question was: Is there any correspondence with illegal payments made to Charteris?]

The evidence shows that Charteris did not always deposit money in the bank, but that he allowed it to accumulate in his box. Counsel went on to deal with the evidence relating to the moneys handled by Charteris.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What charges were preferred against Osberg?]

Osberg was to be tried for bribery, and also for an offence—a substantive offence, not an alternative—under this section.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He is not to be tried before the Magistrate, but by a jury?]

That is so, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why wasn't the same course adopted in both cases?]

Well: it is difficult for me to make any statement in the matter, my lord.

Mr. Nightingale subsequently stated that the reason why Osberg was to be tried by a jury was because the charges against him included bribery in connection with the sale of liquor. Such charges were not brought against Charteris, and that was the reason why he was summarily dealt with.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then Osberg is not charged with bribery in regard to this charge?]

De Villiers, C.J.: The appellant in this case has been charged with a contravention of the first sub-section of the 33rd section of Act 36 of 1902, in that he did knowingly live wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution. The charge is more fully stated in the summons: that he, the said Charteris, a sergeant in the police, being a male person, did wrongfully, unlawfully, and knowingly live wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution by wrongfully and unlawfully receiving from one Max Harris and others, and from divers prostitutes, on divers dates and occasions during the periods aforesaid, divers sums of money, which he well knew were the earnings of prostitution, and which sums of money he did wrongfully and unlawfully convert to his own use, and did treat as part of his own property.

As far as receiving money from prostitutes is concerned, there is no evidence whatever that on any single occasion the appellant received money from them. What has been proved in the case, taking the evidence as stating the facts, appears to me to amount to this: that the appellant received from Max Harris divers sums of money at different times in consideration of his refraining from taking steps against certain brothels or against certain prostitutes. He therefore received money for refraining from doing his duty as a police-constable, and for letting these prostitutes alone. But there appears to me to be no evidence that at any time he lived on the earnings of prostitution. In order to fully understand what the legislature meant by the offence of knowingly living wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution, it is well to consider the following sub-sections. The second sub-section says: "If it is made to appear to a resident magistrate, by information on oath, that there is reason to suspect that any house or place is used by a female for purposes of prostitution, and that any male person residing at or frequenting the house is living wholly or in part on the earnings of the prostitute, such magistrate may issue a warrant authorising any constable to enter and search the house, and to arrest that male person." Then comes the third sub-section: "Where a male person is proved to live with or to be habitually in the company of a prostitute, and has no visible and honest means of subsistence, he shall, unless he can satisfy the Court to the contrary, be deemed to be knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution." This third sub-section shows the strictness of proof required by the legislature. It is not sufficient that a male person is proved to live with or to be habitually in the company of a prostitute; but it must also be shown that he has no visible honest means of subsistence in order to lead to the presumption that he is knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution. Now, the law relating to the construction of penal provisions in statutes is thus fairly stated by Maxwell (interpretation of statutes): "The rule of strict construction requires that the language shall be so construed that no cases shall be held to fall within it which do not fall both within the reasonable meaning of its terms, and within the spirit and scope of the enactment." In my opinion the case of a person who has received bribes from a person not being a prostitute for refraining from prosecuting prostitutes does not fall within the reasonable meaning, spirit or scope of an enactment against living on the earnings of prostitution. The appellant was a sergeant of police, and if he took bribes for foregoing his duty he is liable to punishment under the 30th section of Act 12 of 1882. If that punishment is not adequate to the gravity of the appellant's offence, he is, in my opinion, liable to prosecution under the common law for taking bribes in consideration of refraining from doing his duty as a public officer appointed for the prosecution, detection, or punishment of offenders. But it would, in my opinion, be an unreasonable extension of the provisions of the 33rd section of the Act of 1902 to hold that it applies to cases like the present. The appeal must therefore be allowed, and the conviction quashed.

Buchanan, J.: The accused was tried before the Magistrate for contravening section 33 of what is known as the Morality Act, in knowingly living wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution. Very considerable evidence was led before the Magistrate, and after looking through the evidence carefully, I have no doubt that the Magistrate was justified in finding the prisoner guilty of the acts which were alleged against him. On appeal now, the first objection taken to the conviction was that the Magistrate's finding was against the weight of the evidence. I would clearly and distinctly state that, in my opinion the evidence fully justifies the finding of the Magistrate that the prisoner was guilty of the acts charged against him. I think also that there was ample evidence corroborating that of the accomplices to justify the conviction if that were the only ground of appeal. But the second objection taken was that the facts proved did not constitute a crime under this section, and it is here that I find a difficulty in this case. It would, I think, be straining the intention of the Legislature and the wording of the Act to make the improper misfeasance of duty on the part of the policeman a contravention of the provision, which prohibited persons from knowingly living wholly or in part upon the proceeds of prostitution. It is upon this construction of a penal act which I think it is the duty of the Court to construe in its strict terms that I think this conviction should be quashed. I do not say that the prisoner escapes from any of the consequences of his acts in consequence of the quashing of this conviction. There are, I think, other crimes which the appellant may be tried for, and the quashing of this conviction will be no bar to his prosecution for acts which may constitute some crime other than the contravention of the Act in question. I concur in quashing the present conviction.

Liquor Laws—Sale by retail— Liability of salesman.

This was an appeal against a decision of the A.R.M. of Simon's Town, by which the appellant was found guilty of selling by retail twelve small bottles of Castle stout and two bottles of sherry in a case from the wholesale store of William Gourlay and Co., and ordered to pay a fine of £30, or three months' imprisonment.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for the appellant, and Mr. Nightingale appeared for the Crown.

Mr. Gardiner said that the appeal was on the grounds that the conviction was not supported by the evidence, that the appellant was not liable for Gourlay and Co., and that there was no evidence to show that the liquor came from the store of Gourlay and Co. Counsel contended that there was no proof that Jones had anything to do with the sale, and there was no evidence to show that Jones was the only salesman. In addition, there was nothing to show that the cart which Parris was driving did not come from some of the other hotels, and it was significant that Parris was not called by the Crown as a witness.

Mr. Nightingale contended that, according to the evidence, Jones was something more than a salesman, as he was described as manager of Gourlay's wholesale store.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing Jones was taking a holiday, and another salesman sold it? It may be extremely probable that Jones did sell it, but where is the evidence.]

Mr. Nightingale admitted there was no evidence on that point, but the apparent defence raised in cross-examination was that this liquor was either got from the Masonic or the Central Hotels, which did not sell Castle stout.

[Buchanan, J.: Why didn't you call Parris to show it was not?]

It would have been better but it would have been very easy for those people to show—

[Buchanan, J.: Who is the onus on?]

The evidence goes to show that this liquor could not have been got from the other hotels, as they did not sell Castle beer or stout.

[Buchanan, J.: If the charge had been against Gourlay, you might have succeeded.]

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did anyone see Jones deliver the liquor to Parris that day?]

There is evidence that the cart was drawn up outside this place, and that the case of liquor was seen in the cart. I submit that it would have been easy for the defence to come forward and show exactly that the liquor was not obtained at that place.

De Villiers, C.J.: I am bound to say that, according to the evidence, it is extremely probable that Jones did deliver the liquor to Parris for the purpose of being conveyed to Mrs. Cheese, but a conviction is not to take place upon probabilities, but upon proof. The man Harry Parris, who delivered the liquor, would have been the best evidence if he received liquor from the appellant, and then delivered it to Mrs. Cheese. His evidence, no doubt, would have been conclusive, but he was not called for the prosecution. It is said, however, that the appellant was the manager of Gourlays, and therefore he must be assumed to have delivered the liquor, but it is quite within the range of possibility that Jones was not there that day at all, in which case Jones could not be punished for this act. It is a sound rule in the administration of justice that the best available evidence should be produced in support of the prosecution. There would have been considerable evidence against Gourlay and Co., because it is their place of business, and the presumption would have been that they authorised the sale. So far as the servant Jones is concerned, there is no evidence to connect him with this particular offence. The appeal must be allowed, and the conviction quashed.

Magistrate's finding on facts— Circumstantial evidence.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Resident Magistrate of Burghersdorp, by which the accused was convicted of stealing £35, the property of one Van Wyk, with whom he occupied the same room at the Jubilee Hotel.

Accused was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, with hard labour.

Mr. Burton (for the appellant) said that the appeal was brought on the ground that the evidence did not justify a conviction. The money was not found on the accused, and there was nothing to connect him with the affair, except his presence in the room. The accused had stated to the complainant that he himself had lost money in the place, and when the latter discovered he had lost £35, Myburgh found that he had also lost £3, and some silver. He submitted that it was merely a suspicious case, and that the Magistrate should have given the prisoner the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. Nightingale (for the Crown) having been heard in reply,

De Villiers, C.J.: I am not prepared in this case to say that the Magistrate, in judging the facts of the case, came to a wrong conclusion. It is true that there is no direct evidence connecting the accused with the theft, which appears to have been undoubtedly committed. But circumstances were proved which seem to me to justify the inference that the accused and he only could have stolen the money. It appears that the gentleman who lost the money, Van Wyk, had come to the hotel when the accused was in bed. He was shown into the same room where the accused was, and when he came into the room he says that the accused was still awake. The accused, therefore, could have watched him as he undressed, and observed where he put his clothes. The following morning, at daybreak, the accused was on the floor, and about two yards from the chair where Van Wyk's clothes were. He said: "Why did you not bolt the door?" and Van Wyk, asked, "Why?" The accused then said they had once stolen his things, and the proprietor was unable to trace them, and that on one occasion three of them in the hotel, after having their clothes and £13 stolen, had to walk out in their shirts to find clothes. Here is a definite statement which, if true, would most certainly have been brought to the notice of the proprietor, but the proprietor says he never heard of this thing before. The complainant's evidence continues: "I immediately went to my jacket, and then found the purse containing £35 was gone, and then the accused said, 'Perhaps mine is missing also'?" He examined his jacket, and said that his money was gone also. The accused then went to a shop, and bought a purse, and, subsequently, this purse is found in a place where the accused could have thrown it in order to support his statement that his purse had been taken. Well, these facts and circumstances lead to the inference that he is the thief. Could any innocent man have acted as he did? It seems unlikely, moreover, that any person could have gone into the room without being heard, and then a stranger would have had difficulty in finding the jacket. Under the circumstances, I think the Court should not interfere with the decision of the Magistrate. The appeal must be dismissed, and the conviction affirmed.

TUNSTALL AND GRANT V. { 1904.
PAULSE. } Aug. 8th.

Magistrate's Court — Judgment for payment in instalments.

The power conferred on Magistrates by the 11th section of Act 20 of 1856 should be exercised with discretion and with due regard to the rights of the creditor.

The plaintiff, to whom the defendant was indebted in a considerable sum for materials sold to him for the building of houses, gave him time for payment, and at the end of that time sued him for the amount. The evidence shewed that the defendant had received a sum of money and sent it to his relatives before the further time was given him, and there was no evidence to shew that at the time of the trial the defendant had not sufficient assets to pay the debt in full.

Held, that it was not a reasonable exercise of the Magistrate's discretion to order payment of the debt in instalments extending over a period of several months.

This was an appeal from a decision of the A.R.M. of Graaff-Reinet, in an action in which the plaintiffs (now appellants) sued the respondent for £112 10s. 10d., the amount of a promissory note. Judgment was given for £111 13s. 6d., but execution was stayed upon defendant paying the sum of £6 per month, beginning 1st June, and £6 every month until the judgment was satisfied. The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, relied on Act 20 of 1856, and stated that the defendant was a respectable coloured man with a wife and six children. He earned something like £14 a month as a telegraph linesman, and, in addition to keeping his family, he had to pay £15 interest per annum on a mortgage bond, £1 12s. a month to the Building Society, and water rates, etc. If his property were sold, it would hardly realise the amount of the mortgage bonds. Mr. Gardiner, for appellants, contended that the Act could never be applied to a case of this sort. There was nothing to stop the respondent mortgaging further, or even selling his house, and the money might go to someone else.

Mr. Upington, for respondent, submitted that the Magistrate was justified in taking into consideration the nature of the transactions with the Building Society. If the Magistrate gave judgment on matters that were not in evidence, but which he was aware of from his own knowledge, then counsel contended that an opportunity should be given for the statements to be put upon oath.

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant seems to have been a man who entered on considerable transactions. He built houses and he purchased material for the building of these houses from the plaintiffs. So far as the plaintiffs are concerned, it appears to me that they treated him with every consideration. They ascertained that the defendant had received £80 from the Building Society, when he owed them the money, which he used for his own private purposes. The defendant said he sent it to a relative in the Western Province, and promised to get it back. He was given one and a half months, but at the end of that period the promissory note had not been paid. It clearly lies upon the defendant to show that reasons exist for an order that the judgment debt should be paid in instalments. The power given to magistrates by the 11th section of Act 20 of 1856 is an extremely useful one but it should be exercised with discretion and with due regard to the rights of the creditors. In the present case the plaintiff exercised his ordinary rights as creditor without any harshness whilst the defendant did not act in a straightforward manner and certainly did not prove at the time that he had not the means to pay the money in full. He is by no means a very poor man. He is in fairly good circumstances and I am not satisfied this is a case in which the power should have been exercised. It is suggested that the case should be remitted to the Magistrate for the purpose of having evidence upon the points which induced him to his judgment, but which do not appear as evidence; but I am not prepared, even if the evidence were given, to uphold the decision. It does not appear to me one of these cases in which the power should be exercised by the Magistrate.

Upon the whole, in my opinion, the appeal should be allowed, and the judgment should be altered by striking out the portion in regard to the execution of the sentence. The appeal is allowed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ESTATE BLACK AND SIMON'S { 1904.
TOWN MUNICIPALITY v. { Aug. 9th
SIE JOHN JACKSON, LTD. { „ 10th.

Interdict—Recurring grievance—Blasting operations.

The defendants carried on blasting operations in stone quarries on the side of a mountain immediately above the town of S. The work was done so carelessly that stones and large boulders were continually rolled down to the land below and to the neighbourhood of houses in the town. The plaintiffs being the Town Council of S., and the private owner of land immediately below the quarries continually protested, but no attention was paid to their protests until an application was made to restrain the work. On the hearing of the application, an interim interdict was granted to restrain the rolling of stones to the lower land.

Held, in an action for a perpetual interdict, that although since the previous application effectual steps had been taken for minimizing the risk, yet as the previous conduct of the defendants showed that without an interdict there was reason for anticipating a recurrence of the grievance, the plaintiffs were entitled to a perpetual interdict, restraining the defendants from working the quarries in such a way as to cause stones to roll down.

This was an action brought by the executors of the late Alexander Nicholas Black and the Municipality of Simon's Town against Sir John Jackson, Ltd., the contractors for the new naval works at Simon's Town, for a perpetual interdict restraining the defendants from causing or allowing stones to roll down the slope of the mountain on to the plaintiffs' properties. The matter was before the Court by motion on the 19th January last (14 C.T.R., 23) when a temporary interdict was granted in the following terms: "That the respondents be interdicted from causing or allowing stones to roll down from their quarries at Simon's Town on the property of applicants; interdict to continue for one month, unless action be brought in the meantime to make interdict perpetual, with costs." The present action was instituted in order to make the interdict perpetual.

The declaration set out that the estate of Black was the registered owner of land on the slope towards the mountain above the main road, and that the Municipality was also the owner of land in the vicinity thereof. On the 24th May, 1902, the defendants entered into a contract with the Admiralty for the construction of certain dock works at Simon's Town, and for that purpose certain quarries were opened out on the slopes of Simon's Berg. The land on which these quarries were situated was Crown land in respect of which the Colonial Government had given a temporary right to the Admiralty or to its contractors to work the land, and take such material as they required for the work they had in hand. For that purpose the defendants had carried on, and did still carry on, blasting operations in the quarry, which constituted a nuisance and an infringement of the rights of the plaintiffs in that the second plaintiffs were prevented from laying out projected roads and streets on their lands lying below the said quarries, and that the land of the first plaintiffs was seriously damaged and depreciated by the existence of the quarries and the working thereof, and, further, that the lives and limbs of the inhabitants were endangered thereby. It was also alleged that the defendants had carelessly and negligently carried on the said operations, and that, as a consequence, large stones and boulders had rolled down on the land of the plaintiffs. Repeated remonstrances and protests had been made from time to time, and defendants had promised to take steps to secure the plaintiffs against further damage, but these precautions had proved insufficient. On motion in this court a temporary interdict was granted on the 19th January last restraining the defendants for one month from allowing or causing further stones to roll on the plaintiffs' land. The plaintiffs now sought a perpetual interdict.

The defendants, in their plea, admitted paragraph 1, and the first part of paragraph 2, but as to the remainder of paragraph 2 referring to the Municipality's trust, they alleged that the Municipality had only powers to abate nuisances in so far as provision was made under the Council's regulations, and that no such regulations had been approved relative to the working of quarries in Simon's Town. As to paragraph 3, defendants alleged that the land was vested in the Admiralty, and was in no way under the control of the second plaintiffs. The quarry was required for large and important dock-defence works urgently needed in the interests of His Majesty's Government. The defendants denied the allegations as to the operations being dangerous to life and limb, and also the allegations that the quarry was being negligently and carelessly worked. They admitted that stones accidentally rolled down the side of the mountain in the early part of the operations, but they said that thereafter they had taken precautions from time to time, and that, save one stone in August, 1903, and another in December, 1903, no stones had fallen on the plaintiffs' properties. Protection works had been constructed, and enlarged and improved from time to time, so as to be amply sufficient to prevent any stones from rolling down on to the lower properties. The defendants denied that any nuisance existed, and specially denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to an interdict, and said that the stoppage of the works would seriously hamper the completion of the contract and prejudice the interests of the public and His Majesty's Government.

The replication was in the main general.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. W. P. Buchanan), for plaintiffs. Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Close), for defendants.

Mr. Schreiner said that within a month of the temporary interdict being granted, a summons was issued, but it had not previously been possible to come to trial. He explained that there was no wish on the part of either of the plaintiffs to unduly interfere with the work itself, which was of great importance to the defences of Simon's Town, but they felt compelled to come to Court, because they had no guarantee against a condition of things which had most seriously affected and depreciated the whole of the land on Black's estate, which was land that ought to be sold to wind up the estate, and the Municipality felt that it must come to Court to secure some permanent guarantee other than a temporary interdict that there should not be the perpetuation of a condition of things that had endangered the welfare of the inhabitants, and particularly those who used the main road.

For the plaintiffs

Frank Molteno, Government land surveyor, Cape Town, proved the plan put in by the plaintiffs, showing stones on their property which appeared to have recently come down the mountain.

By the Court: He would not say that any of the stones showed indications of blasting, but they all showed signs of recent cleavage. He went over the ground on Saturday last, and he counted 80 stones which had recently come down the mountain. He saw the particularly large stone which had rolled down in December last; it was four or five feet high, and about four or five feet across.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He did not see the ground before the interdict was granted, hence he was unable to speak as to any greater precautions which might since have been taken to secure protection against stones rolling down the mountain.

Ernest Wm. Attridge, Municipal Engineer, Simon's Town, repeated the allegations contained in the affidavit that he swore for the proceedings on motion (14 C.T.R., 23). He did not think the danger was now as great on the western end as it was when he made the affidavit. He would not say that the general precautions which had been taken were altogether adequate to protect the land of the plaintiffs. He thought that the noise had been less from the blasting operations since the temporary interdict came into operation.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: A public meeting was held on the 18th January to consider what should be done to make things safe on the ground. Suggestions that were then thrown out with regard to protective measures had actually been carried out by the defendants. He had made no suggestion to the defendants as to what should be done since the public meeting was held. He did not know of any stones having come over the ramparts since January last. Much could be done to minimise the danger, but he did not think the danger could be done away with entirely. He agreed that the ramparts erected by the defendants were in their proper position.

By the Court: There was a large stone that came down from the quarries on Tuesday last; it was about 800 feet below. It would weigh about a ton and a half.

De Villiers, C.J., asked counsel what was really the object of the present action? Was it suggested that something more should be done by the defendants to protect the plaintiffs' properties?

Mr. Schreiner said that the plaintiffs sought to have the interdict made permanent, and there was the question of costs to be determined.

Sir H. Juta said that the defendants had paid the costs of the application on motion, and, as a matter of fact, the last phrase of the order made in January read, according to a newspaper report, "unless action be brought in the meantime to make interdict perpetual, with costs of the application."

Mr. Molteno (recalled) said that the stone which rolled down last week was on the slope near the main road.

Alexander Shand, engineer of the Divisional Council, said he did not think the ramparts fixed by the defendants would be sufficient to prevent stones loosened by blasting from getting down the slope of the mountain. He thought stones might bound over the ramparts.

By the Court: He thought the ramparts should be raised four or five feet.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: The Divisional Council had quarries at Elsie's Bay. The quarries were about 300 feet from the road. Traffic was stopped during blasting operations. Stones often came rolling down into the road; no big stones had fallen. They had erected no ramparts.

Wm. Runciman, M.L.A., Mayor of Simon's Town, and an executor of Black's estate, said he adhered to the allegations contained in his affidavits of the 8th and 18th January last. The estate had suffered heavily by the depreciation of the value of its land. Nobody would buy the land at the present time, because of the quarries above, and after what the people of Simon's Town had seen of boulders coming down the slope. It was desired to realise the land as soon as possible, so as to wind up the estate. Since the interdict he had gone over the land from time to time, and found out that stones had come down. The marks of the blasting were perceivable on the stones. Had it not been for the trees, the greater number of the stones would have rolled on to the main road. He did not know whether the statement of the defendants that the stones would enhance the value of the Municipality for building purposes was sarcasm or impertinence. Since the interdict, the blasting was less frequent than formerly.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He did not claim that the quarry works should be closed. From the very first he thought there was serious danger to life. Whether there had been compensation paid for the depreciation of property or not, the interdict would have been sought for. It was hardly possible for a house to be empty in Simon's Town, and he would not be surprised to hear that the rent of the houses had been raised, considering the danger that existed previously. He would go so far now as to say that there was still reasonable probability of stones coming down. It was a mere impression he had that stones came down since the interdict, as he had never seen any particular stone rolling down. The Council had asked Mr. Legg for his advice, but they were not so much concerned about his recommendations as they were about the proposals which the defendants might make. Mr. Legg was secured to see if the precautions taken by Sir John Jackson, Ltd., were adequate. He could not say why Mr. Legg's report was not sent on to the defendants when it was requested through their attorneys.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You don't object to being interdicted from doing that which you don't intend to do.]

Sir H. Juta: No, my lord. The Court will see that the whole intention of the judgment was that we should proceed with precaution, and we now say we have done so.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The sole point is, have you done everything reasonable expected of you to justify the Court in discharging the interdict altogether?]

The interdict was only to continue for a month, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Does it not mean that it continues in existence until the action is brought?]

No, my lord. It is just the other way.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I see the order as it stands reads: "Interdict to continue for one month unless an action be brought in the meantime to make it perpetual."]

Sir H. Juta submitted there was plenty of time for the plaintiffs to bring their action in the February term.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It seems to me to be really a question of costs.]

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: If the estate of Black did not get relief it would mean a serious loss.

Henry Clark, District Surgeon at Simon's Town, stated that his house was beside the quarries, and he recollected last year a large stone coming from the works and doing considerable damage to the fencing. Before the interdict his house was cracked through the blasting.

Wm. Gillard, Town Clerk, stated that if the quarries extended as they were doing at present, the lives of the children in the school below would be in danger. There had been no permission given to the defendants to blast. In July, 1902, a shed was smashed by a big stone from the works. In December last a huge stone came through a clump of young trees, and stopped within a short distance of a house, Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: All his evidence was about what took place before the interdict was granted. Black's estate was not the only one concerned.

Dominick Carnegie, major in the Royal Engineers, stated that after the interdict was granted he was sitting in Dr. Clark's house when he heard stones dropping on the roof from the quarry.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He did not actually see the stones.

George Glass stated that while he was walking in the Main-street in February last he heard a heavy report, and when the dust cleared off a stone an inch and a half long fell behind him. At the same time he heard a noise on the roof of the Catholic Church. If the Court would release the order it would further depreciate the property.

Walter Douglas Barrable, builder, stated that one of his tenants left the house on account of his wife becoming hysterical owing to the stones. His property had certainly become depreciated.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Donald Macfarlane, Superintendent Civil Engineer of the Admiralty Harbour Works, Simon's Town, stated that prior to January, 1904, he believed there was considerable risk from the quarries. He was then giving advice on behalf of the Admiralty. On the 18th January he brought about a meeting with a view to minimising the danger. They all proceeded to the works, and witness recommended that one of the trenches should be raised and lengthened. Mr. Legg made no reply to this suggestion. Mr. Legg said that he would report to his client. Witness's suggestions had been carried out, and in addition three ramparts were constructed. At present he was under the impression that the condition of the quarry now was a safe one. The operations at present were being conducted in the usual way.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: When he made the statement in April, 1903, he thought that the substantial benching reduced the risk to a minimum, but he was probably wrong on that occasion.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is your statement not a little bit too strong to-day?]

I don't think so, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are you quite certain?]

Yes. What has been done is sufficient for all practical purposes.

Robeyt Hammersley-Heenan, General Manager and Engineer-in-Chief of the Table Bay Harbour Board, stated he inspected the quarries in February and May last. In February he was asked by the firm of Sir John Jackson, Limited, to make certain recommendations, and in May he found that his suggestions had been carried out.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He did not think there was any danger at present. Where people lived directly below a quarry there should naturally be greater protection.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I take it that the ramparts you suggest do not dispose of the care in blasting.]

Witness: Of course with incompetent men there might be danger, but they would have to be terribly incompetent.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You say comparatively safe, provided care is taken in the blasting.]

Yes.

John Delbridge, contractor, Wynberg, stated that he had long experience of quarrying, and in his opinion the ramparts were absolutely safe.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: There were houses under his quarry at Fishhook.

Frederick Stanford, civil engineer, in the employment of the Admiralty at Simon's Town, stated he had five years' experience of quarrying at Gibraltar. Certainly there was risk at Simon's Town before the ramparts were put up, but he thought that for all practical purposes all reasonable precautions had now been taken, and the risk was diminished.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: The defendant's were not the contractors at Gibraltar. He did not know of interdict proceedings there in connection with the quarrying.

Hugh Edwards, civil engineer and managing director of Sir John Jackson, Ltd., in South Africa, stated that on the 18th January a meeting was arranged for the purpose of seeing what could be done. There were no suggestions from the plaintiffs' side, but Mr. Runciman promised to let him have whatever reports he received. Since the alterations had been made he was not aware of any stones having gone over the ramparts. The protection works cost between £1,400 and £1,500. They had not used less powder and dynamite pending the action. Since January there was no intimation from the Municipality of any stones coming down from the quarry.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Five men had been killed at the works, but he did not consider that a high proportion.

Edward Wm. Shiel, civil engineer, gave evidence as to the sections of quarries and surrounding ground. He also stated that considerably more working had actually taken place at the quarry behind Black's place since the interdict was granted than previously.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He considered that some protection had been made as regarded the other quarry. Some fortifications having been built on the benching. He had heard nothing about stones having been shot from that quarry until he came to the Court on Tuesday.

Frank Davis, foreman at the quarries behind Black's property, said he kept a record of the powder used for blasting. Considerably more powder had been used since January than was used before. There had been no attempt to keep the work down.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Heavier charges of dynamite were now used than was formerly the case. Stones did not now roll down the hill. The benching was wider now than it was before the interdict was granted. Only three stones had gone beyond the benching, and reached the first rampart. One weighed about 7 cwt. One stone of about three or four tons went through the first rampart, but only travelled about three yards beyond the rampart. There was another rampart lower still, which would have held the stone in case it had flown over the first rampart. He considered that it was impossible for a stone to pass the ramparts.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: The stone that passed through the first rampart was so severely checked in its course that it did not reach the second rampart.

Thomas William Drummond, an employee at the Dockyard, said he lived in a house below the quarry behind Black's property. He considered that, after the extreme precautions taken by the defendants, there was now no danger. His rent was raised last month.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He was one of those who lodged a complaint originally. The stone that fell in December came within 100 ft. of his house. He considered that with the present width of benching, there was no danger of stones reaching his house. Since the protection had been put there, he considered that he was quite safe. He had watched the blasting operations hundreds of times.

The evidence of Admiral Durnford, taken on commission, was put in.

De Villiers, C.J., put it to counsel for the defendants whether there was not sufficient ground to continue the interdict.

Sir H. Juta submitted that there was not sufficient ground, and urged that if the state of things had been in January last such as it was to-day, the temporary interdict would not have been granted. Whatever had been suggested in the way of protection had been carried out by the defendants, and a good deal more. He contended that it was absurd to suppose that Mr. Runciman and the other gentlemen who were so much interested, for some reason or other, in obtaining this interdict, would not keep watch to see if further stones came down. Whatever the situation was before January, it was quite changed now. The whole point of the plaintiffs seemed to be that Black's land was being depreciated. That was a question of damages, and not a question of an interdict at all. It was a sound rule that an interdict should not be granted, unless the plaintiffs had no other remedy. He submitted that all reasonable precautions, such as experience and skill and expertness could suggest, had been carried out by the defendants. What more could be done? The work that had been done was by no means insignificant. It had taken considerable time, and had cost between £1,400 and £1,500. Nobody had been injured by these blasting operations. The element of irreparable injury, which was at the bottom of all interdicts, was entirely wanting in this case. It was purely a matter of anticipated danger.

Without calling upon Mr. Schreiner, De Villiers, C.J., at the outset reviewed at some length the proceedings which led up to the application for a temporary interdict in January last. Continuing, he said: "The question is whether the Court should continue the interdict which has been granted. I confess that, if the defendants had shown by their previous conduct that without pressure, without legal proceedings, they were anxious to minimise any possible danger Sir Henry Juta's argument would have had great weight. But when I find that it is only the Admiral's report and the legal proceedings which induced the defendants to take steps for minimising the danger to plaintiffs I do not feel justified in withholding the interdict. The previous conduct of the defendants must weigh with the Court, because if this interdict is removed, there is a danger that their carelessness will recommence, and the danger to the plaintiffs will become as great as ever. A great deal has been said about the stone which came down after the interdict had been granted. Now, I don't think any stone came down which could be brought within the scope of the present action, but I do think that the fact that that stone did come down shows how necessary it is that there should be an interdict in regard to the portion now in question. There seems to have been no interdict in regard to the other portion from which the stone came, consequently the defendants were perfectly careless about it. One would have fancied that before extending the quarry in a north-westerly direction, and before attempting to blast there, they would have used the precautions which had been found necessary in another portion, in order to prevent the possibility of any danger there, but there was no interdict, there was nothing to restrain them there, and consequently there was not the same care as there was in regard to the portion to which the defendants understood that the interdict did extend. It is true that ramparts had been constructed; it is said that these ramparts were constructed after an interview had taken place between the representatives of the different parties, and great fault is found with the plaintiffs for not making suggestions for reducing or removing the danger altogether. But it was not the duty of the plaintiffs to make any suggestion. The defendants undertook a work of great danger. They opened quarries right above the town, right above the houses of the inhabitants on the slope of a steep mountain, and the law throws upon the defendants the plain duty to use every precaution to prevent any possible damage. In proportion to the danger should be the caution exercised by the defendants in the performance of a work like blasting. On a level plain blasting is a dangerous operation, but the danger is increased when it takes place on the slope of a steep mountain above houses within the Municipality, and I therefore say that there was a duty on the defendants to use every precaution to prevent danger. They may have thought that they were contracting with the Admiralty, and that there was no great necessity for respecting private property, but, in my opinion, the fact that they were working for the Admiralty does not release them from the obligation which rests upon every individual to respect his neighbour's rights, and so to exercise his own rights as not to injure those of his neighbour. The defendants did not, in 1903, in my opinion, so exercise their rights as to justify the Court in now assuming that the grievance will not recur. As to the ramparts, it would appear that they serve their purpose, that is, on the assumption that the blasting operations are carefully carried on, and I am satisfied that if this interdict continue, great care will continue to be taken in regard to blasting operations, but I am not so certain, considering what did take place in 1903, that the same care will be taken without an interdict as with an interdict. The ramparts do not appear to me to be faultless yet; there is evidence that by raising these ramparts a few feet the danger will be still further minimised, and I am not sure that the defendants would not be well advised to adopt the suggestion. There is evidence that on some occasions after the interdict had been granted, stones did come down, which could only be caused by the blasting. It is suggested that it may have been a mere coincidence, that somebody happened to be throwing stones just the moment after blasting took place, but there was no suggestion that anyone had been seen throwing stones. The declaration in the case claims that "the respondents be restrained from working the quarries by carrying on blasting operations therein." Well, that portion of the interdict I am not prepared to grant, because, as the work is an important national work, it would require a very grave cause to justify the Court in preventing any blasting operations from being carried on. But the Court can, at all events, require this, that the blasting operations shall be so carried on that no stones or other matter shall roll down, or be rolled down, from the quarries. The evidence shows that it is quite possible to carry on blasting operations in such a way as not to cause stones to roll down. I believe that, even if there had been no ramparts, the blasting might have been carried on in such a way as not to let stones roll down, but it is a wise precaution to have ramparts as well. But that, in my opinion, will not dispense with the necessity of other precautions being taken in regard to the blasting, so as to prevent the possibility of any injury being done either to Black's estate or to the Municipality, as representing the ratepayers. The Court will therefore grant a perpetual interdict, in terms of the plaintiffs' prayer, with the exception of the words "working the quarries by carrying on blasting operations therein," so that it will read thus: "Grant a perpetual interdict, restraining respondents from working the quarries in such a way as to cause or allow stones or other matter to roll or to be rolled down from the quarries on to the land of the first-named plaintiffs, or on to any land vested in the second-named plaintiffs." As to the costs, they must follow the result, including a sum of 5 guineas, the costs of the preparation of plan by Surveyor Molteno.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

SCOTT V. VELLINGHAUSEN. { 1904.
Aug. 9th.

Sale and purchase—Time limit—
Damages.

This was an action brought by Messrs. W. and G. Scott and Co., Ltd., Salt River, to recover from Messrs. W. S. Vellinghausen and O. Schurr, trading as W. S. Vellinghausen and Co., the sum of £85 8s. 4d., and £82 16s. 8d damages, for breach of contract.

The plaintiff's declaration stated that he was a duly registered company, which carried on business at Salt River as timber merchants. The defendants were engineers, carrying on business as such at Cape Town. On the 18th March, 1903 the parties entered into an agreement whereby the defendants agreed to supply the plaintiff with a boiler and fittings complete in accordance with a certain specification, for the sum of £400. c.i.f. Cape Town, and to ship the same from England within eight weeks from that date, i.e., on or before the 13th May, and further agreed to supply with the boiler certain extra fittings at a reasonable price, which the parties subsequently agreed on at £92. The plaintiff had paid the defendants the sums of £400 and £92. The defendants, in breach of their agreement, did not ship the boiler within eight weeks, but shipped it in the month of July. By reason of the delay, the plaintiff was put to extra expense in erecting a building for the boiler, and the erection of plant in connection therewith, and was hindered and delayed in his business and in other ways. The plaintiff estimated the damage sustained by reason of the breach of contract at £85 8s. 4d. The defendants further, in breach of contract, failed to supply certain of the fittings, and supplied certain others in a defective condition. By reason of the breach of contract, the plaintiff was put to expense in purchasing fittings not supplied, and, in replacing or repairing fittings supplied in a defective condition, and also suffered loss through having to stop the machinery while the defects were being repaired. Plaintiff estimated the damage sustained at £82 16s. 8d.

The defendants' plea admitted that, instead of shipping the boiler and fittings within eight weeks of the time agreed upon, it was shipped in the month of July. That, notwithstanding the non-compliance with the contract, the plaintiffs accepted the boiler and fittings on its arrival without protest or objection, and paid for it. The defendants held that, by reason of the acquiescence of the plaintiffs, the latter were not now entitled to claim damages. The defendants refused to pay the sums of £85 8s. 4d. and £82 16s. 8d. The defendants admitted that, after delivery and acceptance of the boiler, the plaintiffs made the complaints, and thereupon the defendants, although not legally bound to do so, offered, in order to settle the disputes, to deduct the sum of £26 6s. 6d. from the amount due by the plaintiffs. This the plaintiffs refused to accept.

Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. P. Jones) appeared for the plaintiffs, and Mr. M. de Villiers for the defendants.

George A. Scott stated he was managing director of the plaintiff company, and carried on business at Salt River. In March, 1903, the business was carried on at the Docks. His firm required a boiler for their new works at Salt River, and amongst other people witness interviewed was Mr. Hendry, the defendants' agent. He agreed with him to ship for his firm a boiler, the price of which was £400. They supplied him with a specification and plan of the boiler he ordered. The agreement was entered into on the 18th March. Witness pressed on Mr. Hendry the fact that time was of the utmost importance, as witness's firm were changing to new premises, and he agreed to let them have the boiler in eight weeks from the date of order. On the 6th July witness wrote complaining that the boiler had not arrived, and stating that his firm had suffered considerable inconvenience through its non-arrival. The defendants wrote back stating they were pushing the matter forward as fast as possible. The boiler arrived on the 3rd September, and witness wrote complaining that there was no scum-cock on the boiler, and that the paint had been put on over the rust. There was no steam chest on it either, and he stated that he wished to be indemnified for the expense his firm had been put to in getting these things. Witness accepted the boiler because the business at their works would have been at a standstill without it. He never waived his claim for damages. Mr. Hendry, the defendants' agent, visited the works, and witness showed him the defects in the boiler. Half of the amount was paid on documents in London, and half out here. In October witness again communicated with Mr. Hendry, complaining of the fittings. Mr. Hendry went out and examined them. On the 29th October witness communicated with the manufacturers of the boiler complaining of the various defects. The blow-down cock and injector constantly required repairing. After further correspondence, the defendants offered to pay £26 6s. 6d. for repairs to the scum-cock. The second half of the account had at that time been paid. Witness wrote asking the defendants for the refund of £43 17s. 8d., which included the £26 6s. 6d. as the cost of repairs. He also claimed £85 8s. 4d. damages for loss of trade. In anticipation of being able to start work soon, he had large quantities of timber carted out to Salt River, and had to have it brought back again to Cape Town. Witness did not keep any record of the number of loads, but he kept two teams of horses engaged for eight weeks. The machinery was repeatedly stopping owing to the defects in the boiler. He claimed £19 10s. for that. This boiler was to work 22 machines. Witness reckoned that each machine could earn 5s. an hour.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: Witness erected a shed for a sawmill. He told Mr. Hendry he intended doing so. Witness first of all claimed £26 6s. 6d., but afterwards sent in a further claim for £19 10s. The engineer would be able to tell the Court what repairs were necessary to the boiler.

John Gallie, mechanical engineer, stated he was in the employment of plaintiffs from December, 1902, until last February. He saw the boiler in question, and it was altogether different to what was specified for. There were a few bulges on the boiler. The paint was bad. It seemed to be an old boiler, because there was soot inside. One could not tell all the defects then,

The fittings did not seem to have been fitted at all, although they should have been before the boiler left England. The sum of £85 did not pay plaintiffs for the repairs they had to do to the boiler. The boiler stopped repeatedly during the day. The cause of the first stoppage was because the junction pipe of the blow-down cock was defective. That was due to bad workmanship in England. All the stoppages were due to a defective blow-down pipe and injector. The machinery had been stopped altogether for nine hours. The scum-cock and fittings were an essential part of the boiler. Witness was sure that he put in over a month at night-time repairing the boiler. He corroborated Mr. Scott with regard to the charges made for doing the repairs.

Cross-examined by Mr. De Villiers: Witness was aware that a test certificate was sent with the boiler, but he had his doubts as to whether it was tested or not. Witness meant when saying it was an old boiler that it had been in use before. When witness found there were not enough fire bricks, he reported the matter to Mr. Scott. Witness considered it absolutely necessary to have an injector on a boiler. Sometimes a boiler, when newly put up, "weeps"; but that depends on the builder. Witness had taken charge of many boilers, but the one plaintiff had was the worst he had ever seen.

Harry William Miller, A.C.E.I., stated he had had twenty-five years' engineering experience. He had examined the boiler in question, and did not approve of its construction. The injector was a good one of its type. If the boiler was driven at its full capacity it would take the injector all its time to keep up.

Walter Parker stated he was time-keeper for the plaintiffs. He paid men for repairing the blow cock. He could, if required, give details of the expenditure in erecting the temporary shed.

Mr. Gardiner closed his case.

Robert Hendry, agent for the defendant, stated he had a conversation, as borne evidence to by plaintiff, with him in March, 1903. They discussed the advisability of putting a scum cock on the boiler. Witness received no definite instruction to supply one, and therefore did not. Witness only knew that the boiler was wanted at Salt River. He heard nothing about a shed being erected. The plaintiffs specified that it was necessary to have it landed in eight weeks. The boiler left on the 16th July, and the delivery was completed on the 13th August. The plaintiff did not ask for any other amount except the £26 6s. 6d. for a long time after the boiler was landed. Witness went down to see Mr. Scott on the 5th September. He complained of the late delivery, and then said that the paint had been put on over rusty plates. Witness scratched the boiler with his penknife, and found bright steel underneath. There was no material advantage to be gained from painting a boiler. After corresponding with the manufacturers of the boiler, witness agreed to pay plaintiff £26 6s. 6d. There was no doubt but that the boiler was a new one. What Mr. Scott called soot in the boiler was really coal dust, which had accumulated in the coaling of the vessel. A steam chest was not necessary.

James Garvie, partner of the firm of Garvie and Co., engineers, Woodstock, stated that he found the excavations for the boiler not quite complete. Delay was caused through the non-arrival of angle plates. Scott's representative knew the blow-down was too near the furnace, in consequence of which it became hot, and the result was that it was impossible to keep the water in the boiler. He could not say whether there was a sufficient supply of fire-bricks. If any damage had been done to the injector it had been done after he had put it up.

R. H. Brydey, engineer, stated that the globular valve was quite unnecessary. The injector was a first-class one.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He should say that the injector could work at top pressure.

Albert Bonds, civil engineer, stated that according to his calculations 2,800 bricks would be required up to the damper.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He had considerable experience of boilers in his time. He thought that 3,000 bricks would be ample.

Mr. De Villiers closed his case, and counsel having been heard in argument on the facts.

Buchanan, J., said as regarded the first claim for damages for non-delivery within a specific time it would be sufficient to refer shortly to the evidence and to the letter that had been put in. Mr. Scott stated that he explained to Hendry, the agent of the defendant, that time was of the utmost importance, as their other boiler was defective, and might give out at any time, and that the erection of temporary building was to be proceeded with in anticipation of the arrival of the boiler. The defendants undertook that the order was to be shipped within eight weeks of its receipt in Cape Town. The plaintiffs, in reply to defendants' letter said they were pleased with this offer as time was of the utmost importance. As a matter of fact the boiler was not shipped until many weeks later, and here there was distinctly a breach of contract. The defendants contend that the damages had been waived by acceptance and payment for the boiler, but the payment was made by drafts in the ordinary course of business, and singularly enough neither defendants' agent nor Mr. Scott himself knew that this had been done. Under the circumstances disclosed in this case I do not think that could be taken as a waiver on the part of the plaintiffs. In measuring the damages it is difficult to assess an amount with arithmetical nicety, but considering the sum that had been expended I think £50 would be a fair and reasonable award to make on the first count. As to the defects in the machinery and the short delivery of fire-bricks and fireclay there was not sufficient evidence to satisfy me that there was any breach of contract. As to the four items amounting to £26 6s. 6d., Messrs. Thomson and Co., the makers of the boiler, had agreed to refund that amount to defendants, but as it had been proved in the case that the angle-plates had been claimed for from the Railway Department, the sum of £1 18s. 10d. must be deducted. Mr. Scott admitted that he had received the price of the iron plates from the Railway Department, and he was therefore not entitled to recover twice over. On the evidence I am not prepared to say that the new injector was necessary, and the other items might be put down to ordinary defects which might fairly be expected to be found in machinery. Judgment will be given for the plaintiffs in the sums of £50 and £24 7s. 8d., with costs.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

PARKS V. PARKS.

{ 1904.
Aug. 10th.

This was an action brought by William Henry Parks, against his wife, Sarah Parks, for a decree of divorce, in consequence of her adultery with a man, whose name was unknown to the plaintiff.

The parties were married in community of property by special licence, at Cape Town, on the 28th May, 1902. In the following August, the defendant left plaintiff, and went to reside at the Paarl, where on various occasions she had committed adultery. There was one child of the marriage.

Mr. Alexander for plaintiff; defendant in default.

William Thomas Birch, Registrar of Births, Deaths, and Marriages, Cape Town, handed in the marriage certificate, William Henry Parks, stated he was married to defendant on the 28th May, 1902. After the marriage they went to live with his mother. Three months after they were married, the defendant left him.

By the Court: They had rows prior to her leaving owing to her not having his "scoff" ready.

Continuing, witness said the defendant went to live at the Paarl. She wrote to him, and he wrote back, asking her reasons for leaving. She wrote asking witness for her maintenance.

By the Court: Witness never asked her to return to him when once she left him.

Nettie Brynton stated the plaintiff was her brother, and she lived with him and his wife in Cape Town. They were always quarrelling, but not violently. Witness saw her in August, 1902, packing her trunks, and asked her where she was going. She said she was going home to her mother. She went. Witness saw her again some months later. She had several gold rings on her fingers. Witness asked her where she got them. She replied that she had a white sweetheart in the Paarl, who gave them to her, and that she wished plaintiff would die, so that she could marry this man. Witness saw her again in the following October, when she was enceinte.

Edith English stated she was cousin to the defendant. In June, 1902, she visited them, and lived with them. They seemed happy. Towards the end of 1902 witness saw her at the Paarl, and she said she had gone home to her mother. Towards the end of 1903 witness saw her again, she then had a white baby.

Meitje Saul, a coloured midwife, stated she knew the defendant. She attended her in her confinement in 1902, when she was delivered of a coloured child. She attended her again in 1903, when she gave birth to a white child, which did not live long.

The Court granted a decree of divorce, Buchanan, J., remarked that it was peculiar the plaintiff did not ask for the custody of his own child.

DU TOIT V. DOMINGO.

{ 1904.
Aug. 10th.
" 11th.

Defamation—Malay priest—Damages.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, Kiamdien du Toit, a Malay priest, to recover from Gabriel Domingo, also a Malay priest, damages estimated at £5,000 for defamation of character.

The plaintiffs declaration stated that both he and the defendant resided at the Paarl. Plaintiff was the Imam or priest of a Malay congregation, worshipping in a mosque there; and the defendant also held a similar position in another mosque there. At divers times in the month of January, 1904, the defendant uttered certain false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory words of and concerning the plaintiff, in the Dutch language, of which the following is an English translation: "Sahiedien Dollie has divorced his wife on account of Du Toit (the plaintiff) having been found cohabiting with her, and the father of Du Toit paid Dollie £30 to keep quiet about it." By reason of these words the plaintiff had been greatly injured in his good fame and reputation, and especially in his character and position as Imaun, and he had sustained damage amounting to £5,000.

The defendant, in his plea, denied all the material allegations contained in the plaintiff's declaration.

Mr. Upington for plaintiff; Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Pyemont) for defendant.

The plaintiff stated he held an official position in the new Moslem mosque at the Paarl. The defendant held a similar position in the old Moslem mosque. Witness's congregation was composed of 86 men, and defendant's of only 15. Witness was a "hadje," and had received a certificate from Mecca to the effect that he was entitled to the title of "Imaun." In 1897 a large proportion of the congregation became dissatisfied with the defendant as "Imaun." A vote was taken as to whether he was to remain "Imaun," or not, and the defendant won by three votes. However, those who were dissatisfied built a mosque, of which plaintiff took charge, and got together a number of defendant's congregation. Defendant showed witness considerable animosity, and made complaints to the Bishop. The Bishop held an inquiry. In his capacity as Imaun, witness had repeatedly been asked to preside at feasts. In the beginning of this year, the defendant circulated defamatory reports about witness. In consequence, witness was suspended by the congregation, who also suspended his allowance. He estimated the damage he had sustained at £5,000. His salary in the church was £8 a month. He received fees for attending feasts, etc., in addition.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness had no enmity against defendant. There were no minutes of the proceedings of the special meeting of the congregation kept. Witness was at present suspended, but if his character was cleared up, he would be reinstated.

Cousain Camodien, a tailor, residing in the Paarl, stated he was a member of the defendant's congregation. On the 2nd January the defendant told witness that Sahiedien Dollie had divorced his wife, because of the defendant having been found cohabiting with her.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness was a member of Du Toit's congregation, but when he heard the reports about him he left, and joined Domingo's congregation.

Coumain Camodien, jun., son to last witness, corroborated the evidence given by his father.

Hendrick Noach stated that although not a Malay, he knew plaintiff and defendant well. On the 13th January defendant told witness of plaintiff's misconduct with "Dollie's" wife.

Jacob Petersen stated he was a coachman, and resided at the Paarl. In January last he was in the employment of the defendant. He remembered a conversation between defendant and Noach. The defendant told Noach that plaintiff had been cohabiting with Dollie's wife. Witness quarrelled with defendant.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The quarrel witness had with defendant had nothing to do with the present case. Witness quarrelled with him because he took a horse of the defendant's out, and kept it out for three days.

Lam Abdol stated he was a brickmaker, and was employed by his father. He heard defendant tell another Malay that plaintiff had cohabited with Dollie's wife, and that, in consequence, Dollie had put her away.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness belonged to plaintiff's congregation.

To the Court: Witness never belonged to defendant's congregation.

Samodein Kamedien stated he resided at Stellenbosch. In January, 1904, whilst at Sooker's house, in Cape Town, he heard the report about plaintiff. Before witness heard that report, plaintiff used to conduct service for him, but when he heard it he wrote to him, stating that he could no longer be his priest.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Du Toit did not dictate the letter to witness. Plaintiff asked witness to send a copy of the letter to him, because he had lost the original, and he did so.

Mr. Gardiner put into Court an affidavit made by witness, in which he stated he had been authorised by plaintiff to write such a letter.

Gabriel Domingo, the defendant, examined, stated he was a Mahomedan priest at the Paarl. He denied that he had seen Camodien on the Saturday as alleged. He saw him on the Monday, and Camodien then asked witness if he had heard that Dollie had divorced his wife, because she had been cohabiting with plaintiff, and that plaintiff's father had paid Dollie £30 to keep the matter quiet. Witness expressed great surprise at the report, and Camodien then told him that plaintiff already had two wives, and that he had left one with the picannies. Witness also denied that he had said anything to Noach.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Witness was very much shocked when he heard the report about Dollie's wife. Witness had a conversation with the father of Dollie's wife, who told him that plaintiff had been cohabiting with his daughter. Witness denied that he tried in any way to injure plaintiff. Witness brought a charge against plaintiff before the Bishop to the effect that he was not preaching proper doctrine. All the other Bishops contended that plaintiff had squared the Bishop.

The defendant (recalled) denied in further explanation, that he offered one Socker a cart and horses if he would give evidence on his behalf. He denied that he suggested to Socker the evidence he was to put on the affidavit.

Sadien du Toit, Abdol Groenewald, Kiamdien Domingo (brother of the plaintiff), Ebrahim Anta, and others also gave evidence.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts.

Buchanan, J.: The plaintiff and defendant both lived at the Paarl, and are rival Imaams, or priests, of two Malay congregations at the Paarl. Up to 1897 these congregations were one, and the defendant was the priest of that congregation. A portion of the congregation in that year wished to depose him, but they could not succeed in doing so. An action was brought in this court, and the Court then directed a poll to be taken of the congregation, and the result of that poll was that there was a majority of three in favour of the defendant. After that decision, a secession took place of the dissatisfied members of the congregation, and they started a new church, of which the plaintiff became Imaam. The defendant himself admitted that since this separation the plaintiff had been drawing away members of his congregation, and the relations between the parties seemed to have become very strained at the time of the circumstances with which the Court was now called upon to deal. According to the declaration, the words alleged to have been uttered by the defendant were: "Sahiedien Dollie has divorced his wife on account of Du Toit (the plaintiff) having been found cohabiting with her, and the father of Du Toit paid Dollie £30 to keep quiet about it." It was not denied that these words used about anybody and especially a person in the position of the plaintiff, as a priest of the congregation, were defamatory in the highest degree, and the defendant did not attempt to justify the words as true, but simply denied having uttered them. Now, there were three persons to whom on three different occasions it was alleged the defendant had spoken the words complained of. It was a curious thing that the defendant admitted that the words were on each occasion used in his presence, but he says it was not he, who used them, but that they were told to him by the persons named. His lordship, having briefly reviewed the evidence, went on to say that he thought the probabilities were strongly in favour of the story told by the plaintiff's witnesses as being the correct one, and the story of the defendant being incorrect. He commented on the way in which the witness had been approached by the defendant after pleadings had been filed, and he remarked that this, to his mind, pointed to an attempt to interfere with plaintiff's material witness. He had, therefore, to find, sitting there as a juror, that these words were spoken by the defendant to the different witnesses, who had been called. The only question that remained was what damages should be awarded? The very large sum of £5,000 was claimed, and it was alleged that this was a serious allegation. The charge, it was true, was serious, and especially as directed against a person in the plaintiff's position, and the plaintiff had suffered some material loss in consequence. The plaintiff said that he had been suspended from his position as head of the congregation, but he did not plead special damage. As far as the trial in Court was concerned, there had been no attempt to say that the allegations which had been made were true in any particular. There had been no justification pleaded. The plaintiff had come into Court mainly to clear his character. He thought there should be awarded a substantial but not a vindictive sum as damages. Considering the relationships of the parties and their occupations, and the fact that the plaintiff's character would by this action be fully cleared, he thought it would be sufficient to give judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of £50, with costs. His lordship added that before the parties left the court, he would like to say that he thought it would be better if this theological dispute were allowed to die out in a place like the Paarl, and the congregation of Moslems, who were otherwise good citizens, should work harmoniously together in their religious relationships.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

ADMISSION.

{ 1904.
{ Aug. 11th.

Mr. Russell moved for the admission of Jacques Marthinus van Wyk as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, oaths to be taken before the Resident Magistrate of Ceres.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

FORD V. CHRIST.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for provisional sentence for £680 on certain conditions of sale, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent., being balance due of a sum of £1,020, of which £340 had been paid on account, plaintiff tendering transfer.

Mr. Burton read an affidavit by the defendant, who said that he was willing to take transfer if the plaintiff would give him title to the whole of the property bought by him (the defendant), and would settle the dispute with the Divisional Council in regard to the true boundaries. The Divisional Council claimed a strip 3 feet wide, running the whole length of the land bought by the defendant, 100 feet, and fronting to the main road at Muizenberg, which, they said, was an encroachment and belonged to the road.

Mr. Jones read affidavits by Theo. de Villiers, Government land surveyor, who said that the extent of the ground was indicated by beacons at the sale and by James Ford, who said that the Divisional Council had never made a claim upon him for the 3-ft. strip in question.

Mr. Burton contended that the liquidity of the document was destroyed, because the plaintiff was unable to deliver that which he had professed to sell. The defendant, it seemed to him, would be buying, not the property, but a law-suit. The defendant was prepared to pay the money, and had handed it over to his attorneys, but he wanted to know what he was going to get. The Divisional Council said that the land encroached to the extent of a strip of 3 feet on the main road.

Mr. Jones said he submitted that the defendant should accept transfer of the land set out in the diagram from the plaintiff. He quoted the case of Van der Merwe v. Burgers (4 Juta, p. 128), and contended that the plaintiff was entitled to provisional sentence. It seemed to him that the Divisional Council would have to move for the deeds registered in the Deeds Office to be set aside.

Hopley, J., said it seemed to him that the best thing would be for all the parties to come together, to see whose ground this really was. Provisional sentence would be refused, with costs. Plaintiff, if he liked, could go into the principal case.

BOARD OF EXECUTORS V. VAN SCHALKWYK.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond.

The Registrar said that there was no proof of service.

Mr. Buchanan (in answer to the Court) said that he had no affidavit of service.

Hopley, J.: You had better look into the matter, Mr. Buchanan. Counsel should be in a position to give proof of service, and it would be well, as I have said over and over again, if they were briefed with this by the attorneys.

HIGRANT, CHANTREY AND CO. V. PRATT.

Mr. Close moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent. Replying to the Court, Mr. Close said he had no proof of service.

Hopley, J.: I suppose because work has increased so much in this court, the attorneys want to make it more difficult.

Order granted.

"CAPE TIMES" AND "CAPE ARGUS" V. GOLDSMID.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent and for the appointment of Mr. J. E. P. Close as provisional trustee.

Final order granted, but no order as to appointment of trustee, Hopley, J., remarking that no reason had been shown why the Court should depart from the usual practice.

DAVIES V. SOLOMON.

Mr. Sutton moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

SAVAGE AND SONS V. VENTER BROS.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the estates of the defendants, as partners, and individually.

Order granted.

SACHS V. SCHALK AND MARTHA VAN DER MERWE.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £101 18s. 9d., less £10 paid on account.
Order granted.

ATTRIDGE V. HEYNS.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence for £2,350 on a certain mortgage bond, together with interest.

The defendant asked for further time to be allowed her in which to sell one of the properties, and thus be able to clear off the arrears of interest.

The case was ordered to stand over until later in the day, defendant to see plaintiff's attorneys in the meantime.

SIFF V. COHEN.

Mr. Roux moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £100, with costs of suit.
Order granted.

SPIHLHAUS V. AJAM.

Mr. Pyemont moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

WILLIAMS V. MORRIS.

Mr. Rainsford moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

REYNOLDS VEHICLE AND HARNESS FACTORY V. BLAKE.

Mr. Roux moved for provisional sentence on two cheques, respectively of £25 and £20, less £10, paid on account, and judgment, under Rule 329d, for £3 16s. 10d., for mixed account.

Order granted as prayed.

BANK OF AFRICA LTD., V. EPSTEIN, BIRCHSOHN AND JACKSON.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence on two promissory notes for £140 and £120 respectively, with interest and costs of suit.

Order granted.

ESTATE WALKER V. KARRIES.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on two mortgage bonds, amounting together to £300, with interest; also for property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, bonds having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

SELLAR BROS. V. CLEWS.

Mr. Sutton moved for the cancellation of the provisional order for the sequestration of the defendant's estate.

Provisional order superseded.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

INGLESBY V. I. AND J. HER- { 1904.
MANN. { Aug 11th.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved, under Rule 329d, for judgment for the immediate delivery of a suite of furniture purchased for £25, and stored by the plaintiff with the defendants.

Case ordered to stand over, pending production of affidavits as to the transaction.

Mr. Buchanan (at a later stage) said he was instructed that the plaintiff was away on his honeymoon, but he now produced receipt for a payment by the plaintiff to the defendants. He was told it was believed that the suite in question had been sold. The defendants had given notice to surrender their estate.

Hopley, J., said that the receipt seemed to be for a payment of £3 only.

Judgment granted as prayed.

MOUTON V. KARG.

Dr. Greer moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £100, money lent, £7 interest, and costs.

Order granted.

WRIGHT V. BOSSOUW.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £23 4s., money advanced on loan, payment for and at request of the defendant, and interest, less £20 paid on account since issue of summons.

Order granted as prayed.

WENTZEL V. O'BRIEN.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £96 7s., less £36 paid on account for material supplied.

Order granted.

REYNOLDS HARNESS AND VEHICLE CO.
LTD. V. MARITZ.

Mr. Roux moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £31 8s., balance of account.

Order granted.

LENG V. ROODE.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £23 11s., owing by defendant for goods sold and delivered, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte MALCOMES AND. (1904.
CO. (Aug. 11th.

This was an application brought by Messrs. Malcomess and Co., of East London and elsewhere, in regard to the estates of Henry Boyce Cary and Halbert Glendinning Hannaford, trading at Tarkastad as H. B. Cary, which had been provisionally placed under compulsory sequestration.

Mr. Upington moved as a matter of urgency for special powers to be granted to the curator bonis appointed by the Master. Counsel said it appeared that the estate consisted of certain perishable merchandise, and that there was a bottle-store. Messrs. Malcomess were the principal creditors, in fact, they represented the great bulk of the insolvents' liabilities, and it was desired that power should be given to the curator bonis to carry on the business. Messrs. Malcomess had claims amounting to £33,314 14s. 8d., and the rest of the creditors represented under £1,000. Counsel read the affidavit of Mr. Jacobsohn, of the firm of Walker and Jacobsohn, attorneys, Cape Town, acting for the petitioners. Mr. Jacobsohn stated that on the 3rd August a provisional order was granted in this court placing the insolvent estate in the hands of the Master until a trustee should be elected. In consequence of that order, a messenger of the Court had attached the goods, and business of the said H. B. Cary, and the Master had appointed Mr. Robert Hunter Williams to be curator bonis. In consequence of the attachment, there was a risk that the value of the estate would be further diminished, unless arrangements were made for the disposal of the perishable merchandise and the carrying on of the bottle-store. Counsel added that it was only in exceptional cases that such an order was granted.

Hopley, J.: This does seem to be an exceptional case. The petitioners seem to own practically the whole estate, and they should have the right to carry on the business. An order will be granted as prayed, authorising the curator bonis, Robert Hunter Williams, to carry on the business, including the bottle-store, with permission to telegraph the order.

NETTLETON V. NETTLETON.

Mr. Upington moved for a decree of divorce, with forfeiture of benefits of ante-nuptial contract, and costs, defendant having failed to comply with an order for restitution of conjugal rights. Plaintiff's affidavit was put in, saying that she had had no communication from the defendant, Thomas Stocks Nettleton.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte WEAKLEY.

Mr. Sutton moved for a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act, to be made absolute.

Order made absolute accordingly.

COLLISON V. CLINK.

Dr. Greer moved for an order for the restoration of a minor child (13). William Collison, alleged to have been wrongfully removed from the custody of the petitioner. The defendant, Gustava Clink, had been divorced from the plaintiff. It was stated that defendant had taken the minor from a house in Hanover-street, Cape Town, on the 26th March last, saying that she was going to her father's house in the Ladismith district. The Court had granted the plaintiff custody of the minor children of the marriage. The defendant was now resident in the Oudtshoorn district.

Order granted, requiring the defendant to restore the minor to his father, the petitioner.

Ex parte GAZO.

Mr. Roux moved for an order authorising the transfer to the Colonial Government of certain property, at Keiskema Hock, in the division of King William's Town. Petitioner was a Gaika, and eldest son of his father, and the Government desired to resume possession of the land, and offered to pay £25 compensation.

Order granted as prayed.

COOK V. COOK.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order compelling respondent to disclose the address of his minor son, and carry out the second and fourth paragraphs of a deed of separation. The deed provided that petitioner (Florence Emily Cook) should have custody of the girl of the marriage, and that defendant should have custody of the boy. Parties were married in England. The boy, it was believed, had been sent to England to be educated. Plaintiff claimed reasonable access to the boy as provided by the deed of separation. The payments, counsel said, were not now pressed.

The respondent said that all his communications with the boy passed through his grandmother and aunt, and he did not know the address. The plaintiff could communicate with the boy, care of his grandmother. It was far better, he thought, that the plaintiff should not know where the boy was being educated, so as to prevent unpleasantness.

Hopley, J., said that the matter ought never to have been brought before the Court on motion, and, if any further proceedings were taken, it must be by way of action. There would be no order.

Ex parte DE JONGH.

Mr. Close moved for leave to sue the defendant by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, divorce. The defendant deserted the plaintiff, who lived in the Cape division, in November, 1902, and went to Canada. When last heard of he was in New York.

Leave granted, personal service to be effected, if possible, failing which, one publication in the "Cape Times" and "South African News," rule to be returnable on the 5th November.

Ex parte CORNELIUS.

Mr. Rainsford moved for an extension of time within which the petitioner, as trustee in a Carnarvon insolvency, might file account. Six months' extension was asked for.

Order granted as prayed.

MULLER V. KOONIN.

Mr. Uington moved for an order requiring respondent forthwith to deliver up or restore to plaintiff a piano, at 29, Primrose-street, hired from the plaintiff by one Joseph Goldstein, of Cape Town. Goldstein had by letter requested the plaintiff to take back the piano under condition (a) of the hire-and-purchase contract entered into between plaintiff and Goldstein. From the correspondence, it appeared that Goldstein had given the piano to respondent in satisfaction of a debt, and that the respondent claimed that the instrument was hers.

Order granted as prayed, subject to proof of notice of motion having been served on the respondent. His Lordship said there seemed to be no doubt that the instrument was the property of the applicant, Muller.

Ex parte KENT.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for the appointment of a commissioner to examine certain witnesses on oath, petitioner being trustee in the insolvent estate of a farmer in the Oudtshoorn district.

Order granted, the Resident Magistrate of Oudtshoorn to be commissioner, failing him, the Assistant Resident Magistrate.

POLLOCK V. PULVERMACHER.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for leave to attach certain property ad fundandum jurisdictionem, and to sue the respondent by edictal citation. The respondent had passed a mortgage bond for £1,700 in favour of the applicant, but he had left the Colony and his whereabouts were unknown. The bond had become payable by reason of non-payment of interest. The last place where he was heard of was Natal.

An order was granted authorising the Registrar of Deeds not to pass transfer of the property, and leave granted to sue by edictal citation, personal service to be effected, failing which, one publication in a Durban paper, the "Cape Times," "South African News," and the "Gazette," returnable first day next term.

Ex parte WERNICH.

Mr. De Waal moved for the appointment of a curator bonis to take charge of the affairs of the petitioner's mother-in-law, who, according to medical testimony, was unable to manage her own affairs.

Order granted, Mr. J. H. Hofmeyr, of the Paarl, being appointed as curator.

FESTUS V. JONKER.

Mr. De Waal moved for leave to sue the respondent, who had failed to pay interest on a mortgage bond for £32, by edictal citation. The respondent was last heard of in Kimberley previous to the war.

Hopley, J., said that he would require an affidavit by some person who knew the respondent at Kimberley to show that he was at present beyond the jurisdiction of the Court.

FREEMAN V. CAPE DIVISIONAL COUNCIL.

This was an application for an order calling on the respondent to show cause why an order should not be granted calling on the respondents to furnish the applicant with a copy of the voters' roll in the field cornetries of Tigerberg and Kuil's River. The applicant was desirous of applying for a retail liquor licence at D'Urban-road, and it was necessary he should have the roll for the purpose of pursuing his application. An application to copy the roll was refused, and his attorney had been fused to do, after tendering what he for copying 150 names, and this he refused to do, after tendering what he believed to be the usual fee, namely, 10s.

The replying affidavit of the secretary of the Divisional Council set out that, while the roll was being considered, copies were only granted as a matter of grace.

Mr. Close was for the applicant, and Mr. Schreiner, K.C., was for the respondents.

Hopley, J., said he didn't think that the Council had adopted such an attitude as to require a mandamus from the Court, and the application would be refused, with costs.

Ex parte VAN DER BYL.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for the substitution of the name Nicolaas Jacobus Potgieter instead of Nicolaas "Johannes" Potgieter, in order to amend a certain order of Court.

Application granted.

Ex parte STABLEFORD AND CO., LTD.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor), for the applicants, the official liquidator, presented the report, and asked for the usual order.

Order granted, one publication to be made in the "Cape Times."

VAN RENSBURG AND DE VILLIERS V. TRYSTMAN.

Mr. Sutton moved to have an award of the arbitrators made a rule of Court.

Order granted.

SUPREME COURT

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

DIVORCES.

MARTENS V. MARTENS. { 1901.
{ Aug. 12th.

Dr. Greer, on behalf of the plaintiff Hendrik August Martens, applied for an order against his wife for the restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce.

Hendrik August Martens (examined) stated he was a carpenter, and resided at 26, Wandel-street, Cape Town. He was married in community of property to defendant at Braake, in Germany, on the 13th December, 1895. He landed in Cape Town in January, 1896, and had since been here. For the first year, he lived happily with his wife, but after that quarrels began. In March, 1903, he was working at Somerset West, and he received anonymous letters to the effect that she was going to a large number of dances. He immediately came to Cape Town and questioned her as to the contents of the letter. She refused to go home with him. She was then cook at the German Club. Some time after that he heard she had left the German Club. In the meantime, she called at his house for her clothes. She went to Edenberg, and as far as he knew, was still there. He believed she was a cook there.

To the Court: She went against his wish.

There were no children of the marriage. He had written to her and asked her to return, but she did not reply to him. He was willing to take her back if she returned.

[Hopley, J.: What was the quarrel you had with her after you heard she was going to dance?]

I was angry with her. I did not strike her. She laughed at me.

[Hopley, J.: Are you willing to pay her passage down if she consents to return?]

Yes.

An order as sought was granted, the return day being fixed for the 30th September.

MARSHALL V. MARSHALL.

Mr. P. Jones, on behalf of Mrs. Annie Maria Marshall, applied for an order against her husband, Edward M. Marshall, for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce. The defendant had been barred.

William Thos. Birch produced the marriage certificate of plaintiff and defendant, which was solemnised on the 20th May, 1896.

Annie Maria Marshall (the plaintiff) stated her maiden name was Cooper. She married the defendant in May, 1896. He assumed the name of Douglas Marshall. She did not know that until after they had been married some time. There was one child of the marriage—a boy, aged 7 years. Some time after the marriage defendant got employment under the Johannesburg Town Council and remained there about eighteen months, after which he went to Bloemfontein. Shortly after arriving there he was arrested, and sentenced to a year's imprisonment, with hard labour, for forgery. Witness then returned to Cape Town. He came out of gaol in December, 1899, and was then sent to Johannesburg, as he was wanted there for a similar offence, committed previous to the Bloemfontein one. He got a year there. After that was finished, he joined the South African Light Horse. He was discharged, and came to Cape Town. He visited witness, but they did not live together. He then went to England. After he had left, witness found certain letters from a woman in England suggesting to him that he should tell witness he was invalided Home. He told witness that. He returned from England to Port Elizabeth, and joined the Remount Department there. He then joined the Western Province Mounted Rifles. Subsequently witness ascertained that he went to Australia. He was later on extradited from England, and brought back to Cape Town, and sentenced to two years' imprisonment, with hard labour. He finished his sentence on the 16th July this year. He called to see witness then, but had not offered to support her.

[Hopley, J.: Are you willing to take him back if he promises to live with you?]

I suppose I will.

Witness had since her marriage supported herself. She often gave defendant money. She did not know where her husband was now.

Counsel put in a letter written by the defendant on the 20th July, in which he stated he was determined to leave South Africa and not come back again.

[Hopley, J.: He has apparently changed his mind about leaving Africa.]

The order as sought was granted, the return day being fixed for the 30th September.

TRIAL CAUSE.

DE BIASSIO V. HARRISON. { 1904.
Aug. 12th.
" 15th.

Defamation—Damages.

This was an action brought by Louis de Bissio, an Italian stonemason, residing on the Bellwood Estate at Sea Point, to recover from William Edward Harrison, retired dyer, also of Sea Point, damages estimated at £250 for defamation of character.

Plaintiff's declaration stated he was a stonemason carrying on business on portion of the Bellwood Estate, Sea Point. The defendant was a retired dyer and cleaner, residing in Cape Town, and was the owner of the Bellwood Estate, portion of which he had let to the plaintiff. Prior to the 21st of January, 1904, the plaintiff had for some time been supplying stone in the course of his business to, amongst others, the firm of Messrs. Murray and Stewart, contractors, at Sea Point. On or about the date aforesaid the defendant falsely and maliciously wrote and published of and concerning the plaintiff to the firm of Murray and Stewart the following defamatory words, in the course of a letter written and delivered by the defendant: "Bellwood Estate, Sea Point.—Dear Sirs,—I understand you are receiving from some Italian (Bissio) on the above estate, a large quantity of stone for walling and other purposes. This stone has practically been stolen from the brickyard on the estate, and I think you cannot be aware of the fact. I am not referring to the granite which Bissio and Co. are working, but to the mountain stone, to which they have no right. Although they have more than once been told of this, they still continue to remove the stone, and I think it is well to advise you of the position. This letter is simply to inform you how matters stand, so that you may not be in any way implicated should I be compelled to take action, which I shall certainly do if any further removal of stone takes place.—Yours faithfully (Signed), W. E. Harrison"—meaning thereby that the plaintiff committed the crime of theft, and had wrongfully and unlawfully converted certain stone alleged to be the property of the defendant to his own use.

Defendant's plea admitted that he wrote the letter, but denied the other allegations. He said that the allegations in the letter were true and correct, and, by virtue of the facts, he was justified in law in publishing the allegations. On or about the 20th of July, 1903, the parties entered into an agreement whereby the defendant agreed to allow plaintiff to break up and carry away any granite rock or sandstone rock that projected as boulders on the surface of the estate, under certain terms and conditions. Defendant had leased part of his estate to one W. F. Cook, of Colonnade Buildings, Greenmarket-square, for the purpose of working brick clay and brick making. Cook, in the course of his work, had brought up to the surface a considerable quantity of loose stone. The stones had been wrongfully and unlawfully removed for and by directions of the plaintiff. Defendant and Cook frequently warned plaintiff of the consequence of this action, but plaintiff refused to desist, and thereupon the letter was written at the suggestion of and by Cook, and signed by defendant.

Mr. Burton, (with him Mr. Van Zyl) appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Alexander appeared for the defendant.

The plaintiff stated he came to South Africa about three years ago. Shortly after arriving, he got a verbal lease to cut stone on the Bellwood Estate. In 1903 defendant became proprietor of the place, and the verbal lease was continued, and was afterwards changed to a written one. Witness, in the meantime, had worked up a good trade with Messrs. Murray and Stewart. Defendant let a certain portion of the estate to a Mr. Cook, and after that the defendant began to find fault with him, and told him he was not to take the stone, as it belonged to Mr. Cook. The defendant then wrote the letter complained of, and in consequence Messrs. Murray and Stewart stopped their orders, and witness's business rapidly fell off. A man with whom he had been in partnership had left him. He considered he had lost about £250 through the defendant's action.

Cross-examined by Mr. Alexander: Witness had been fined in the Magistrate's Court for assaulting defendant. It was after that he began the present action. His assistants left him, because he was unable to pay them. On Sunday, January 24, he went to see Harrison, but he did not show him the letter, and subsequently he went with a man named O'Reilly to get permission from the defendant to break some stone off the mountain.

[Hopley, J.: Apparently all this while, after you knew of this letter, you seem to remain on perfectly good friendship with Harrison?]

It was not an amicable friendship. I saw Harrison in connection with the new business.

[Hopley, J.: You were concealing your enmity?]

I was very much hurt about past events, but this was a new business, and I tried to get on as well as I could.

[Hopley, J.: Did you get permission about the Harbour Board stone?]

He said if his tender was accepted by the Harbour Board I could see him later.

[Hopley, J.: What led you to assault him in May or April?]

I didn't assault him.

[Hopley, J.: The Magistrate was quite wrong in finding you guilty?]

He might have taken a wrong view of the matter.

[Hopley, J.: After that you paid £20 damages in a civil case?]

Yes.

[Hopley, J. You knew everything in January. Why didn't you start the action in May?]

I was not aware of all the damages this matter had caused me.

[Hopley, J.: If it had caused you no damages you would not have started the action?]

No, my lord.

[Hopley, J.: It was not so much the imputation on your character as the effect on your pocket?]

It was first on account of my character, and, secondly, on account of my pocket.

Hopley, J.: You have been prepared to let the character go if your pocket was all right?]

Not knowing the language, I did not care to trouble, but when I found I was suffering damage I was compelled to proceed.

Giovanni Sabatino, stonemason and contractor, formerly in partnership with the plaintiff, stated they never took any stone from the area beyond what they had permission to take. After the defendant wrote the letter business began to fall off, in consequence of which witness sold his share of the business.

John George Murray, of Messrs. Murray and Stewart, builders and contractors, Sea Point, said his firm had bought stone from the plaintiff's quarry to the extent of £500 or £600. He had always found the plaintiff straightforward in business dealings. After the letter he looked upon the plaintiff as a thief, and he withheld certain payments pending an inquiry. He believed the plaintiff was an honest man.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The plaintiff was paid after a reasonable time. There had been a falling off in the building trade since February of this year.

Fredk. Bellamy, of Sea Point, said that he had a contract for the excavation of clay on the Bellwood Estate, with one Barouti. They had rights on the east side of the Bellwood Estate right up to the north of the Municipal boundary. He had ceded his contract to Cook. The plaintiff had the right to all surface stone. Witness's contract did not include stone other than concrete that he might come upon. The plaintiff was requested to cut away projecting boulders, which he did in a satisfactory manner. When Cook came in in October plaintiff continued to cut the stone as usual. The defendant must have been aware that the plaintiff was removing the stone. Up to the time he left in January the plaintiff appeared to be doing good business. The subject of Harrison's letter has been talked about in trading circles at Sea Point.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: His share on leaving the partnership amounted to one shilling. Whatever stone was removed from the brickyard was projecting boulders.

Ebenezer Farquhar, cartage and building contractor, Sea Point, stated that Harrison's letter was much talked about in business circles.

Further corroborative evidence having been given as to the effect of the letter,

Mr. Burton submitted that on the evidence the defendant was entitled to absolution from the instance, and closed his case.

[Hopley, J., said he thought not, as there was a distinct accusation in the letter.]

Wm. Edward Harrison stated that plaintiff was already on the estate when he came there. After witness wrote the letter in January he was seldom on the estate during the day. He had occasion to charge the plaintiff with assault, and he also summoned him for damages. If the plaintiff had continued to take only projecting boulders defendant would never have interfered with him. On the Sunday following the letter the plaintiff seemed pleased when defendant suggested that if he (plaintiff) ceased taking stone witness would say nothing more about the letter.

By Hopley, J.: It was the plaintiff's constant visits to witness's house that led up to the assault.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The voluntary separation between himself and his wife was concluded in April. He did not think that the plaintiff was living too cheap on the estate. He was not aware that the plaintiff was taking stone away from the brick-making area. Cook asked him if he could have the stone, and then the letter was written to the plaintiff, Cook dictated the letter, and at that time he had no right to the stone. Instead of taking action against the plaintiff, he wrote the letter to some of his customers, but it was not with a view to damage plaintiff's character. He would hardly like to say that the plaintiff "stole" the stone, but he certainly took it away.

[Hopley, J.: How was Murray and Stewart to know which was surface and which was underground stone?]

They might depend on the plaintiff telling the truth.

[Hopley, J.: How do you expect him to tell the truth after you accused him of being a thief?]

I didn't draft the letter. It hardly accused him of being a thief.

[Hopley, J.: Well, virtually. Were you sober when you signed the letter?]

Yes, perfectly, my lord.

Frank Herbert Cook stated he went into partnership in the estate with Balamy and Barouti on the 6th November, 1903. In the course of constructing the foundation for the machinery they came upon boulders, which the plaintiff got permission to take away. Partnership was dissolved on the 7th January, 1904. In November and December he had occasion to speak to the plaintiff about working on other stones that had been excavated in the clay pits. In December the plaintiff said he thought he got a right to the stone, but promised not to touch it again.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: His partners would not have given permission to the plaintiff to take stone without his knowledge. He denied that the letter was written with a view of injuring plaintiff in his business.

Wm. Easton, manager of the Kimberley Hotel, stated that on the second Wednesday in January he went out with Cook and Harrison to see the plaintiff. Harrison remonstrated with the plaintiff for taking away stone and for taking down part of a wall. The plaintiff said that he was sorry, and promised that he would take no further stone.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Plaintiff did not require an interpreter. In reply to Mr. Harrison, plaintiff said he understood that he had been taking stone which he had no right to.

Mr. Alexander closed his case.

Hopley, J.: In this action the plaintiff, who is a stonecutter, claims from the defendant the sum of £250 damages for defamation of character. The words complained of were contained in a letter written by the defendant to a firm of contractors. After perusing the evidence, I cannot arrive at any other decision than that there has been defamation. But from the evidence brought forward no damages seem to have been caused by reason of that defamation. In such a case as the defendant urged as his reasons for writing in the manner he did, the proper course would have been for him (the defendant) to apply for an interdict against the plaintiff instead of writing a letter as he had done. It does not appear that any special damages have been proved, but the accusation in the letter itself is a serious one, and the Court will give judgment for £25 and costs against the defendant.

AUSTIN V. PALMER AND OTHERS.

Commission—Procedure.

A. having sued P. in an action which arose out of a certain prize fight, applied for a commission to take the evidence of

P., who was about to quit the Colony.

Held, that no commission should be granted until the declaration (at least) has been filed.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved as a matter of urgency for the appointment of a commission to take the evidence to-day of Pedlar Palmer, who was about to leave for England on Monday. Counsel said that the action brought by W. J. Austin arose out of a recent prize fight. A certain amount of money was put up by certain gentlemen to be fought for, but the defendants now refused to pay out to his client his proper share.

Mr. Gardiner said he had just been instructed to oppose the application on behalf of the second defendants, the Argus Co., and Mr. W. W. Seabrook, the Sporting Editor.

Mr. Alexander said he had also been instructed to oppose on behalf of Messrs. Haيمان and Morrall, the first defendants.

[Hopley, J.: Who is going away?]

Mr. Buchanan: One of the fighters, my lord.

[Hopley, J.: Who is the plaintiff?]

W. Austin. He was one of the contestants, and Pedlar Palmer, the other contestant, is going to England. Palmer has been settled with. Palmer is leaving, and Austin wants his evidence. This is a matter of extreme urgency, my lord.

Mr. Gardiner: It is a most extraordinary application.

[Hopley, J.: But the circumstances are extraordinary.]

Mr. Gardiner pointed out that it was only on the previous day that the summons had been served, and it was difficult to know what the plaintiff's case exactly was. The declaration might disclose no grounds of action. Counsel contended that there was not sufficient time to prepare a cross-examination. There had been no pleadings filed, and to grant such an application would be contrary to the practice of the Court.

[Hopley, J.: I must say it is a bit premature. What is your position? Have you got the money?]

Mr. Gardiner: I am not instructed that we have. I submit the plaintiff can have a commission in England.

[Hopley, J.: Who are the other people in the action?]

Mr. Buchanan: The first defendants are the proprietors of the Pavilion, Camp's Bay, where the fight took place.

It was agreed that the amount should be placed in the hands of the Sporting Editor of the "Argus."

[Hopley, J.: Where does the Argus Company come in?]

Their Sporting Editor was acting for them.

[Hopley, J.: How many times has a commission been granted at this stage?]

Not often, my lord. The rule of Court, however, is very wide where a witness is going abroad. The steamer might sink on the voyage, or Pedlar Palmer might die from injuries received in the fight.

[Hopley, J.: Where is the money at present?]

Mr. Alexander: I don't know, my lord. The summons was issued by Thos. Palmer and W. Austin in the first instance, but now a fresh summons has been issued by W. Austin.

[Hopley, J.: There is no allegation of dishonesty. Is the money safe enough?]

Mr. Alexander: The original summons referred to £500. There is no allegation that these people will not be able to pay.

Mr. Buchanan said that when the money was refused after the fight, a summons was issued by Palmer and Austin. There had been a compromise in Palmer's case, and he had withdrawn from the action. The defendants had admitted liability to Palmer, but not to Austin.

[Hopley, J.: I understand the position now. Give me your authorities?]

Mr. Buchanan said, in a case such as the present time was the essence of the whole thing. Counsel then quoted Rule 35 of Court, and contended that it was wide enough to embrace such an application.

[Hopley, J.: There used to be an old rule that it was only when the pleadings were closed such an application would be granted. We have gone so far as to grant it after the declaration has been filed, but now you come with the summons almost red-hot from the Registrar's hands.]

Mr. Buchanan: We say the defendants were the organisers, and they know as much about the case as the plaintiff. I don't think my learned friend will deny that.

[Hopley, J.: He keeps on denying that the "Argus" organised the fight.]

Mr. Gardiner: They did not, my lord.

Mr. Buchanan: Perhaps, then, Mr. Alexander's clients know all about it. I am instructed that defendants have entered an appearance because they know everything about it.

[Hopley, J.: Perhaps it is because they know nothing about it.]

Mr. Buchanan: They can cross-examine the witness to show they know nothing about it. They know that the declaration will merely set out the contract.

[Hopley, J.: Has any Court of Justice ever assisted a party to recover money in a prize fight?]

I think so.

[Hopley, J.: I don't see how many exceptions there may be. Only the other day, I think, there was a prosecution where everybody concerned in a prize fight was charged with manslaughter. At all events, these people are committing assaults on each other. Of course I am only throwing these things out as possibilities.]

The commission will help the defendants considerably in framing their plea.

[Hopley, J.: Is one of the contestants so material a witness as to whether or not the contract was carried out?]

Supposing it is not a fair fight?

[Hopley, J.: Then Palmer and Austin would have to be conspirators in the matter. What likelihood in that case is there of Palmer saying it was a fair and square fight?]

Palmer's evidence would be most material in any case.

He might be going to England or America, any other part of the world. To take his evidence on commission would be more expeditious, and more convenient.

Counsel then proceeded to argue on the application, and contended that it would save expense and a deal of inconvenience to take the evidence at once. It was only within a short time that Austin knew that the promoters had settled with Palmer.

Hopley, J., in refusing the application, with costs, said it would be very unwise to create such a precedent unless there could be shown absolute necessity for doing so. The Rule of Court was wide enough, but it had been controlled by a practice which originally was more strict than it even was now. He did not think in this particular case that the parties were in danger by waiting in the proper course for the pleadings to advance a stage or so. Counsel for the plaintiff seemed to think that his client was the only party to be considered; but here the defendants had been brought into court without any notice whatever, and asked to consent to a commission to be held to-day, and in the meantime to instruct their counsel to defend them in an action in which they had not seen the declaration. While the Court would, in the ordinary course, listen patiently to the case, he did not think he was justified in going out of his way to help people engaged in a prize fight.

LIPSCHITZ AND TOOCH V. } 1904.
SAPIERO. { Aug. 15th.

Trespass—Damages—Cultivated land.

Where a person has the right to enter upon the land of another for the purpose of repairing a watercourse, the right should be exercised in such a manner as to do no unnecessary damage to the land entered upon.

The appellant having such a right, repaired the watercourse by digging up portion of a lucerne field, although there was material available outside the lucerne field, a few yards from the watercourse.

Held, that this constituted a trespass for which the appellant was liable in damages.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Oudtshoorn, the appellants, Lipschitz and Tooch, having been sued in the court below by the respondent, Mondel Sapeiro, for damages, for having wrongfully, unlawfully, and in violation of a certain agreement entered upon the plaintiff's property, made excavations therein, and altered the bed and banks of a certain furrow. The plaintiff sought to recover £20 damages, and was awarded £5 and costs.

From the record in the Court below, it appeared that the parties were owners of property at Disseldorf, in the district of Oudtshoorn. An agreement was entered into in November, 1896, for the maintenance and management of a certain watercourse, Donkey Sluit, flowing past both properties, and for the administration of the agreement a bailiff was appointed. It was alleged that the defendants had employed the bailiff, Daniel van der Berg, to alter the bed and flow of the furrow opposite the property of the plaintiff, who contended that the work was such as to constitute a breach of the agreement. The plaintiff said that the bailiff had gone on to his lucerne camp and dug up considerable portions, and that this had been done solely to oblige the defendants, who had diverted the course of the furrow opposite their property below.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., was for the appellants; Mr. McGregor was for the respondent.

Mr. Schreiner said that the judgment was of considerable importance to the appellants, because it was not merely a matter of damages, but the decision went right down to the root of the appellants' rights. Was the bailiff to be prevented from going on to the land of one of the higher proprietors to put the furrow in order? He was anxious to have from the Appeal court a judgment limiting the ground of the liability, so that it should not be said by these people that the Supreme Court had held the doctrine that the waterman could not go quite properly on these properties, and from a proper place take proper material. This was one of the matters which, if there were Water Courts, should not take up the time of the Supreme Court, but, unfortunately, there were no Water Courts yet. The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, stated that he found that the defendants had authorised the execution of the work complained of. The rights of the parties to the suit were not in dispute.

Without calling upon Mr. McGregor,

De Villiers, C. J.: For the purpose of the decision of this case the Court will assume that the defendants have the right to go upon the plaintiff's property in order to repair the furrow, but that right should be exercised in a reasonable manner, and it is perfectly clear that if the right exist, it exists by virtue of the contract to which Mr. Schreiner has referred, and that contract expressly says that the right shall be exercised with the least injury to the plaintiff. If the defendants have the right to repair this furrow, they certainly have no right to go upon cultivated lucerne land if there is land in the immediate vicinity which is available for the purpose. As to the damages the moderate estimate made by the Magistrate should certainly not be interfered with by the Court. The Court holds that it was a wrongful act to go upon the lucerne lands for the purpose of repairing the furrow, which could have been repaired by means of material taken from a spot twelve yards from this embankment. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Buchanan, J., concurred.

CRIMINAL APPEAL.

REX V. HOPI AND NOPATYELANA

This was an appeal from a conviction and sentence of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Umtata, the appellants having each been found guilty of sheep-stealing, and sentenced to nine months' imprisonment and to pay 15s., the value of the alleged stolen ram. Mr. W. P. Buchanan was for the appellants; Mr. Howel Jones appeared for the Crown.

From the record in the Court below it appeared that the Magistrate had taken the evidence of two witnesses who were related to the prisoners. There was an old-standing land dispute, and bad blood existed between the relatives. The vast majority of the evidence went to show that at the inquiry held soon after the alleged discovery of the remains of the sheep, the complainant, Lwabe, did not even suspect the two prisoners, or, for that matter, the Makweta boys. Mr. W. P. Buchanan for the appellants argued that bearing in mind the whole of the circumstances, he submitted that the Magistrate should have given the accused the benefit of the doubt.

Without calling upon Mr. Jones for the Crown.

De Villiers, C.J.: The ground of appeal in the present case is that the accused ought to have the benefit of the doubt, but if the Magistrate had no doubt whatever, then there was nothing for the appellant to have the benefit of, and the only question now is whether the Magistrate was right in having no doubt on the matter at all. Well, there were two witnesses for the prosecution who positively stated that they saw the two accused going to a certain spot and throwing something into the marsh, and that upon going to the spot these two witnesses saw the skin of the sheep which had been stolen. It is simply a question of credibility. A host of witnesses were called for the defence to show that Montanana's subsequent conduct was inconsistent with his evidence, but, as the Magistrate said, these witnesses were in some way related to the Makweta boys, and wanted to protect all the boys in the hut. Upon this evidence I think the Court would not be justified in interfering with the decision of the Magistrate. I may add that the proceedings had been confirmed in the Eastern Districts Court by one of the judges in that Court. The appeal will be dismissed.

Lien—Jus retentionis—Artificer—Removal of goods.

Where an artificer who has manufactured an article from materials belonging to another has voluntarily delivered the article to the owner, he loses his right of retention or lien, and is not entitled to claim an attachment of the article pending an action for his wages, nor is he entitled to an order restraining the removal of the article to another place within the jurisdiction of the Court in the absence of proof that he would be prejudiced in his rights by such removal.

Mr. Alexander moved, as a matter of urgency, for a rule nisi temporarily interdicting the removal of certain goods now lying at the Cape Town Railway Station, pending an action to be brought by the five petitioners for money alleged to be due for work done. The matter, it was stated by counsel, had already been before His Lordship the Chief Justice in Chambers. The goods were still in the hands of a third party, the Railway Department of the Colonial Government, and they might send them away from the jurisdiction of this Court, although, counsel admitted, they were intended to be sent to Kimberley. The petitioners said that the respondent Yates had not only refused to pay them the money owing to them, but he had threatened them with assault for applying to him. His refusal to pay showed mala fides.

[De Villiers, C.J.: No, only that he denies the debt.]

I ask only for a rule nisi, and I am quite willing that the costs of this application should abide the result of the trial.

De Villiers, C.J.: The applicants allege that they have a lien or right of retention in respect of the chains made by them for the respondent, but they admit that the chains have been delivered to the respondent, and they do not allege that the respondent obtained the chains by fraudulent or other illegal means or that he is in insolvent circumstances, or that there is any danger of his removing the chains out of the jurisdiction. The applicants intend to bring an action for the amount due to them for their skill and labour in the manufacture of the claims, and, if their statements are correct, they would have had a right of retention until payment of the amount due to them. But this right ceased upon their voluntarily delivering the chains to the respondent, and I therefore refused an application for the attachment of the goods based upon the applicants' alleged lien. They now apply for an order restraining the respondent from removing the chains to Kimberley pending the action, but, in the absence of any proof that the applicants would be prejudiced by such removal, I am not prepared to make the order.

CONRADIE V. GRAY. { 1904.
{ Aug. 16th.

Pounds Act—Damages for trespass—Pound-master—Notice to owner.

Oxen belonging to one V. trespassed on the plaintiff's lucerne field and did considerable damage. At the time of the trespass the oxen were in charge of the driver of V.'s wagon, and due notice that the plaintiff intended to have the damages assessed by arbitration was given to the driver in terms of the 36th section (sub-section 1) of Act 15 of 1892. Notice was also given to the defendant, as pound-master of the pound, in which the plaintiff impounded the oxen, that proceedings for the assessment of damages were being taken and that the oxen were not to be released, but, notwithstanding such notice, the defendant delivered the cattle to V. on payment of pound fees only.

Held, that notice to the driver, as caretaker, was sufficient notice to the owner, and that on assessment of the damages by arbitrators, the plaintiff was entitled under the 35th section to recover the amount from the defendant.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Tulbagh. The appellant Conradie, who is pound-master of the field cornetcy of Breede River, had been sued by the respondent, James Gray, farmer, Waverley, for damages to lucerne land by oxen, and had been ordered to pay £5 15s. damages, less 15s. paid on account, with costs of suit.

From the record in the Court below it appeared that certain ten head of cattle belonging to one Vergotynner, of Ceres, trespassed on the lucerne lands of the plaintiff, Gray. Gray waited for the owner, but none turned up, and he then handed the stock over to the charge of the pound-master, who impounded the cattle, but subsequently—next day—the stock were released and given over to the owner. The plaintiff sued the pound-master as and for damages sustained to lucerne lands under section 35 of the Pounds Act (15 of 1892). He said that the pound-master owed him £15 15s., and neglected and refused to pay the said sum, made up thus: Damages to lucerne land, £15; arbitrators' fees, 15s.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said it appeared clear that there was cause of action against the defendant, the pound-master, for release of the cattle after so short a period from the date of the cattle being impounded, but, inasmuch as the award was only made with one landowner, with a Justice of the Peace as umpire, and the award was beyond what it was probable the damages committed by Vergotynner's cattle were, and that damage had been caused by other cattle, the Court would award £5 as a reasonable amount for damage to lucerne by ten oxen in a field for five or six hours at the most.

Mr. Burton (for appellant): The plaintiff in the Court below relies upon the provision in the Pounds' Act as to claiming damages from the pound-master. Since he claims under that Act he must be held bound by its provisions. With these provisions he has not complied, and therefore cannot claim damages under the Act. Sections 32 and 35 are particularly clear. As to assessment of damages see section 38. The plaintiff, having elected to have his damages assessed under section 36, was bound to comply strictly with the provisions of that section. No notice was given as presented by sub-section (1). The plaintiffs treated the man in charge of the animals as the owner. He knew Vergotynner to be the owner and he could easily have sent a note to him as he was only 7 miles away. Instead of doing that he sends a message by Jonker who gave the message to a wagon-driver.

[Buchanan, J.: Was not that Pietrus Vergotynner?]

It does not appear that it was. The owner of the animals heard nothing about arbitration until it had been concluded and hence he had no opportunity of appointing an arbitrator in terms of sub-section (2). Thus the very object of the Act was defeated. If the pound-master had released the cattle, as the plaintiff wished him to do, he might have got into trouble with the owner of the animals. The plaintiff elected to avail himself of a special privilege granted by the Pounds' Act, and that being so he should have complied strictly with the provisions of that Act. Under section 35 the pound-master was not bound to detain the cattle after the arbitration. The plaintiff gave no notice to the Field Cornet, he called in a J.P., but that is not the same.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The sub-section says the Field Cornet or a J.P.]

Yes, but preferably the Field Cornet. The sub-section as to notice speaks specially of the Field Cornet.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you say that notice must have reached the owner of the cattle trespassing within 24 hours?]

Yes.

[Buchanan, J.: Notice was given to his servant.]

That is not sufficient. The object of the provisions of the Act as to notice is to give the opposite party an opportunity of appointing an arbitrator. Here the defendant had no opportunity of doing so; and has he had not, the arbitration was invalid and plaintiff was not entitled to damages.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Within what time may they assess damages?]

The Act does not fix a time but the defendant must have an opportunity of appointing an arbitrator.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the respondent): Notice to the man in charge of the cattle was notice to the owner. The pound-master could not adjudicate as to whether a proper mode of procedure had been adopted or not. If the owner merely sends a notice to the pound-master and takes no steps with a view to arbitration, the pound-master has no power to release. In this case there has been a substantial compliance with the terms of the Act. A J.P. can assess damages equally with the Field Cornet. See sub-section (2) and (3) by which we must interpret sub-section (1) of section 36. As to notice to the owner, this notice need not necessarily be sent either by post, or wire, or in writing. The person in charge of cattle is the owner's agent.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would that apply to a shepherd?]

Certainly: the owner might be living anywhere.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He might be; but in this case he was close at hand.]

That makes no difference as to the legal position of the parties.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the owner is known, notice must be given to him. If he is not known, no notice to him personally is required. The only damages you can recover are those assessed by an arbitrator.]

How is it possible to give notice to the owner if he is many miles away? Even a legal summons can be served at a man's last known place of residence, and if the owner is travelling from place to place, the person in possession stands in the place of the owner.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Here the true owner was known.]

Not to the respondent: he thought that P. Vergotynner was the owner.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But you were bound to give him a chance of appointing an arbitrator. If you did not know the owner you should have proceeded as the Act directs.]

It was known who the owner was: at least we thought we knew who he was. Section 3 says that the caretaker is to be considered the owner.

Mr. Burton (in reply): I admit that that section escaped my notice. Of course it makes a great difference. But there is no evidence that notice was given to Pietrus Vergotynner.

De Villiers, C.J.: Considerable time would have been saved in this case if the Court had been referred to section 3 of the Act, which defines the owner as being the proprietor of any animal or the agent or caretaker of the proprietor. This interpretation removes all the objections which have been pointed out to the construction contended for on behalf of the plaintiff. Under section 35 the pound-master is clearly liable in case of the release of any animal which had trespassed, without payment of the damage or trespass money. It was proved in the present case that the pound-master had written notice that it was the intention of the plaintiff to claim, not the ordinary trespass money, but special damages for entering the lucerne land. The pound-master, knowing that, chose to allow the owner to obtain these animals. Now, I quite agree with Mr. Burton that the plaintiff could not recover damages from the pound-master unless he had taken the proper steps to entitle him to recover from the owner of the animals. He contends that as no notice had been given to the owner in terms of the 1st sub-section of the 36th section the subsequent assessment of damages was wholly illegal. The definition of the word "owner" given in the 3rd section removes this objection because due notice was given to the driver of the wagon who was found alone at the wagon and may fairly be regarded as the caretaker of the animals. A further question has been raised whether the fact that the Magistrate ignored the assessment and awarded the amount of damages himself prevents the plaintiff from succeeding under the 35th section. The damages as awarded were less than the amount of the assessment.

If there had been a cross-appeal by the respondent, the Court would probably have supported that cross-appeal. The award had been made in a proper way, and the damages had been duly assessed, and the Court would probably have awarded damages for £15, and the fact that the Magistrate went wrong on that point did not justify the Court in reversing his decision in regard to the £5. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Buchanan, J., concurred.

Partnership—Liability for partnership debts.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of the Paarl, the appellant and one Epstein having been sued in the Court below by the respondents for £48 2s. 9d., goods sold and delivered, and ordered to pay that amount.

It appeared from the record in the Court below that the defendant had denied liability, as well as a partnership alleged in the summons between Uys and Epstein. The defendant Epstein was in default at the trial. The goods were sold and delivered to the Paarl Model Mineral Baths and Sanatorium of Fairview, Lady Grey Bridge Station, of which concern Uys was alleged to be a partner with Epstein, and it was also stated that Uys had given orders on several occasions for goods for the baths.

Mr. Upington (for appellant): In this case the Magistrate found that there was a partnership and that the conduct of the parties supported the assumption. I contend that in default of an agreement as to profit and loss there can be no partnership. As to holding out, there is a difference between the case of a man who does not notify his retirement from a partnership and that of a man who merely allows his name to be used.

[Buchanan, J.: This is one of the strongest cases of holding out that you can have. Here the partners order goods and have them booked in their joint names.]

Two men went into a shop and ordered goods to be booked to Uys and Epstein. Neither of the two said that he was either the Uys or the Epstein in question. The creditor ought to have made enquiries as to whom he was dealing with.

Mr. Close (for respondents) was not called upon.

De Villiers, C.J.: This was an action for goods supplied to the defendants, Uys and Epstein, by the plaintiffs, from the 19th March to the 10th September, 1903. It is quite clear from the evidence, and especially from the document marked "A," that the defendants, Uys and Epstein, believed themselves to be partners. They called themselves partners in the document. Not only that, they issued cards upon which the words "Uys and Epstein" appear, and it is quite clear that the Uys and Epstein referred to were the defendant and Epstein. That is perfectly clear. It is not suggested that there was any other firm of Uys and Epstein, and seeing that this document treats them as partners they must have intended by the names on the cards Uys and Epstein to have referred to themselves. These two defendants went together to the plaintiffs' shop, and they there ordered goods, but now it is said that Epstein had already begun purchasing before the two came together. That might affect the item before they came together, but there was a clear ratification by Uys on the 26th March of the purchase made between the 19th and that date. He had given cards in which the partnership appeared, and he said these goods were to be supplied for the partnership. In my opinion, there was ample evidence to justify the Magistrate in coming to the conclusion that credit was given to both defendants. Clearly, both the defendant and Epstein were the persons meant by Uys and Epstein appearing on the card. Under the circumstances, I am of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Buchanan, J., concurred.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

TRIAL CAUSE.

GARAGE CONTINENTAL CO., { 1904
LTD. V. VAN DER RIET. { Aug. 16th.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs, the Garage Continental Co., Ltd., of Cape Town, sued the defendant, Joseph van der Riet, to recover the sum of £536—£500 the purchase price of a certain motor-car, alleged by the plaintiff company to have been sold to the defendant. The rest of the claim was made up of £36, amount due for work done, and material supplied in connection with a couple of other cars, which were stored for him, and attended from time to time by the plaintiff company. The defendant, in reconvention, claimed £150 for damages sustained in consequence of the plaintiffs refusing to hand over to him two motor-cars, stored by him on their premises.

The plaintiffs' declaration stated that they were a limited liability company, carrying on business at Cape Town as the Garage Continental, Ltd. The defendant was Joseph van der Riet, of Cape Town. On or about the 28th March last plaintiffs received from Messrs. I. and J. Hermann a certain motor-car, called the "Comfortable" car. A few days after the defendant came with a representative of the firm of I. and J. Hermann, and informed Mr. Hoeschen, the plaintiffs' manager, that he (the defendant) had purchased the car from I. and J. Hermann, and the defendant requested the plaintiffs to store the car at the Garage for the sum of £2 10s. a month. At the time plaintiffs received the car, it was not in perfect order, and the plaintiffs, on the defendant's behalf, put it in perfect order. On or about the 20th April, Mr. Hoeschen drove the defendant to Hout Bay in a car called the Benz Parsifal, belonging to plaintiffs, for the purchase of which the defendant was then in treaty. The next day the defendant purchased the car for £500, promising to pay on the 15th May, until which time defendant requested plaintiffs to keep the car. Defendant did not pay the amount, but had put plaintiffs off with promises and various excuses. About the last week in April the defendant took the Benz Parsifal from the Garage to Kraaifontein for a drive, and took upon himself the risk and responsibility for plaintiffs, being compelled to send a man unacquainted with the management of the car to drive it. On or about 27th April plaintiffs, at defendant's request, caused the Benz Parsifal to be fetched from D'Urban-road, at which place defendant had left it, broken down. The plaintiffs had in their possession three cars belonging to defendant stored at defendant's request, which they would deliver up on payment of the sum of £536 12s.

The defendant in his plea and claim in reconvention stated that he admitted the first and second paragraphs of the declaration with regard to paragraphs 3, 4, and 5, and he stated that in or about the beginning of April he took over from Messrs. I. and J. Hermann for a debt a certain motor-car called the "Comfortable" car, then stored with plaintiffs. It was agreed that the car should be delivered to defendant after certain repairs were effected by plaintiff on behalf of Messrs. I. and J. Hermann. These repairs were effected by plaintiffs, and delivery of the car was on the 15th April taken from them by defendant, who then arranged for the storage of the car by plaintiff at the rate of £2 10s. per month. Defendant admitted that after April 15 he on various occasions took out the car, and that at divers times after that date he arranged to have certain repairs done to the car. Defendant admitted that towards the end of April Hoeschen invited him for a drive to Hout's Bay in the Benz Parsifal car, and then attempted to sell the car to him, but he denied that he ever purchased the car. He further stated that in or about the month of May Hoeschen agreed with Hermann to take Hermann and defendant to Kraaifontein. Hoeschen did not keep his appointment, and on Hermann and defendant reaching the Garage, one Bloch, an employee of the plaintiffs' firm, offered and did drive them out to Kraaifontein in the Parsifal car, which broke down at D'Urban-road on the return journey. Defendant was not liable in any way for the injury to or the fetching of that car, nor for any expenses in connection with the journey. Defendant denied the correctness of the account and disputed his indebtedness, with the exception of certain of the items, amounting to £15 11s. Defendant admitted that plaintiffs had two motor-cars, viz., the Comfortable car and a Kudell (De Dion) car, belonging to him, in their possession. He had frequently before the action was brought demanded delivery of the same, and offered to pay the sum of £15 11s., but plaintiffs had refused to accept that sum or deliver the cars. They had wrongfully set up the claim, and had wrongfully and unlawfully detained the cars, whereby the defendant had been deprived of the use and possession of and profit derivable from the cars, and had thereby suffered damage in the sum of £150. Defendant said that he was now justified in refusing to pay over to plaintiff the sum of £15 11s., and was entitled to bring it up in account in this action against the sum claimed by him.

Plaintiffs' replication and plea to claim in reconvention stated:

1. For a replication to the defendant's plea, the plaintiffs say that, save as to admissions therein contained and of the plaintiffs' cause of action, the plaintiffs deny all and singular the allegations of fact and conclusions of law in the defendant's plea contained, and deny specially that the defendant has suffered the alleged or any damage for which the plaintiffs are liable, join issue thereon, and again pray for judgment in terms of their declaration.

2. And for a plea to the claim in reconvention, the plaintiffs (now defendants in reconvention) say that they crave leave to refer to the matters pleaded above and in the declaration in this suit, and by reason thereof they join issue upon the said claim, except in so far as liability to plaintiffs is therein admitted, and save as above, pray that it may be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. McGregor (with him Mr. Struben), for plaintiff. Mr. W. P. Buchanan, for defendant.

Karl Hoeschen, manager to the plaintiff company, stated the defendant purchased the "Comfortable" car, which had been stored at plaintiffs' store by Messrs. I. and J. Hermann. Plaintiffs' firm did certain repairs to the machine before it was handed over. He put a new tube on one of the wheels. When defendant had the car a short time, witness put a new tube on another wheel. Defendant hired some of witness's men to teach him to drive the car. Plaintiffs agreed to store and lubricate the car at the rate of £2 10s. per month; all the repairs were to be paid for. The witness (continuing) gave evidence as to the alleged sale of the car to the defendant, which he stated occurred after a drive in the Benz Parsifal car to Hout Bay. The defendant promised to pay on the 15th May, but he did not. Witness then asked him for payment, and he replied that he was expecting a cheque from the military, and that when he got it, he would pay for the car. He, however, never paid for it. The sum of £36 was made up of "extras" for the use of the car.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Witness's firm, first of all, had the car repaired for Messrs. I. and J. Hermann. Defendant took the car over. Before he took the car, he said there were certain repairs he wished to have completed. They were done. Witness was very anxious to sell the Benz Parsifal. The defendant asked him to drive him round to Hout Bay in it. Witness did not offer to do so until asked. The sale occurred on the 22nd April. In the account witness sent to defendant in June, he did not charge for the motor-car, but he mentioned it in the letter sent to defendant which accompanied the account. Witness agreed to take the "Comfortable" car from him in part payment. He agreed to allow him £75 for it. The defendant was represented to witness as a man of means, and he spoke glibly of cheques for thousands of pounds. Every time witness saw defendant, he asked him for the cheque.

James Marcus Smith, bookkeeper, in the plaintiff company, stated he saw the defendant in the store towards the end of March. He told witness he had purchased the "Comfortable" car from I. and J. Hermann. After some time defendant told witness that he had purchased the "Benz Parsifal" car from the plaintiff firm. Defendant, after purchasing it, used to use the "Comfortable" car. He also used the Parsifal car. About the 29th May, witness saw defendant in company with Hoeschen, at Somerset. They were driving the Parsifal. Defendant took the Parsifal car out, with Bloch driving it. Plaintiffs would not allow Bloch to drive it unless defendant took responsibility. He did so, and took the car out. Defendant seemed very proud of the car, and showed it to all his friends. He used to take his friends down to the Garage to see it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Defendant asked plaintiffs to send the Benz Parsifal car out with him, as he intended buying it. He was debited with the cost of the car on the 22nd April.

Mr. Buchanan said that in view of what had been suggested by the Court, his client would go into the box and give his version of what happened.

James Smith (recalled) stated that it was on the 22nd April that the defendant bought the car. Hoeschen took the defendant round to Hout Bay.

Jacob Bloch, motor engineer, employed by the plaintiff company, stated that the car was bought by the defendant. Witness asked defendant to give him the job of driving the car. The defendant said he paid £500 for the car. He added that Hoeschen promised him two covers and tubes.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: It was after the defendant bought the car they went to Kraaifontein. There was no mention of giving the other car in exchange. The defendant did not know that witness could drive the Parsifal car.

Another witness stated that the defendant asked for the Parsifal car, but he explained that Mr. Hoeschen was to drive the car himself. The defendant said that he had bought the car, and that he was entirely responsible. The last time he saw defendant was on the 6th July, when he was creating a noise at the place.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He saw Hoeschen making the entry on the day of the sale. He was certain Herman said that the defendant had paid for the car, and he allowed the car to leave the place on the strength of that arrangement.

Albert Wm. Applegate, motorist, formerly in the employ of the plaintiff company, stated that when he was out with the defendant, he said that he would like to buy the Parsifal car. He had seen the defendant out driving in the car at Hout Bay. The defendant told him that he was going to buy the car for £500.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: When the defendant was at Hout Bay witness understood that he had bought the car after a satisfactory trial.

Mr. McGregor closed his case.

The defendant said that he agreed to build six houses for Hermann at £150 each. It was arranged that he should take the "Comfortable" car for £150 in part payment. He denied purchasing the Parsifal car for £500.

By Hopley, J.: Hoeschen really took him out in the car to get further evidence that witness had bought the car.

Mr. Buchanan closed his case and having been heard in argument on the facts, Hopley, J., said that there was no law in the case. It was purely a question of fact, and it would be sufficient to say that he believed the evidence for the plaintiffs, and disbelieved the evidence for the defendant. There would be judgment for the plaintiff, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

NATIONAL BANK V.
GRAAF.

{ 1904.
Aug. 17th.
" 18th.

Principal and surety—Construction of contract—Interest.

The defendants, as sureties and co-principal debtors, undertook to pay to the plaintiff Bank on demand all sums of money which the principal debtor should from time to time owe to the Bank, "provided, nevertheless, that the total amount to be recoverable from them shall not exceed in the whole the sum of £3,900, together with such further sum for interest, charges and costs as shall from time to time have accrued or become due and payable thereon."

Held, that the defendants were liable for interest on the debtor's overdraft of £3,900 for the whole period covered by the guarantee and not merely from the date of demand for payment made on them.

This was an action in which the plaintiffs sought to recover from Mr. Graaff the sum of £4,581 5s. 2d., with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. thereon from the 31st March, 1904, upon a certain guarantee signed by the defendant and Sir James Sivewright, for advances to the Cape Canning Company. Sir James, it was stated, had not been summoned, and was not before the Court.

The declaration set out that on or about the 15th August, 1898, the defendants, in consideration of the plaintiffs allowing a certain company, styled the Cape Canning Company, Limited carrying on business in Cape Town, certain banking facilities, jointly and severally bound themselves in writing as sureties, and co-principal debtors for repayment on demand by plaintiffs of any sum or sums of money which the said company may from time to time owe or become chargeable to the plaintiffs for, including commission, discount, and all other usual charges, provided that such amount so guaranteed should not exceed in the whole £3,900, together with such further sum for interest, charges and costs, as should from time to time have accrued or become due and payable thereon. Thereafter the plaintiffs, in terms of the said guarantee, allowed the Canning Company certain banking facilities, and from time to time advanced sums of money to the company, and permitted it to overdraw its account at the plaintiff bank, the amount so advanced, with interest and charges thereon being £4,581 5s. 2d., which amount was still due and owing. Plaintiffs, in terms of the guarantee, claimed payment of the said amount, with interest and charges thereon, from the defendants, one paying the other to be absolved.

The defendant, in his plea, admitted the guarantee, and that banking facilities were granted by the plaintiffs to the Canning Company. He said that on the 20th November, 1903, the plaintiffs demanded that the defendant should liquidate the overdraft. He tendered on the 13th May, 1904, to pay £3,900, together with interest from the 20th November, 1903, taxed costs to the 13th May, 1904, which tender he now repeated, but he refused to pay the amount claimed in the declaration.

Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Sutton) was for the plaintiffs; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Van Zyl), was for the defendant, D. P. de Villiers Graaff.

Mr. Upington said he took it that the real point was as to the construction of the guarantee, whether the clause upon which, apparently, the defendant relied—i.e., that his liability was not to exceed in the whole £3,900, together with such further sum for interest, charges, and costs—was to be read as if the interest, charges, and costs were only to accrue from the date upon which liquidation of the overdraft was demanded.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is no question raised as to compound interest?]

Well, they don't admit the guarantee of the amount claimed, but they don't specifically raise the point.

Mr. Schreiner said that his client's position was that he did not admit the correctness of the amount. They rested on the plea that plaintiffs only demanded from the defendant on the 20th November, 1903, and the defendant tendered to the bank on the 13th May, 1904, with taxed costs to date, the amount of £3,900, with interest. Their position was that, between the bank and the Canning Company, it was current custom to charge compound interest from month to month, and add the compound interest to the amount of the overdraft, and that when the stop came in November, 1903, and the plaintiffs demanded from the sureties that they should pay, the plaintiffs could not go on charging compound interest from that date. The defendant was prepared to pay ordinary interest from the date when the plaintiffs made the demand. He (counsel) could not get away from this, that it was customary for the bank to state the monthly overdraft, and to state interest on it. His position really was this, that the defendant admitted that in respect of the overdraft, in accordance with banking custom, the plaintiffs would be justified in adding interest monthly upon the amount of the overdraft, but did not admit that compound interest might be charged against him in respect of the period after the demand was made upon him for payment by the bank under his guarantee.

Wm. Clarke Cruikshank, manager of the plaintiff bank, said that in August, 1898, the Canning Co. were granted banking facilities, and in consideration thereof, a guarantee was given by the defendants. Witness produced an extract from the bank's books showing the state of the Canning Company's account, and said the memorandum of account annexed to the declaration was prepared under his supervision. On the 30th November, 1901, the company's overdraft, including interest, was shown to be £3,900. After that date until the 31st March, 1904, no amounts were included for further advances, but compound interest was added monthly, in accordance with banking custom. About August or September last year they made a demand on the Canning Company to liquidate the account. On the 20th November, 1903, they wrote to the defendant, Graaff, demanding liquidation of the sum of £4,580, plus interest, Mr.

Graaff and Sir J. Sivewright were directors of the Canning Company. In May last the defendant Graaff, through his attorneys, tendered £3,900, plus interest.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The account showed that in October, 1898, the overdraft had already exceeded £3,900. The overdraft had never really been below £3,900 since October, 1898. For a few days in November, 1901, it sank below that figure, but a short time after that it rose again. There was no advance made to the Canning Company after November, 1901. The company's account was daily operated upon, until December, 1902, when the business was given up.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why, if the overdraft was £3,900 in October, 1898, did you not commence the compound interest from that date?]

Because the interest had been debited in the interval, and the interest was merged in the principal. The £3,900 included both principal and interest.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was the amount of £3,900 in November, 1901, both capital and interest?]

Yes, that is so.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Just so. Then why didn't you start the compound interest from the date of the guarantee?]

We did, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Not against Graaff?]

Yes, because it had been debited to the account monthly.

Witness afterwards said that if they had charged compound interest from October, 1898, it would have meant that they would be charging interest twice over.

Further cross-examined: They made no demand upon Mr. Graaff until November, 1903. The bank contended that the guarantors were liable for principal and interest from the date of the guarantee.

Mr. Schreiner remarked that his client's position was that he was only liable for interest from the 20th November, 1903, when the first demand was made upon him, whereas the plaintiffs charged him with interest from the 1st November, 1901.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Isn't that a question of construction of the documents?]

Mr. Schreiner: That is so, largely.

In further cross-examination witness admitted that the plaintiffs looked to a guarantee of £1,000 given by Mr. Strasburger, the managing director, to make up any deficit, after they had been paid by the other guarantors. They regarded Strasburger's guarantee as a fair one. He believed the guarantors were all covered by the Canning Company's assets. He admitted that the more the bank got from Graaff and Sivewright the more was Strasburger's liability diminished.

Counsel then addressed the Court in argument on the facts.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (Aug. 18th).

De Villiers, C.J.: The question for decision in this case is what is the true construction of a proviso to an undertaking given by the defendants to the plaintiff bank by sureties for the Cape Canning Co. The proviso reads as follows: "Provided, nevertheless, that the total amount to be recoverable from us hereunder shall not exceed, in the whole, the sum of £3,900, together with such further sum for interest, charges, and costs, as shall from time to time have accrued or become due and payable thereon." It would appear that it is the custom of banks in the case of overdrafts, such as that which was made to the Cape Canning Co., to charge compound interest on the amount of the overdraft, the interest being reckoned on the monthly balance, and to the monthly balances being added interest of the previous month. The defendant Graaff has candidly made the following admission: "That defendant admits that in respect of the current account of the Canning Co. the bank would, by custom and course of dealing, of which he was aware, be justified in adding interest monthly upon the amount of the overdraft, but does not admit that compound interest may be charged against him in respect of the period after demand was made upon him by the bank for payment under his guarantee." The plaintiffs' contention is that so long as the guarantee subsisted, the defendants were liable for whatever the Cape Canning Co. was liable, and that, inasmuch as the Canning Co. would, under the ordinary custom, be liable for the compound interest for the whole of the period, the defendants incurred a similar liability. The defendants contend that the meaning of the proviso is that interest shall only run from the date when notice was given to the defendants by the bank that the amount of the guarantee was to be paid. Mr. Schreiner greatly relies upon the fact that under the guarantee the moneys to be paid were to be paid on demand, and that in the first portion of the undertaking there is a statement that the amount to be paid is to include interest, discount, commission, law costs, stamps, and all other necessary and usual charges and expenses, and he contends that these charges cannot be supposed to be included in the subsequent proviso. In my opinion the Court should give effect to the grammatical meaning of the words used, and should, if possible, give effect to every portion of this contract. The reading contended for on behalf of the defendant would seem to ignore altogether the words, "together with such further sum for interest charges, and costs as shall from time to time have accrued, and shall become due and payable thereon." In other words he would read this proviso as if these words which I have just read had been omitted altogether, because interest would be payable from the date of demand, and there would be no necessity whatever for adding "together with such further sum," etc. To my mind it is clear that the grammatical and ordinary meaning of these words is that there shall be added to the £3,900 such further sum for interest, charges, and costs as shall have accrued during the currency of the guarantee upon this amount of £3,900. An account has been put in which shows that in February, 1901, that is, some years after the guarantee had been given, the amount had reached £3,900. From that date all the charges for interest had been added, and ultimately the amount of £3,900 reached £4,581 5s. 2d. In my opinion, in these amounts are included all the interest, charges, and costs which under the proviso may be added to the sum of £3,900. Then a further question has been raised as to whether from the date when notice was given to the defendants compound interest should be charged or simple interest. It appears to me, however, that the admission made by the defendants, which I have already read, would be sufficient to render the defendants liable also for the compound interest after the date when they received notice. The concluding portion of the guarantee reads as follows: "And we renounce the beneficium ordinis seu excussionis et divisionis, and agree and declare that this guarantee is to be in addition and without prejudice to any other sureties now or hereafter to be held from the said debtor, and that it shall remain in force as a continuing security, notwithstanding any intermediate settlement of account, and notwithstanding the death or legal disability of any of us, until the Cape Town branch of the said bank shall have received notice from us, or from our respective executors, trustees, or other legal representatives as the case may be, terminating the same, and until the sum or sums due or to become due or accruing at the date of the receipt of such notice shall have been paid." The guarantee, therefore, is to be a continuing security until the money has been paid, and if the Canning Co. would have been liable, as it is admitted they were, for the compound interest after notice had been given to the defendants, I am afraid that that liability would continue to attach to the sureties. The question has been raised whether the contract of suretyship should receive a strict interpretation or otherwise, but questions of this nature can only arise where there is any doubt as to the meaning of the words used. If in their ordinary reasonable grammatical sense the sureties undertake a liability commensurate with that of the principal, the Court should not, out of a tenderness for the sureties, apply a construction which the parties themselves could not have intended. In my opinion, it is reasonably clear that the construction contended for by the plaintiffs is the correct one, and that judgment should be given for the plaintiffs as prayed.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

STABLEFORD V. RIMMEL. { 1904.
Aug. 17th.

This was an action in which the plaintiff sued for £26 9s. 6d., being an amount due by certain boarders, whom the defendant guaranteed to pay for. The two boarders disappeared without paying, and now the action was instituted against the guarantor.

Mr. M. de Villiers was for the plaintiff, and there was no appearance put in by the defendant. Counsel said when he applied on a previous occasion, under Rule 32nd, for judgment for £26 9s. 6d., which was owing by the defendant on a guarantee that he would be responsible for two boarders, whom he introduced to the plaintiff, the Chief Justice ordered the case to stand over to enable the defendant to file a plea, and he suggested that the parties might try and arrive at a settlement in the meanwhile. The defendant had filed a plea in which he set out that he was released by the plaintiff from liability. Counsel now reverted to the original position, and applied for judgment.

Evidence having been given by the plaintiff,

Hopley, J., granted judgment, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ADMISSION. { 1904.
Aug. 18th.

Mr. De Waal moved for the admission of Jacobus Faure Rousseau as an attorney and notary.

Application granted and oaths administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

BOTH A V. BUCKLEY.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £4,500, and for the property hypothecated to be declared executable, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

ARONSTAIN V. MAISEL.

Mr. Gardiner moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon a judgment of this Court for £100 and the costs, amounting to about £70. Goods to the value of about £25 had been attached, and no other property had been found by or pointed out to the Court Messenger.

Mr. M. de Villiers (for the respondent) applied for a postponement. The respondent, he said, had been arrested on a warrant at Port Elizabeth upon a statement that he was going to leave the jurisdiction of this Court, and was going to Johannesburg. He asked for leave for the defendant to be conveyed to Cape Town.

Case postponed until the 31st August, but no order as to defendant's removal to Cape Town from Port Elizabeth.

ESTATE FARMER V. SELDON.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £140 upon certain conditions of sale, with interest and costs, plaintiff tendering transfer.

Defendant admitted that he owed the money.

Order granted.

BOARD OF EXECUTORS V. VAN SCHALKWYK.

Mr. D. Buchanan said it seemed that in this matter the summons was served on the day after the defendant was required to enter appearance. He read an affidavit from which it appeared that the defendant had instructed an agent to sell his farm in September, and that the Board of Executors had agreed to stay proceedings on being vested with defendant's general power of attorney. The agent had replied that they could not get the necessary documents down in time, and suggested that the Board should dispense with the general power. Further correspondence took place, and the negotiations eventually collapsed. Counsel submitted that the defendant, through his agent, had waived any right to a fresh service of summons. He now moved for provisional sentence on the mortgage bond.

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant was summoned to appear on the 1st

August, and was only served with the summons on the 2nd August. The negotiations which took place could not amount to waiver by the defendant of his right to proper service. Provisional sentence will, therefore, be refused.

WIBER V. VAN WEENEN.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £2,000, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

FEDERAL SUPPLY AND COLD STORAGE CO. V. LOGAN BROS.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for the final adjudication of the defendants' estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

ESTATE BAM V. TALANDA.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence for £112 on a certain lease, bearing rent for four months, at £28 per month.

Order granted.

MEYER V. CORNELIS AND BRAAF.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence for £110 on certain conditions of sale, with interest. There was a defect of service in the case of Cornelis Braaf. Counsel asked for judgment at present against Willem Braaf.

Order granted against W. Braaf, the case against the other partner to stand over pending further inquiries as to service of summons.

BOTES AND STEYTLER V. VENTER AND NAUDE.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for a provisional order of sequestration to be superseded.

Provisional order superseded accordingly.

LANDSBERG V. WILSNACH.

BRACHT V. HANSEN AND SCHRADER AND WAITE V. HANSEN AND SCHRADER.

Mr. D. Buchanan applied for the appointment of a commission de bene esse to take the evidence of a witness in Johannesburg.

Mr. Gardiner, who appeared for the defendants, raised no objection.

The order was granted, Mr. Saul Solomon being appointed commissioner.

STEYTLER V. KHAN.

Mr. Struben applied for an order authorizing the High Sheriff to pass transfer of certain property. He said petitioner obtained judgment against the defendant for a sum of £400 on a certain mortgage bond. He had arranged for the sale of the property for £600, which was a very good price, but the High Sheriff would not pass transfer without the sanction of the Court.

The order was granted, subject to the High Sheriff being satisfied that the price was the best obtainable.

DAVIDS V. ESTAIE DAVIDS.

Mr. Roux, on behalf of the plaintiff, applied for leave to sue in forma pauperis.

Granted.

JAMES V. FREDERIKSON.

Mr. Upington, on behalf of the applicant, applied for an order to restrain the defendant from selling certain landed property. Plaintiff was one of three heirs, to whom this land, situate at Um-tata, was left. They undertook to pay off all the debts in connection with the estate. The object of the defendant, the applicant alleged, was to purchase the property himself at a cheap rate.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan said he had just been briefed for the defence, and he asked for the adjournment of the case to enable defendants to reply to the affidavit.

The application was granted.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

VERMAAK V. VERMAAK. { 1904.
Aug. 19th.
" 22nd.

Will—Construction—Children—Grandchildren.

Husband and wife, by their joint will, bequeathed certain farms after the death of the survivor to the collective children (gezamenlijke kinderen) of the marriage, on condition that the farms should remain "perpetual family property so long as the law would allow it" to be possessed in succession by the male descendants of the testators' children aforesaid. At the time of the survivor's death there were several sons and daughters living, but one daughter C. had died during the lifetime of both testators, and her sons now claimed the life interest in the share which their mother would have enjoyed for her life if she had survived the testators.

Held, that it sufficiently appeared from the context of the will that in appointing their children as fiduciary legatees, the testators had regard to descendants of a remoter degree than the first, and intended to include children of their deceased daughter C.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, Frederick H. Luyt, in his capacity as the executor dative of the late Sina Philippina Jacomina Vermaak (born Kachelhoffer), and Ignatius Wilhelmus Ferreira, in his capacity as father and natural guardian of his minor sons, Gert Matthew Ferreira and Johannes Vermaak Ferreira, against Michael Anthony Muller, in his capacity as the executor testamentary of the estate of the late Johannes Cornelius Vermaak, to obtain construction of the codicil of a certain will made by the late Johannes Cornelius Vermaak.

The plaintiffs' declaration was as follows:

1. Before and on the 30th May, 1855, and thereafter until the 29th October, 1898, Sina Philippina Jacomina Kachelhoffer (hereinafter called the testatrix) and Johannes Cornelius Vermaak (hereinafter called the testator) were lawfully married with community of goods, and the testatrix died on the said 29th October, 1898.

2. On the 30th May, 1855, the testator and testatrix executed a certain document, purporting to be their joint last will and testament, but owing to the absence of the requisite attestation, the said document is of no legal validity.

3. Thereafter the testator and testatrix duly executed in the presence of the requisite witnesses a joint and mutual testamentary writing, the original whereof is in Dutch.

4. The said testamentary writing constitutes the last will of the testator and testatrix, and thereby by mutual consent effected a massing of the joint estate with a disposition thereof subject to a life interest in favour of the survivor of them after the death of such survivor, and massing by such disposition all property of the joint estate movable and immovable, including certain farms and landed property, consisting of the farms Haarhof's Kraal and Diep Kloof, in the district of Uitenhage, and the farm Kwaga, situate in the district of Humansdorp, upon the conditions and stipulations set forth in such last will.

5. After the death of the testatrix, the testator, as survivor, adiated and accepted and enjoyed benefits of usufruct of the entire joint estate, under the said testamentary writing or will, until his death on the 11th March, 1903.

6. Before his death the testator made a last will and testament, dated the 14th January, 1903, whereunder the defendant is appointed executor testamentary.

7. The first plaintiff is the executor dative of the estate of the testatrix.

8. The second plaintiff is the father and natural guardian of two minor sons, Gert Matthew Ferreira and Johannes Vermaak Ferreira, born of the lawful marriage of the said plaintiff and the late Catherina Vermaak, who was in her lifetime a daughter born of the marriage of the testator and testatrix.

9. The plaintiffs contend that the testator could not by his last will aforesaid lawfully make any disposition of the joint estate of his late wife, the testatrix, and himself, inconsistent with the provisions of the said testamentary writing or last will, and that the property of the said joint estate must be distributed in accordance with the said provisions, and more especially contend that the said minor sons of the second plaintiff are entitled as the male descendants of their mother, a child of the testator and testatrix, to a life interest in portion of the aforesaid farms in succession to their mother, in terms of the conditions and stipulations in the said testamentary writing set forth.

10. The defendant disputes the contention of the plaintiffs, and claims to dispose of all the property, movable as well as immovable, of the joint estate aforesaid, in accordance only with the last will of the testator.

Wherefore the plaintiffs in their capacities pray for: (a) An order declaring that all the property of the joint estate of the testator and testatrix shall be administered in accordance with the terms, conditions, and stipulations contained in the testamentary writing or last will aforesaid of the testator and testatrix, and that the first plaintiff is entitled to join with the defendant in such administration. (b) A declaration that the minor sons aforesaid of the second plaintiff are entitled, as male descendants of their mother, to a life interest in portion of the farms mentioned in paragraph 4, in accordance with the terms, conditions, and stipulations of the said testamentary writing or last will. Or that they may have such further or other declaration of rights or relief as to this Hon. Court may seem meet, together with costs of suit.

The following is the will referred to by plaintiff in his declaration: Appendix and Supplement to Testament, dated May 30, 1855.—Further, it is our express wish and mutual agreement, after the death of the surviving testator, to bequeath and bespeak jointly to our children born or still to be born of this marriage, all movable and immovable property, farms and estates, consisting of the farms called Haarhof's Kraal and Diepkloof, situate in the district of Uitenhage, Groot Winterhoek, besides the farm Kwaga, situate in the district of Humansdorp, Gamtas River, upon the following conditions and stipulations: Firstly, the abovementioned farms and estates shall remain perpetual family property, so long as the laws of this land in any wise allow thereof, to be possessed in succession by the male descendants of the testators' children aforesaid. Secondly, should there be, through circumstances (in case of decease of one of the heirs) no male descendants, or none living, all rights to and shares in the abovementioned farms and estates shall fall to and devolve upon the male heirs at the time existing. Thirdly, should one of the heirs wish to depart and live elsewhere, he or the same shall not have the right to sell or let the abovementioned farms or estates, or rights to the same, or to put others in his place, but the usufruct accruing through his or their absence shall fall to the rest of the remaining heirs.

The defendant's plea was as follows:

1. The defendant admits paragraphs 1 to 8 of the plaintiffs' declaration.

2. He says, however, as to paragraph 6 thereof, that the first plaintiff, as executor dative in the estate of the testatrix never had any property whatsoever to administer, the testator having remained in full possession of the whole estate from the death of the testatrix up to the time of his own death, as set forth in paragraph 5 of the declaration, and the first plaintiff has never filed any administration or distribution account in the estate of the testatrix.

3. As to paragraph 8 of the declaration, the defendant says that the said Catherina Vermaak died on the 29th October, 1888, predeceasing both the testator and the testatrix.

4. As to paragraphs 9 and 10, the defendant says that the testator's said last will, dated the 14th of January, 1903, the original whereof is in Dutch, confirmed all the provisions of the said joint will, except as to the disposition of the movable property still left in the said joint estate at the death of the testator.

5. Prior to the execution of the said last will, the testator obtained the consent in writing, of all the heirs in the said joint estate, to the disposition of the said movable property, as provided for in the said last will. The document embodying such consent was duly filed with the testator's said last will in the Master's Office.

6. The defendant contends that the testator was entitled under the circumstances hereinabove set forth, to dispose of the said movable property in the manner in which he did by his said last will, and that the property in the said joint estate should be distributed in accordance with the terms of the said last will of the testator, and not of the said joint will, in so far as the terms of the two wills are inconsistent with one another.

7. The defendant admits that he disputes the claim of the first plaintiff to join with him in the administration of the property in the joint estate.

8. The defendant contends further that in any case, and whether the property in the said joint estate be distributed according to the terms of the joint will or under the testator's last will, the said minor sons of the second plaintiff are not entitled to a life interest in the said farms as claimed by the plaintiffs.

Wherefore the defendant prays that the plaintiffs' claim may be dismissed, with costs.

The following are the documents referred to by defendant in his plea: Last will and testament: Be it hereby known that I, Johannes Cornelis Vermaak, residing at Haarhofskraal, division of Uitenhage, have hereby resolved to make my last will and testament, and to that end I declare all testaments and codicils or other testamentary acts made by me previous to the date of these presents, to be null, except the codicil at the foot of an incomplete will dated May 30, 1855, now filed in the office of the Master of the Supreme Court, being the joint will of my deceased wife, Sina Philippina Jacomina Kachelhoffer and myself, which I ratify and confirm, and the land in my estate (I) bequeath in equal shares to my sons or to their lawful heirs and descendants. All my movable property I bequeath hereby to my daughters, Maria Louisa Ferreira, born Vermaak, and Louisa Muller, born Vermaak, or their lawful descendants, to be divided by them by two impartial persons, or otherwise sold, in case she (they?) so elect. As executor and administrator of this, my estate, and effects, I hereby appoint my son-in-law, Michael Anthony Muller, of Haarhofskraal, district of Uitenhage, to carry out everything according to law and equity. I declare this to be my last and final will and my full and only intention, according to the codicil aforementioned. Thus done at Haarhofskraal, in the division aforesaid, on the 16th day of the month of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, in the presence of the undersigned witnesses.

We, the undersigned, Johannes Christoffel Kachelhoffer Vermaak, Hendrik Matheus Vermaak, Alexander Vermaak, and Pieter Vermaak, sons and lawful heirs of Johannes Cornelis Vermaak, and his deceased wife, Sina Philippina Jacomina Vermaak, born Kachelhoffer, hereby acknowledge that we give our consent to a will to be made by our father, the said Johannes Cornelis Vermaak, bequeathing all his movable property to our sisters, Maria Louisa Ferreira, born Vermaak, and Louisa Muller, born Vermaak, and hereby declare to retract all our right, which, according to law, we have to the said movable property found in the said estate, and to allow the same to fall to our above-mentioned sisters. Thus done at Humansdorp on this 14th day of the month of January, 1903, in the presence of the undersigned witnesses.

The plaintiffs' replication to the defendant's plea was as follows:

1. The plaintiffs admit the allegations in paragraph 1 of the plea.

2. They admit the execution by the sons of the testator of the document, but they say that the document does not affect in fact or law the rights of the children of the second plaintiff in respect of the farms referred to in the declaration.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Close) for the plaintiffs. Mr. Burton (with him Dr. Greer), for the defendants.

Mr. Schreiner contended that the children of the late Catherine Vermaak were entitled to the benefits she would have, had she lived, derived.

Mr. Burton contended that, as the codicil to the will was not made for a period of ten years after the death of Catherine, it did not affect her children.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (August 22.)

De Villiers, C.J.: By their joint will the testators bequeathed, after "the death of the survivor of them, certain farms to their collective children (ezamentlyke kinderen), born or still to be born of this marriage, upon the following conditions: Firstly, the farms shall remain perpetual family property, so long as the law of the land allows thereof, to be possessed in succession by the male descendants (oir) of the testators' children aforesaid; secondly, should there, on the death of one of the heirs, be no male issue or none living, all rights to the farms shall revert to the male heirs at the time in existence." The translation annexed to the declaration is obviously incorrect in rendering the words "vermaken aan hunne gezamentlyke kinderen" into "bequeath jointly to our children."

The testators had several sons and daughters living at the death of the surviving testator, and it is common cause that these daughters, as well as the sons, were entitled to share as fiduciary heirs in the first line of fidei-commissary succession created by the will. It is common cause also that the male descendants of these daughters, as well as of the testators' sons, formed part of the male issue intended to share as fidei-commissary heirs in the second and subsequent lines of succession. But one of the daughters, Catharina, died during the lifetime of both testators, leaving issue, the two minor plaintiffs, of her marriage with Ignatius Ferreira. The question now to be determined is whether these minors, being grandchildren of the testators, were intended by the testators to share with the testators' children in the first line of succession. If they are not to be regarded as included among the children, there appears to me to be no other provision in the will entitling them to share in any subsequent line of succession. In the case of Galliera v. Rycroft (17 S.C.R., 569), the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council adopted the view of Voet that the word "kinderen," which was the word used by the testators in the present case, must prima facie be taken to refer to descendants of the first degree, but that, if it can be gathered from the context of the will that the testator had regard to descendants of a remoter degree, the word should be construed as having such a wider signification. In the present case the ruling desire of the testators seems to have been to keep the farms in the family so long as the law would allow them to be so kept. But, although the daughters were to be admitted in the first line of succession, male descendants only of sons and daughters were to be admitted in the second and subsequent lines of succession. But if the plaintiffs were now excluded from the first line of succesion, their sons would also be subsequently excluded, and the clear intention of the testators to create a fidei-commissum in favour of their grandsons and subsequent male descendants would be wholly frustrated. Mr. Burton, in his able argument, contended that the use of the words "to be possessed in succession by the male descendants of the testators' children aforesaid" disposes of the view that the word "children" includes grandchildren, but it should be borne in mind that the fidei-commissum was intended to extend beyond the second degree of male descendants. If, therefore, the testators meant to include children of deceased children in the first line of succession, it would be the most natural thing for them to add that the farms are "to be possessed in succession by the male descendants of the testators' children aforesaid." The intention of the testators to make their farms a "perpetual family property" would not be effectually carried out if male descendants like the plaintiffs and their male descendants were to be completely excluded from the succession. I am of opinion, therefore, that it may fairly be gathered from the context of the will that, in appointing their children as fiduciary legatees, the testators had regard to descendants of a remoter degree than the first, and intended to include children of their deceased daughter Catharina. The adjective "gezamentlyke," as applied to the children, would also seem to indicate an intention to employ the term "kinderen" in a collective and somewhat comprehensive sense. The Court will therefore declare that the children of Catharina are entitled to a fiduciary life interest in the proportionate share of the farms, in which she would have had a life interest in case she had survived the testators. The costs of this action will be borne by the estate, represented by the defendant, the defendant to have his expenses as a witness.

Ex parte NEL AND OTHERS.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan applied in this case for the appointment of a curator ad litem.

The application was granted, the Rev. A. B. Ross being appointed.

COULTON V. BULL.

Professional competition—Interdict—Damages.

This was an action in which Dr. J. J. Coulton, of Humansdorp, sought an interdict to restrain the defendant, Dr. J. E. Bull, also of Humansdorp, from practising in that district. He also claimed damages from the defendant by reason of his breaking a contract.

The plaintiff's declaration stated that on the 5th December, 1902, he engaged the defendant in England as his assistant for twelve months at a salary of £20 a month and free apartments. He also paid his passage from England. In the agreement between them it was specified that at the end of the engagement the defendant should not practise in the district for a period of five years under a penalty of £1,000. In breach of the agreement, the defendant, after the period of twelve months, carried on a practice in Humansdorp, and was still doing so. Wherefore the plaintiff claimed £1,000 damages, and sought an interdict to restrain the defendant from further practising.

The defendant in his plea alleged that he had been wrongfully and unlawfully dismissed by the plaintiff prior to the termination of the agreement. He admitted he carried on as medical practitioner at Humansdorp.

Mr. W. P. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Percy Jones), appeared for the plaintiff. The defendant filed a plea, but failed to appear.

Dr. Coulton, the plaintiff, stated he was district surgeon at Humansdorp, where he had been practising eight years. Witness entered into an agreement with defendant, who came from England and acted as his assistant. He paid him £20 a month, and gave him free quarters. On the 5th December, 1903, witness called defendant into his surgery and paid him up to date. They said nothing about the contract. He left, but returned in the afternoon, and informed witness that he intended introducing his brother, who was also a doctor, to the farmers in the district, and then leaving for some other district himself. Witness then saw his legal adviser. Defendant stopped at the hotel until the 7th December at witness's expense. The defendant advertised in the local paper that he intended practising in the district. Witness wrote to him, complaining of his conduct, but received no reply. Witness saw the defendant on the day he left for Cape Town. The defendant said witness need not bother to go to Cape Town, as he was withdrawing from the case. Witness told him that if he paid £1,000 down he would settle the case, but not without that. The defendant did not do so. The defendant had taken several of witness's patients, and had cut into his districts in other ways. Witness's practice had fallen off to the extent of £500 a year.

De Villiers, C.J., granted the interdict, and awarded plaintiff £200 damages and costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr Justice HOPLEY.]

TRIAL CAUSE.

SABER V. KANSLEY. { 1904.
Aug. 19th.

This was an action instituted by the plaintiff, a broker and commission agent, to recover the sum of £456, being the balance of an account between the parties. The defendant's plea was to the effect that the plaintiff was his general agent, and received and disbursed moneys on his behalf from August, 1901, until February or March, 1904, and that it was the duty of the plaintiff to render an account, duly supported by vouchers. The defendant was willing upon the debate of such account to pay such moneys as might be due to the plaintiff, and in reconvention he claimed for such an account. The replication was that accounts were rendered in 1901 and 1902, and that the parties met and went through the accounts. The plaintiff was always perfectly willing to supply vouchers, and he said that he had supplied such vouchers.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Van Zyl), was for the plaintiff, and Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. P. Jones) was for the defendant.

Sir H. Juta said that the parties met, and the defendant refused to pass a large number of items, and it was upon those items the issue would turn. The defendant was a dealer in fish in a large way, and he was a man who could not write. The plaintiff had acted for him in buying property and in receiving and disbursing his moneys. The defendant was an illiterate man, and there were no receipts for the moneys, except the vouchers. The question was whether it was not a case in which there should be a reference, and perhaps an additional reason for that course was that the principal witness in the case, a man named Miller, who had received a large amount of money from the defendant, was ill.

Mr. Gardiner said he had no objection to fall in with his learned friend's suggestion.

Hopley, J., approved of the suggestion, and appointed Mr. G. W. Steytler, failing him Mr. J. E. P. Close or Mr. Maynard Nash to take the reference.

GENERAL MOTION.

Ex parte TRUTER.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for the appointment of a curator bonis and a curator ad litem in the estate of the petitioner's daughter, who was at present confined in Valkenberg Asylum, and suggested that Mr. Abraham Truter, solicitor, of Beaufort West, and Mr. Rainsford, of Cape Town, should act in the respective capacities.

SKIPPON V. DE WIT. { 1904.
Aug. 22nd.

Mr. Schreiner moved, as a matter of urgency, for leave to plead, the defendant having been barred. The matter arose out of certain building quantities, the plaintiff suing the defendant as architect for £400 odd, as damages for inaccuracies in the quantities he had prepared. Some time would be required in which to take measurements.

Mr. Close (for the plaintiff) raised no objection, but said that his client desired the case to come to trial this term.

Order granted, giving leave for removal of bar, and setting the case down for trial on the 30th inst.

HEYDENRYCH V. JEFFREY. { 1904.
Aug. 22nd
" 29th.

Promissory note—Note payable at a particular place—Maker—Holder—Presentment for payment—Agency.

On the due date of a promissory note for £105, made by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff, and payable at the office of one S., the plaintiff presented the note for payment at the office of S., where a letter, written by the defendant, asking for a fortnight's extension, was handed to the plaintiff. The plaintiff accordingly allowed the extension of time, after the expiration of which he repeatedly requested S. to pay, but was put off with the excuse that he had not yet succeeded in raising a permanent loan for the defendant. In fact, S. had raised the loan, and out of the proceeds had, at the end of the fortnight's interval, received payment of the note, which, however, he had not in his possession and could not hand over to the defendant. S. having absconded, the plaintiff sued the defendant, who set up the defence that S. was the agent of the plaintiff to receive payment of the note.

Held, on failure of proof of such agency, that the defendant, as maker, remained liable on the note of which the plaintiff was still the legal holder.

This was an appeal from a judgment given by Mr. Justice Buchanan, in the Supreme Court, in which the appellant was the plaintiff, and the respondent the defendant in the Court below (see 14 C.T.R., 472). The plaintiff sued the defendant for the sum of £105, upon a promissory note, dated the 15th October, and payable on the 15th November, 1902, made and signed by Thomas Jeffrey to and in favour of Benjamin Heydenrych. The case, first of all, came before the Court as a claim for provisional sentence, and certain affidavits were then put in. Provisional sentence was refused. Subsequently the plaintiff proceeded with the principal case.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) was for the appellant; Mr. W. P. Buchanan (with him Mr. M. Bisset) was for the respondent.

Mr. Burton said that the case was decided by his lordship upon a point that the form of the note gave a clear intimation to the debtor that he was to pay James Scott. His lordship referred to another aspect of the case, which was raised upon the pleadings, viz., that if there had not been such an intimation, the conduct of the plaintiff throughout had justified the defendant in assuming that Scott was his agent to receive payment of this note, and that there was a great deal in equity to justify such a plea, but, he said, it was not necessary to decide that. The case was, decided by his lordship, if he (counsel) were correct in his reading of the judgment, on the point that by the form of the promissory note the plaintiff had given the defendant a distinct intimation that he was to pay James Scott. The question was one of legal inference from the facts, with the exception of one or two criticisms, which it might be necessary to make of the evidence given by the defendant. The learned Judge, in his reasons for judgment, made a distinction between the case and the one which had been brought by the plaintiff against a man named Hector, or Hoctor, in which the note was made payable at the plaintiff's own house or office. He said that Heydenrych, in this case of Jeffrey's, knew nothing of the debtor, whom he had never seen, and he dealt through Scott. Instead of making the note payable at his own office, or house, he made it payable at the office of Scott. That, however, said counsel, was not quite correct, because the note provided for the payment to be made to Heydenrych himself, though it was payable at Scott's office. That, it was held, was an intimation to the defendant that he was to pay Scott. Counsel submitted that it was clear on the facts that Scott was not the plaintiff's agent in connection with the loan; Scott was not approached by the plaintiff, nor was he employed in any way in the negotiation of the loan. What was most important of all was that plaintiff never handed the note to Scott for the purpose of collecting it. Could Scott's agency, he asked, be inferred from the circumstances? It was clear that Scott was the agent, not of the plaintiff, but of the defendant. Defendant was a builder, he wanted a loan for his building operations, and he had had previous dealings with Scott. The intermediary of the parties, counsel contended, would be regarded as the agent of the party, who approached him. Jeffrey really wanted a big loan of £1,500, and he had applied to Scott for his assistance. Then the defendant urgently needed £100 on account, and he himself said that he applied to Scott. Perhaps the strongest feature in the whole case was that he paid the money to Scott without getting the note back. That in itself was overpowering against the defendant. If Scott had been the agent of the plaintiff, the plaintiff would have given him the note to collect, and if the defendant was held entitled to make a payment like this the agency, or the authority of the person to receive the payment must be very clearly proved by the defendant, and the onus lay upon him to show there was authority on the part of the person to receive payment. Counsel submitted that Scott was the agent of the defendant, and not the agent of the plaintiff.

Mr. Buchanan submitted that it would not be necessary for him to altogether establish the agency of Scott, but sufficient to rely on the place of payment being agreed upon. It could not be expected that the parties were to meet at Scott's office; they must have contemplated payment to Scott. Counsel cited American cases to show that payment to a bank, or collecting agencies was sufficient, and submitted that the Court might decide the case on the intentions of the parties. Neither of the principals knew each other's address, or whereabouts, and there could be no doubt that the money was to be paid through Scott. Scott was an intermediary between both parties, and was as much the agent of the defendant as he was of the plaintiff.

[De Villiers, C.J.: When did Scott abscond?]

Some time in May.

[De Villiers, C.J.: When was the note paid?]

November 29.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Six months after the note was due.]

Yes, my lord, and nine months after the note was paid we got the letter. Proceeding, counsel said the delay showed that the plaintiff looked to Scott for payment. If the maxim that the person who occasioned the loss in the case of two innocent parties must suffer held good, then the responsibility would fall on the plaintiff for failing to approach the defendant.

Mr. Burton, in reply, said a bank was a well-known place of exchange, and was vastly different from the specification of some other private place. The defendant knew that he had not the note, and he made no application for the document, and any blame that could be placed on the plaintiff could equally be placed on the defendant. He submitted that the particular form of the note did not constitute an agency.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The loan was for a month at the rate of 60 per cent. per annum. There is no mention of interest after the due date of payment, and, therefore, he would only be entitled to 6 per cent. Now, is that in accordance with the usual course of dealing to take 6 per cent. ?]

Everything depends upon the security.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But, then, the security was not good enough to charge less than 60 per cent. ? What additional security had he afterwards to satisfy him that he could let six months pass without suing him.]

But he had not allowed that time to pass without making application to Scott, who was defendant's agent.

Cur. Adv. Full.

Postea (August 29th.)

Hopley, J.: In this case the following facts seem to me to be clearly established by the evidence taken at the trial: In October, 1902, the respondent was in want of money, and approached one Scott, a land and estate agent—who also apparently made it part of his business to raise loans for clients from money-lenders—with a view to obtaining a loan upon the security of some landed property owned by him, and for that purpose he handed to Scott his title-deeds, no doubt with the necessary power of attorney to pass the mortgage, which was to be for the sum of £1,500. On the 14th of October, the loan had not been raised, and the respondent was then in urgent need of £100 to meet pressing liabilities. This fact he made known to Scott, who then approached the appellant, a money-lender, with an application for a loan of £100 for one month, on the understanding that part of the £1,500 to be raised would be applied in payment thereof, and that a promissory note for £105 would be given by respondent. As security for this temporary accommodation Scott placed in the appellant's hands the title-deeds or transfer papers relating to the property in question, together with a power of attorney, which must have been a power signed by the respondent, authorising the appellant to raise a mortgage of £1,500 on the property to secure the payment of the promissory note. On these conditions, appellant consented to advance his money, and Scott then brought him from the respondent the Note in Suit, which is in the following terms:

"Due 15th November, 1902.

"No. 223.

"Cape Town, 15th October, 1902.

£105 0s. 0d.

"On the fifteenth day of November next, I promise to pay to B. G. Heydenrych, or Order, at James Scott's office, 10, St. George's Hotel Chambers, St. George's-street, Cape Town, the sum of One Hundred and Five Pounds sterling, value received.

"T. Jeffery."

Thereupon appellant handed Scott the following cheque:

"No. 192. 154,639.

"Cape Town, 15th October, 1902.

"African Banking Corporation, Ltd., Cape Town.

"Pay T. Jeffery, or Order. One Hundred Pounds sterling.

"B. G. Heydenrych."

This cheque Scott handed to the respondent, who endorsed it, and paid it into his bank on the same date.

On the same day Scott applied to appellant for the papers relating to the property, which he required for the purpose of arranging the loan of £1,500, and these were given up to him upon his giving a personal written guarantee that the promissory note for £105 would be paid out of the sum he was raising as loan for the respondent. On the 14th of November this loan had not yet been arranged, in consequence of which the respondent went to Scott, and told him he would not be able to pay the note next day, and asked whether he could not have a short extension of time. Scott said he would see "his client."

but that something should be paid on account, whereupon respondent gave him £4, and signed a request for extension on the following terms: "I wish Mr. Heydenrych to hold over the loan for 14 days upon my property, re my promissory note to him.—Yours, T. Jeffery, November 14, 1902." On the due date, appellant presented the note for payment at Scott's office, and was handed the above request by Scott, who told him that the loan was not yet through, and might take a couple of weeks longer to arrange. Appellant thereupon agreed to the extension. During the next fortnight, Scott succeeded in borrowing the £1,500 for respondent from Mr. Hofmeyr, and on the 29th of November the respondent gave Scott a cheque for £101, the balance due on the note. The cheque was as follows, the body thereof being drawn out by Scott, "November 29, 1902.—The Standard Bank of South Africa, Limited, Woodstock. Re. Heydenrych. Pay James Scott one hundred and one pounds sterling.—T. Jeffery." This cheque was endorsed by Scott, and the moneys arising therefrom were converted by him to his own use, as the £4 previously given to him on account had likewise been treated. When respondent gave Scott this cheque he asked him for the note and Scott told him that he had not got it, but promised that he would get it the next day. The respondent called twice after that for the note, but Scott put him off, and finally promised that he would send it by post, which he never did. Meanwhile, appellant, who never parted with the note, had applied after the 29th of November to Scott, or at Scott's office, but Scott told him that the loan had not yet been arranged, and put him off from time to time. He seems, moreover, to have asked for respondent's address, but was put off on that point also by Scott, saying that he was his agent, and was raising the loan for him. There is no doubt that all this while both parties thought Scott to be an honest man, and he seems to have been plausible enough to put them both off from time to time. Scott absconded in May, 1903, and his estate was sequestrated as insolvent. And in August, 1903, appellant wrote to the respondent demanding payment of the note with interest from its due date. The letter stated: "This note was payable at the office of Mr. Scott, Cape Town, and upon application there I was always put off with the reply that Mr. Scott was raising a bond for you, and the money would then be paid. Mr. Scott has since gone insolvent, and after some difficulty, I have at last ascertained your present address." The respondent refused to pay, and the appellant instituted legal proceedings on the note, and claimed provisional sentence, which was, however, refused, whereupon he proceeded to the principal case, and the judgment now appealed from was given against him. The learned Judge found that the appellant knew nothing of his debtor, the respondent, whom he had never seen, and with whom he had never had personal communication, but that he dealt with him entirely through Scott, and that he accepted the note payable at the office of Scott, and not at his own place of business. This is entirely in accordance with the evidence, and thereupon his lordship's ruling is that the appellant thus intimated to his debtor that Scott had authority to receive payment on his behalf. With all due deference to the ruling of so experienced a Judge I cannot hold that any such inference can be drawn. The terms of the note are clear enough, and they state not only that payment was to be made at Scott's office, but also that it was to be made to B. G. Heydenrych, or to his order. That is the true and complete tenour of the note, and it lies upon the respondent to show that he carried out his contract and fulfilled all that he had promised to do. It is true that he has proved that he paid to Scott the full amount of the note by the date to which payment had been deferred, but to be absolved against the holder of the note, he must go further, and show that Scott had authority to receive the payment. The learned judge seems to have held that Scott was the appellants' agent in the whole of the matter. I cannot find that the evidence in any way supports this proposition. On the contrary, there seems to me to be abundant and conclusive evidence that Scott was the agent throughout of the respondent. The respondent engaged him to raise on mortgage a loan of £1,500 for him, and this he did, receiving, no doubt, the usual commission from the respondent for such services. Whether he also received a further amount from the respondent for raising the temporary loan from the appellant, or whether he considered that those services were included in the larger business he had undertaken, is not quite clear; but it seems certain that he was not paid anything at all by the appellant. When respondent found that he could not on its due date meet the note, he went to Scott, asking him to get a short extension, and signed the request to appellant to that effect. This request Scott placed before the appellant when he presented the note on its due date, and the extension was granted. On this his lordship finds that, at Scott's request, the time for payment was extended, and this is looked upon as additional proof of his agency for appellant. But, surely, it is exactly the reverse. Scott told respondent that he would have to see the creditor on the matter, and actually got him to sign a request to the creditor (to be presented, it is true, by Scott) for such extension. This was a clear intimation to respondent that the creditor was the person directing affairs, and that a direct application for leniency would have to be made to him. It must be held on such evidence that the extension of time was given by the appellant on the request, not of Scott, but of the respondent, and it seems to me quite clear that Scott, in placing this request before the creditor, was acting as he had acted throughout, as the agent of the respondent and for his benefit alone. A further proof of Scott's agency for appellant is deduced in the judgment from the fact that he obtained the title-deeds from the appellant as above set forth. The learned judge says "Heydenrych afterwards returned the power and the title-deeds to Scott, treating him as his representative in this matter." But, surely all that Heydenrych did was to hand over to the agent for his debtor the necessary papers to enable him to fulfil his duty to his principal, the respondent; and so far from treating Scott as his own representative, he made him give his personal written guarantee that he would apply part of the funds to be raised, with the assistance of these documents, for his client to the payment of the note for which appellant was holding them as security. It is, therefore, clear that there is in the general conduct of the parties no evidence of agency for the appellant on the part of Scott, and the only question to be determined is whether he was, by the terms of the note itself, appointed agent to receive payment on behalf of appellant. Now, the only way in which Scott's name appears in the note is that his office is designated as the place of payment, and the place of payment, as Storey says, of a promissory note is always a matter of arrangement between the parties for their mutual accommodation, and may be stipulated in any manner that may best suit their convenience. It is worthy of notice in the present case that the note was tendered to the appellant with the place of payment already inserted, and that place was the office of the respondent's agent, who was arranging the loan. This was the place selected by the respondent, and the appellant simply accepted it as being not inconvenient to himself. He fulfilled his duty according to the law regulating dealings in promissory notes, when he presented it on the due date at the appointed place, on which date he was met by the request for the extension of time, to which he acceded. When he so acceded, all he agreed to was a partum de non petendo for a fortnight, and after the expiration of that period, the note became payable on demand, and there was no necessity for a fresh presentation. Now, it was argued, and so held in the judgment now under appeal, that as the respondent had placed the amount of the note in the hands of Scott at the extended due date, he had discharged all his obligations according to the tenour of the note. Apart from notes made payable at a bank, to which I shall refer presently, the only authority for so sweeping a proposition that was cited was an American case, before the Supreme Court of South Carolina in 1880. That case, however, seems to me distinguishable from the present. There the maker of the note had certain factors in Charleston called Wroton and Dowling, from whom he used to get statements of account periodically, and in 1876 he had given that firm a promissory note due on the 1st of October of that year, payable at their place of business, and of which it is clear that they themselves were the payees, for they subsequently negotiated the note, and passed it on for value to a holder in due course. On the due date the maker deposited at the office of Wroton and Dowling the amount of the note to meet it, and received credit for such amount from them in their books as against the note at its due date; but he did not demand back his note. The holder (a bank) did not present the note for payment on due date, and Wroton and Dowling subsequently failed, the note being still with the holders. In action brought by them against the maker, the Court held that he was discharged in the circumstances. Bank of Charleston v. Zorn (37. American Repp., p. 753). The judgment, as reported, contains some sweeping general dicta, which, as they stand, I think do not properly state our law on the subject; though in reference to the particular case with which they were dealing, they may be unobjectionable. In that case it will be observed that the payment was to be made at the office of the payees, who accepted the payment and gave credit for it. The maker had therefore discharged all his obligations under the note, and his only mistake was not to demand its restitution, which, as the payees were his trusted agents, was not one involving a large amount of negligence. The holders, however, had, by the terms of the note, full knowledge and notice that the debtor might, and probably would, pay to Wroton and Dowling; and in spite thereof, they did not attempt to get the money from that firm at the due date. It may well be that the Court was led to its conclusion by the consideration that the holders had adopted Wroton and Dowling as their agents to receive payment, and looked to them alone for a settlement. Even with that possible explanation, however, the case is not, to my mind, a very satisfactory one. Another case is that of Oshorn v. Baird (30. American Repp., 710), and that case is entirely satisfactory, as the note in question was payable at a bank which the Court held to be the holder's agent, and clearly designated by him as such to receive payment at or before due date. In the case of Lazier v. Horan, reported in 37, American Repp., 736, a case from the Supreme Court of Iowa, the maker of a note was discharged, and the Court employed the following language in their judgment: "The note was made payable at a bank. Those institutions are depositories of money. They are also collection agencies through which by much the larger part of that branch of the business of the country is transacted. When a note is made payable at a bank, the parties expect the collection to be made through the bank. It is true when the defendant deposited the money the bank, while holding it, was technically the agent of the depositor. But the money was deposited for the holder of the note, and it required no act of the depositor to authorise the bank to pay the note. 'If the customer of a banker accept a bill and make it payable at his bankers, that is of itself sufficient authority to the banker to apply the customer's funds in payment of the bill.' Byles on Bills, 151. And if the money be deposited for the payment of such a bill or note, the holder may maintain his action against the bank therefore. By the very terms of the contract the defendant agreed to pay the note at the bank. Now, while it is a general rule that payment of a note or bill should be made to the actual holder, yet when the parties have contracted that payment may be made at a bank, it means that payment is to be made to the bank." For myself I should say that the concluding dictum of the above judgment is going somewhat too far, if it can be taken to be meant to have universal application, and not to be dealing with the commercial law of the State of Iowa alone. "That the doctrine as stated in Lazier v. Horan is not universally adopted by the American Courts is clearly shown by the case of Indig v. National City Bank case in the New York Court, reported in 37, Am., Repp., p. 736, in which the Court said: "It is by no means clear that the maker of the note is discharged. When a note is payable at a bank an entire failure to present it for payment does not discharge the maker. If the maker has not sufficient funds in the bank, the omission to present is of no consequence. If he has funds, then he can plead it by way of tender, and is relieved of liability only for interest and costs. And even if the bank fails with funds in its hands, this is no defence to the note. The bank is in such cases regarded simply as the agent or depository of the maker of the note, and he alone suffers by its failure, and his promise to pay is not discharged. In this respect only, a note, or bill, payable at a bank, differs from a cheque. Therefore, if there has been no presentment whatever, and the bank had failed with sufficient funds of the maker in its hands to pay the note, the maker is still liable." For myself I think that in all cases even when a bank is the place where a note or bill is payable, it is a matter of evidence whether the bank is the agent of either or both of the parties, though the presumption would be in favour of holding that in such cases the intention of the parties was to establish a mutual agency. This would be in accordance with ordinary commercial usage and custom; but it would still be open to either party to show that the agency of the bank was purely for the convenience of the other. To go further, however, and to hold that when a bill or note is made payable at the house of a private individual, or at the office of an ordinary business man, an agency is thereby established by which such private individual or business man is made the agent for the holder to receive payment, would lead to unsettling well-known rules of commercial law relating to such matters, and to impairing the well-established rights of holders of negotiable instruments of that nature. I may add that all the cases that can be quoted in which the makers of notes have been discharged from liability proceed, as far as I am aware, on the ground that no presentation was made in good time, though funds had been provided by the due date. In the present case there was a presentation on the due date, and the holder at the maker's request gave him time. Thereafter the respondent paid the amount directly by cheque in favour of his own agent, and did not even take the precaution to make out his cheque in favour of his creditor. His agent was a dishonest man, as it appears from the evidence, and by his plausibility was able to deceive both parties for a long period, and put them off—the one in his demand for the return of the note which he had signed, and the other in his demand for his money. They both were too confiding in Scott, and consequently neither displayed the proper amount of diligence which might have been otherwise expected of them; but the person who really enabled Scott to carry out his fraud and appropriate the £105 to his own use, seems to me to have been undoubtedly the respondent, and I am by no means convinced on the evidence that even if the appellant had presented the note again on the 29th of November, and again and again, shortly thereafter, he would have received payment thereof from Scott, who would probably have made some plausible excuse to evade parting with the money which he had improperly obtained, and that Scott would have paid over the money if demand had been made is a matter of defence which it lay on the respondent to establish. Therefore, even on the equity of the case, I think the respondent should be the one to suffer the loss, which was occasioned primarily by his own rash and blind trust in his own agent. For these reasons, I am respectfully of opinion that the appeal should be allowed.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court in an action brought by the holder against the maker of a promissory note for £105. The action originated with a summons for provisional sentence, and at the hearing the defendant's affidavit was produced, which satisfied the Court that there were good grounds for holding that he had paid the amount of the note to one Scott, at whose office the note was payable, and that he had been led to believe that Scott had authority from the plaintiff to receive such payment on his behalf. Provisional sentence was accordingly refused, with costs, and the plaintiff proceeded with the principal case before a Divisional Court. At the trial a letter written by the defendant to the plaintiff on the day before the note fell due was produced, which showed that the defendant then knew that the plaintiff was the holder of the note, and that the defendant could not then have believed that Scott had full powers to act on behalf of the plaintiff. The only evidence of such agency left was the fact that the note had been made payable at the office of Scott. Upon this point the learned Judge, in his reasons, says: "The plaintiff knew nothing of the debtor, whom he had never seen, and with whom he had had no communication, but dealt with him through Scott. Instead of making the note payable to himself at his own office, he accepted the note made payable at the office of Scott. He thus intimated to the debtor that Scott had authority to receive payment on the plaintiff's behalf." The learned judge accordingly gave judgment for the defendant, with costs.

There can be no doubt that the fact of the note having been made payable at Scott's office would have been a link in the chain of evidence to establish Scott's agency, but standing by itself, it is not, in my opinion, sufficient to establish such agency. The note was made payable at Scott's office for the convenience of the defendant, who had employed Scott to raise a permanent loan of £1,500 for him on the security of some property. While Scott was negotiating with intending lenders, the defendant was in urgent need of £100, and Scott undertook to obtain the amount as a temporary loan. He accordingly applied to the plaintiff, who gave his own cheque for the amount in favour of the defendant or order, and received the promissory note in question, payable one month after date. On the due date he presented the note for payment at Scott's office, and was met with the defendant's letter, to which I have already referred. The letter, which bore the previous day's date, reads as follows: "I wish Mr. Heydenrych to hold over the loan for fourteen days upon my property re my promissory note to him." It is quite incomprehensible to me why this letter, which has such an important bearing on the case, was not produced at the provisional hearing. In his affidavit, the defendant said: "On the 15th day of November, 1902, the due date of the note, not being in a position to meet the same, I saw Mr. Scott at his office, and applied to him for an extension of time for payment for a further fortnight. He replied that he would see his client, and let me know afterwards. I again called in the afternoon of the same day, and Mr. Scott then told me that it would be all right; I could have the extension for a fortnight if I paid him a few pounds on account, as he was short of money. Having some £4 in cash with me, I handed same over to Scott." Not a word in this statement about the defendant's own letter of the previous day requesting the plaintiff, by name to give a fortnight's extension. Knowing that the plaintiff, as the holder of the note, had been asked by himself for an extension of time, the defendant on the due date of the note, made a payment on account to Scott for his personal use, and within the fortnight following he paid the balance to Scott by his cheque made in favour of Scott. This money was paid out of the amount raised by Scott on permanent loan. The promissory note, however, was not delivered to the defendant, for the plaintiff had never parted with the possession of it. Clearly, therefore, without proof of Scott's authority to receive payment of the note on behalf of the holder, the defendant, as maker, remains liable. The note could only be discharged by payment to the holder, and, as Scott had not the note in his possession, the burthen of proving his authority to receive payment lay on the defendant. The evidence given at the trial satisfies me that some of the statements in the defendant's affidavit were wholly misleading, and that Scott had no authority from the plaintiff to receive payment of the note.

At the hearing of the appeal, a passage in Story on Bills of Exchange (p. 356), was relied upon as supporting the defendant's discharge from liability. The passage reads as follows: "In respect to the acceptor, no presentment or demand of payment of a bill payable at a bankers or other particular place, need be made at that place on the day when the bill becomes due or afterwards in order to maintain an action against him; but it is a matter of defence on the part of the acceptor that he had funds at that place to pay the bill, which, if true, will exonerate him from the payment of all damages and interest; and if he has been injured, or has sustained any loss, by the neglect of the holder to demand payment at that place (as if the bill be payable at a bank, and the acceptor had funds there, and that bank has since failed), then the acceptor will be discharged from liability on the bill to that extent." The first part of Story's statement of the law would not apply to the maker of a promissory note, for although, in general, his rights and liabilities correspond to those of an acceptor of a bill of exchange, the 1st subsection of section 80 of Act 19, of 1893, specially provides that "where a note is in the body of it made payable at a particular place, it must be presented at that place in order to render the maker liable, unless the particular place mentioned is the place of business of the payee, and the note remains in his hands." In the present case, the place of payment, which is mentioned in the body of the note, is not the plaintiff's place of business, but he did duly present the note for payment on the due date. As to the latter part of Story's statement, it is not necessary to inquire whether our law agrees with the American law, for the simple reason that the facts stated by him as matter of defence do not exist in the present case. On the due date of the note, the defendant had no funds at Scott's office to pay the note. During the fortnight's interval after the due date, the defendant made no deposit with Scott for payment to the plaintiff, but he made a direct payment to Scott, knowing that Scott had not the note in his possession. If he chose to take the risk of paying Scott, he might have protected the plaintiff and himself by giving Scott a crossed cheque in favour of the plaintiff, instead of giving a cheque made in favour of Scott. If there was negligence on the part of the plaintiff, there was still greater negligence on the part of the defendant, when once it is established that Scott was not the plaintiff's agent to receive the payment of the note. As to the nature of the neglect on the plaintiff's part, which would, according to the American authorities, release the defendant, the case of Charleston National Banking Association v. Zorn (37, A.R., 733) shows that the defendant would have to prove that the plaintiff was guilty of neglect in not demanding payment of the note at the office of Scott before he absconded, that the plaintiff would have received the money if the note had been presented, and that, owing to such non-presentment, the defendant lost the money. In point of fact, the plaintiff did present the note at Scott's office at the due date, and again after the expiration of the fortnight's delay. On the first occasion he was met with the defendant's letter asking for a fortnight's delay, and on the subsequent occasions he was put off with the false excuse that the permanent loan of £1,500 had not yet been raised for the defendant. The case of Lazier v. Horan (37, A.R., p. 735) has also been relied upon, but there it was clear that if the holder of the note had presented it at the bank on the due date, the note would have been met. The deposit at the bank was regarded by the Court as a setting apart of the money for and on behalf of the holder of the note, and the failure of the holder to call for the money on the due date was regarded as an act of neglect, which discharged the maker on the subsequent failure of the bank. In the present case, no money was paid to Scott on or before the due date of the note; when the money was so paid, it was handed over, not as a deposit for the plaintiff, but as a direct payment to Scott, and the plaintiff did, after the expiration of the fortnight, apply without success to Scott for payment. It is not clear that the application was made on the very day on which the fortnight expired, but it is manifest that if the plaintiff had presented the note on that day, it would not have been paid. It is quite impossible, therefore, to hold that the non-presentment of the note was the cause of the defendants losing the money. Even, therefore, if the American decisions were binding, there would be no ground for holding that the defendant is discharged from liability on the note.

It was suggested by the learned judge in his reasons, although it was not made a ground of his decision, that the receipt by the plaintiff of a guarantee from Scott, and the plaintiff's delay in demanding payment from the defendant, are circumstances which in equity should be held to relieve the defendant from liability. The guarantee, which was given on the day when the note was made, was as follows: "B. G. Heydenrych, Esq.—Dear Sir,—On account of you advancing Mr. T. Jeffrey £100 upon his promissory note, I guarantee that the said promissory note £105 will be paid to you out of loan of £1,500 I am arranging for said Mr. Jeffrey.—Yours, James Scott." I confess I fail to see how this guarantee assists the defendant either in establishing Scott's agency for the plaintiff or in affording an equitable defence to the action. The letter shows that Scott was acting as agent for the defendant, and that, in order to secure the temporary loan of £100 from the plaintiff, Scott gave his own guarantee that the money would be paid out of the proceeds of the permanent loan. This guarantee was an additional security for the plaintiff, and could not have been intended in any way to limit the liability of the defendant as the maker of the note. In regard to the plaintiff's delay in demanding payment from the defendant, his explanation that he could not discover the defendant's address is by no means satisfactory, but, unless the Court is prepared to hold that there was collusion between the plaintiff and Scott, the delay cannot deprive the plaintiff of his right as holder to recover payment from the maker of the note. The plaintiff could only lose his remedy on the note if he failed in doing anything that was obligatory on him to do. If, for instance, he had failed to present the note at Scott's office on the due date, the defendant would not have been further liable on the note, whatever other remedy the plaintiff might have had. But there was no obligation on the plaintiff to proceed against the defendant on the note or against Scott in the guarantee, and consequently his delay does not afford any legal or equitable ground for relieving the defendant from liability. I am bound to say that, considering the high rate of interest which the plaintiff demanded for the month's loan, his delay in suing on a note on which he could only recover 6 per cent. from the due date, does give rise to suspicion; but it would be highly dangerous on mere suspicion to break upon the rules which regulate the relative rights and duties of parties to negotiable instruments. It is with great regret, therefore, that I am unable to concur with the judgment of the Divisional Court. In my opinion, the appeal should be allowed, with costs in this court, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for £105, with interest at 6 per cent. from 15th November, 1902, and costs in the court below.

Mr. Justice Buchanan said that, as this was an appeal from a judgment that he had given, he should have preferred not to have taken part in the decision of the case now. The judgment he gave in the court below indicated clearly and sufficiently the grounds upon which he proceeded. No authorities were quoted then to the Court in support of the contentions of counsel, but now the American cases had been cited before them. These American cases had been fully discussed in the judgments which had just been delivered by his brethren, and they seemed to him to support the view he took of the law at the trial. As His Lordship the Chief Justice had pointed out, even supposing these authorities were binding, there were circumstances in this particular case which took it out of the rule of law, one of the most important being that, when presentment of this note was made on the due date, there were no funds, the money had not been paid by the person who gave the note. He was not now wishing to concur in the view that the deposit of money at the place of payment on the due date would not have been sufficient, but under the circumstances, he thought he was not entitled to maintain his individual opinion, seeing that there were so many flaws in the defence which had been set up in this case. Under the special circumstances of this case, he was not prepared to maintain the judgment he gave in the court below. He could not, however, omit expressing the opinion that the equities of this case were so strong against the plaintiff that he did not think the Court ought to go out of its way to assist him in securing payment, considering the laches of which he had been guilty.

Mr. Burton (for the appellant) applied for an order that the costs cover costs of application for provisional sentence.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the application for provisional sentence was refused with costs, and he considered the plaintiff was himself to blame for not giving all the information that was available. The present application must be refused.

ROSSOUW V. VLOK. { 1904.
Aug. 22nd.
" 29th.

Trading with enemy—Sale to non-combatant.

This was an appeal from the decision of the Resident Magistrate of Hay, awarding the plaintiff in the Court below, and now respondent, the sum of £20, value of 21 sheep, his property, unlawfully taken possession of by the then defendant.

From the evidence in the Court below it appeared that the respondent, who lived in Rhodesia, had a farm at Hay. In June 1900, he visited it, and purchased some sheep, which he had branded with his brother's mark, and left them in his care. He took this course because his brother was a rebel, and there would not be so much fear of the sheep being commandeered by the enemy. Some time after, the defendant, who was a policeman, purchased the sheep, as he alleged, for the Republican Army, but used them himself, and gave a receipt for them. The action was brought to recover the value of them from him.

Mr. Burton appeared for the appellant, and Sir H. Juta for the respondent.

In the course of argument, the question arose as to whether Volk's brother was a rebel at the time the sheep were entrusted to his care, or not, so the case was adjourned to enable the Court to make inquiries.

Postea (August 29th).

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the information applied for by the Court has been obtained, and it now appears that the witness, Christian Vlok, brother of the plaintiff, surrendered as a rebel before the plaintiff handed over the sheep to him. The contention of the plaintiff before the Court was that the alleged sale by the witness Christian Vlok, was illegal, because it was a sale to the enemy, and therefore an illegal dealing with the enemy. If, therefore, it had appeared at the time when the sheep were handed over by the plaintiff, that his brother Christian was still a rebel, the plaintiff could not have relied on the illegality of the sale to the defendant, seeing that he would have been equally guilty of an illegality in handing over the sheep to his own brother, who was still a rebel. The information now given removes this difficulty. The only point is whether the Magistrate was right in his finding upon the facts. Upon the facts, he found that the defendant Rossouw had acquired the sheep, not for the use of the enemy, but for his own proper use. He occupied a neighbouring farm, on which he and his father and his father's family lived, and the sheep he obtained from Christian Vlok were used for the feeding of himself and his father and the family. The Magistrate found that the sheep had not been used for the enemy, that it was not, therefore, one of those cases in which the defence that the act was done in the course of ordinary warfare for the benefit of the enemy could apply, and I am bound to say that upon the facts, I am not prepared to dissent from the judgment of the Magistrate. The sheep were entirely for the defendant's own personal use, for persons who were non-combatants. The defendant himself had sheep which could have been slaughtered on his farm, his father had sheep which could have been slaughtered, and the sheep were taken for their own private purposes. For these reasons, I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court below should not be disturbed, and the appeal will, therefore, be dismissed. Mr. Justice Hopley concurred.

BOLDT AND CARL V. HEI- f 1904.
NAMANN. Aug. 23rd.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Close for the defendant.

In this action the plaintiffs, Fritz Boldt and Louis Worms, trading together at Cape Town as Boldt and Carl, sought to recover from Daniel Robert Joseph Heinemann, of Robertson, the sum of £21 7s. 1d., amount due for goods sold and delivered.

Mr. Close said that his client, after reconsidering his position, had decided to accept judgment on the terms of the declaration.

Judgment as prayed was granted.

GLASGOW V. GLASGOW AND DAVIES.

Adultery—Proof.

In this action, the plaintiff, Tom Glasgow, residing at Simon's Town, sought a decree of divorce against his wife, Dinah Glasgow, because of her adultery with one Jack Davies, from whom he claimed damages fixed at £500.

Plaintiff's declaration stated that he was a gardener, residing at Simon's Town, and was married to the defendant on the 15th April, 1892. There was issue of the marriage two children. On divers occasions the first-named defendant was seen to commit adultery with the second named defendant. He claimed a decree of divorce against the first-named defendant, and damages estimated at £500 against the second-named defendant.

The first-named defendant in her plea denied the allegations contained in the declaration as to the charges of adultery, and as a claim in reconvention stated plaintiff lived for some time past in adultery with a woman named Sarah Dixon.

The co-defendant denied all the allegations as to misconduct.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Burton (with him Dr. Greer) for the defendant.

Thomas Glasgow stated he was married to the first-named defendant in 1892, in the English church. There were two boys issue of the marriage. Witness was a gardener, working at the Admiralty. On the evening of the 16th April last witness left the house, and a neighbour, named Mrs. McLawley called his wife. Witness, in company with a man named Tom Peters, went over to see what his wife was wanted for. He saw his wife with the defendant Davies, and they retired to a bedroom. Witness followed them into the room, and as he did so his wife came out, followed by Davies. Witness tried to catch hold of Davies, but his wife would not let him. Witness and his wife lived together until May, when they separated. He had supported her since. His wife was of very intemperate habits, and was repeatedly arrested. He wanted the custody of the two children. He claimed damages at £500 from Davies.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: His wife did not tell him she was going to visit a neighbour. He always believed Mrs. McLawley was a respectable woman. Jack Davies, the co-defendant, was an old man. Witness did not assault his wife nor Mrs. McLawley. Witness had lived unhappily with his wife because she drank. Witness denied that he had committed adultery with Sarah Dixon or any other women. Mr. Budge, witness's landlord, did not give witness notice to leave because he carried on with other women. Witness denied that a man named Dixon had caught him committing adultery with his wife.

Thomas Peters stated he visited Mrs. McLawley's house on the 16th April with the last witness, and saw the two defendants committing adultery. Glasgow tried to strike Davies, but the two women prevented him. Witness had often seen Mrs. Glasgow drunk. On the night in question she was drunk, but Davies was sober.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Witness knew Mrs. McLawley. She was a respectable woman.

Sophia Dixon denied that she had committed adultery with Glasgow.

For the defence, Dinah Glasgow, the first defendant, stated that her husband had constantly ill-treated her. She once left him for a period of five months, and on another occasion he drove her and her children from the house. He supported her and the children. She denied that she had committed adultery with Davies. She had seen her husband committing adultery with Sophia Dixon.

The second defendant, Jack Dixon, an elderly Krooman, denied that he had committed adultery with Glasgow's wife.

De Villiers, C.J., said he would like to hear evidence as to Glasgow's misconduct after his wife had left him.

Tom Dixon called, stated he caught Glasgow committing adultery with his wife a short time ago.

John William Budge stated the plaintiff was a tenant of his. In April last, on account of the repeated complaints with regard to plaintiff's conduct with women, witness cleared him out of his house. The plaintiff admitted to witness that he had turned his wife out and kept another woman.

Cross-examined: Witness never heard of Mrs. Glasgow's drunkenness. He heard of her being arrested once for creating a disturbance.

Christina Davies, wife of the second defendant, stated she had often sheltered Mrs. Glasgow when her husband ill-treated her. Sophia Dixon told witness that plaintiff was supporting her.

Counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

De Villiers, C.J., said, in regard to the claim in convention, he was not satisfied that there was any adultery on the part of the defendant with Davies. The only witnesses were the plaintiff and

Peters, and their evidence was most unsatisfactory. Even if their evidence was accepted, it was quite plain from it that there was no criminal intercourse in the room between the time when the defendant Davies was seen to go into the room and the time when the plaintiff went to the door. The evidence of these witnesses was most unsatisfactory, and it would be impossible to find any person guilty of the offence of adultery on evidence of that kind. Their statements were denied by the witnesses for the defence. The old man Davies had given his evidence, and it appeared to him (his lordship) that his version as to what took place was a likely one. Glasgow seemed anxious to find some evidence against his wife. Finding that she was sent for by her neighbour, and seeing Davies there, he jumped to the conclusion that the two met for improper purposes. The claim in convention should in the opinion of the Court, fail. The only other point was as to whether the defendant should succeed in her claim in reconvention. He was quite satisfied that adultery was committed before April, 1904. If the evidence stood by itself on that point, the defendant would not be entitled to succeed, because she, knowing of the adultery of her husband, had continued to live with him. Taking the fact that adultery had taken place between the plaintiff and Sophia Dixon before April, the admissions made by plaintiff to Mr. Budge, and the fact that Mr. Budge found Sophia Dixon at the plaintiff's house washing, the Court was justified in concluding that the plaintiff was guilty of adultery after he ceased to live with his wife. There seemed to have been no condonation, because, according to his own evidence, the plaintiff had ceased to live with the defendant. The Court gave judgment for the defendant on the claim in convention, and on the claim in reconvention. The claim for the division of property would have no effect, because the defendant brought nothing into the estate.

SECOND DIVISION.

TRIAL CAUSES.

BAM AND OLIFF V. BLOOM. { 1904.
Aug. 28rd.

Agent — Commission — Payment by cheque.

The defendant had instructed plaintiffs (a firm of auctioneers) to find a purchaser for his farm. Plaintiffs introduced one L., who agreed to purchase for a certain sum, and tendered a cheque, which defendant accepted in payment. This cheque having been dishonoured, defendant refused to pay plaintiffs their commission.

Held, that plaintiffs were entitled to recover the customary commission.

This was an action brought by Bam and Oliff, auctioneers, Cape Town, against Lewis Bloom, speculator, to recover £500, commission upon the sale of certain property.

The declaration set out that the defendant placed in the hands of Mr. Oliff, of the plaintiff firm, as his agent, the sale of his rights under a certain agreement that had been entered into by the defendant with Mr. De Wet for the purchase of a certain farm at Brandvlei, in the district of Worcester. It was agreed between the defendant and Mr. Oliff that in the event of the latter arranging for a purchase in terms of the rights of the defendant, Mr. Oliff was to receive a commission of £500. This had occurred before Mr. Oliff entered into partnership with Mr. Bam, and the contract was taken over by the plaintiff firm. Thereafter, on the 31st July, 1903, an agreement was entered into with one Captain Livingstone, by which Livingstone became the purchaser of the rights of the defendant under his agreement with the proprietor of the farms for £1,750, a supplementary agreement of August 8 providing for the payment of an additional sum of £210 to cover transfer duties and expenses in consequence of double duty being payable. On the 8th August, Captain Livingstone, with the knowledge and consent of the defendant, passed his cheque for £1,960 in favour of the plaintiffs, and drawn on the Standard Bank at Aliwal North. The cheque was duly presented, but was dishonoured. Thereafter, the cheque was handed to the defendant, and he sued the said Livingstone in the Transvaal on the cheque for the sum of £1,960, and obtained judgment thereon, and in execution received £1,153. The plaintiffs claimed payment from the defendant of £500 as commission aforesaid.

The defendant, in his plea, said that he entered into an agreement with the plaintiff Oliff with regard to giving him commission, but it was a condition of the agreement that the said Oliff guaranteed payment of the purchase price by the purchaser of the option along with the transfer duties and expenses. He denied that the cheque was made in favour of the plaintiffs with his knowledge or consent. He admitted that he obtained judgment against Captain Livingstone in the Transvaal, but said that the amount received by him was £997 10s., and not £1,153. There was still due to the defendant a sum of £962 10s. from the said Livingstone in respect of the cheque. Defendant admitted that he had not paid to the plaintiffs the said sum of £500, or any part thereof, but he denied that he was liable for such sum, inasmuch as Livingstone had failed to carry out his obligation in the contract of sale, and plaintiffs had not fulfilled their part of the agreement as to commission. He prayed that the claim be dismissed, with costs.

The defendant now stated that he wished to make a few verbal alterations of his plea. He did not receive £997 from the Transvaal judgment, but only £875.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. De Waal) for plaintiffs; Defendant in person.

Mr. Schreiner said that his client's case was simply that payment of the purchase price had nothing whatever to do with the matter of the commission, nor had the difficulties which Mr. Bloom had experienced in connection with realising against the purchase of his option. They absolutely denied that they entered into an undertaking that the purchase money would be paid. The plaintiffs introduced the purchaser to the seller, and it was unfortunate for Mr. Bloom if he had not recovered his money from Captain Livingstone.

John Frederick Oliff, of the plaintiff firm, said the defendant first approached him in regard to the transaction in dispute in March of last year. That was prior to the partnership. There was a farm at Brandvlei, of which defendant had right of purchase from Mr. De Wet. The defendant completed the purchase of the property for the sum of £9,000. Defendant asked witness if he could dispose of the property for him, and named £13,000 as the price. Witness said he had known a party, who had been willing to pay up to £12,000. That party was Captain Livingstone, who was commandant at Worcester during martial law. It was arranged between defendant and witness that he should be paid £500 upon the sale, if effected. There was no mention of a guarantee. Witness subsequently saw Captain Livingstone on the Parade, and introduced him to Bloom at the office of his (witness's) firm in June, or early in July, 1903. Further negotiations took place. Witness's firm made no guarantee that Livingstone would carry out his contract. The first agreement of the 31st July contemplated an immediate transfer from De Wet to Livingstone, but it was found that double transfer duty would have to be paid, and in the end, in August, 1903, a supplementary agreement was arranged for the payment of an additional £210 to cover transfer duties and expenses. The cheque given by Livingstone was drawn on the Standard Bank at Aliwal North. At the interview when the agreement had been finally arranged at Worcester, Bloom became very excited, and demanded his money. Witness told him that he could not have any money on a cheque that was payable at Aliwal North, and offered to advance Bloom £300 on his own promissory note. Bloom accepted the advance, and witness's firm subsequently had to take proceedings in the Supreme Court, and to obtain judgment on the promissory note against the defendant. The defendant subsequently got judgment in the Transvaal on Livingstone's cheque, and witness's firm advised him as to the property to levy upon at Standerton, Transvaal, belonging to Livingstone.

The defendant cross-examined the witness at considerable length. With regard to the defendant's right in the farm, he admitted that his view all along was that the defendant had not an option on the property, but that it was a sale to him from De Wet. Both Livingstone and the defendant argued against that, and witness eventually sank his own better judgment under the circumstances, but, later on, when they saw an attorney, witness's view was upheld, and it was pointed out that double transfer duty would have to be paid.

Hopley, J. (after examining the agreement between De Wet and defendant) said he did not see how the witness could have had any question as to Bloom having an option.

Gerhardus Jacobus Bam, stated he was always present at any negotiations that took place. The cheque was made payable at Aliwal North. With the exception of one suggestion, which was refused there was never any guarantee given.

Cross-examined by Defendant: Witness did not promise to give defendant any money. No money was offered at the Cape Town Station.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

The defendant then called

Henry Gibson, chief constable, at Worcester, who said that on the 11th August, the defendant came to his house and made a complaint that he had signed a paper that he did not know anything about. Witness could not understand on several occasions what the defendant was complaining about.

[Hopley, J.: You had no personal interest in what he was talking about?]

No, my lord. He seemed to think all attorneys were against him, and that he would be swindled.

Hanan Blacher, dealer on the Parade, stated that he saw the plaintiffs on a certain evening in August, and he remembered Bam saying that the money was all right, and that the defendant would have to go to Worcester and sign the papers.

The defendant went into the box, and stated that he sold the farm through Mr. Oliff for £1,750. Mr. Bam said that Captain Livingstone had deposited the money all right, but there was no mention about a cheque before he started for Worcester.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had quarrelled with every attorney that he had come across, because he suspected everyone.

By Hopley J.: If the cheque had turned out all right he would have paid the plaintiff £500.

Hopley, J., suggested that Mr. Schreiner might consult his clients, with a view to some abatement of the claim, although strictly in law they were entitled to the full amount.

Mr. Schreiner said his clients were quite willing, on the hint thrown out by the Court, to forego £150 in the claim.

[Hopley, J.: If the Court finds against you, you will have to pay £500. The plaintiffs now say in answer to the Court that they will not claim the whole amount. Have you anything to say on the case.]

The defendant having addressed the Court,

Hopley, J., said he believed before the plaintiffs went down to Worcester they informed the defendant they had received a cheque, instead of cash, and he did not believe they would be so foolish as to guarantee such a large amount of money. It seemed to him, in strict law, the plaintiffs had earned their commission when the defendant accepted the mode of payment by Livingstone. The plaintiffs had generously abated portion of their claim, and that seemed to him to be the right thing to do in a hard case. There would be judgment for the plaintiffs for £350, with costs.

TROTT BROS. V. MAISEL BROS. AND CO., LIMITED.

Mr. Struben applied for judgment, under Rule 319, against the defendants, who were in default of plea. The plaintiffs obtained leave to sue the defendants by edictal citation on a claim for damages for £189 for breach of contract. The defendants had been served personally.

Evidence was then called for the plaintiff.

Charles Trott, partner in the plaintiff firm, stated that on the 22nd April, 1904, he agreed with Benno Maisel, who he believed to be the principal of a firm with business all over the world, to tender jointly for certain clothing in partnership. Both parties tendered for 20,000 cord jackets at the Ordnance, Port Elizabeth, at the rate of 4d. each, and the defendants' tender was accepted. The defendant Benno Maisel afterwards stated that his tender had been cancelled, because the conditions had not been fulfilled. Maisel stated that he had sold the jackets at a good profit in Johannesburg. Witness could have sold the jackets at a good profit.

Robert Trott, partner with the last witness, stated that Maisel informed him that their tender had been accepted for the jackets, and that he had sold them for 9d. each. The defendant Benno Maisel said that he quite understood that he had to pay for the goods. Witness said if there was any trouble about cash, that he would finance the deal himself. The tender fell through because Maisel did not pay within three days.

Judgment as prayed, with costs.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. v. $\left\{ \begin{array}{l} 1904. \\ \text{Aug. 24th.} \\ \text{" 26th.} \\ \text{" 29th.} \end{array} \right.$
BONNER AND OTHERS.

Estoppel — Misrepresentation — Fraud — Customs duty —
Bonded warehouse—Costs—
Pro rata liability—Consortes litis.

The first defendant B., being a bonded warehouseman at Port Elizabeth, received into bond 40 cases of cigars from W., who afterwards wishing to send them in bond by rail to Johannesburg, obtained from B. the cases and the rail-notes which B. had prepared for the carriage of the goods by rail. W. appropriated the cases with cigars to his own use, and brought 39 other cases to the Railway station, marked with different marks, except one case, to which he directed the attention of the Railway officials, saying that it contained another case inside. The officials neglected to check all the marks and signed the Railway receipts which had been previously prepared by B. as being correct. The 39 cases were sent to Johannesburg, where there was no one to receive them, and on their being subsequently opened, they were found to contain only rubbish. The defendant B. being sued with two sureties on the bond which he had given to the Government for the due warehousing of all goods delivered into his warehouse, claimed as damages the amount of the loss sustained by him through the misrepresentation made by the Railway officials in the receipts signed by them.

Held, that as the initial act which enabled W. to perpetrate the fraud was the delivery to him by B., of the cigars and rail-notes, the Government was not estopped from denying the correctness of the receipts which the Railway officials, induced thereto by the production of the rail notes, had given to W.

Held further, that on a simple prayer for costs, the plaintiff was not entitled to claim, that the costs be paid by the defendants jointly and severally.

This was an action in which the Colonial Government sought to recover from Walter Muir Bonner, William Gibb McNair, and Harry Phillips, of Port Elizabeth, the sum of £1,368 3s. 10d., amount due for Customs charges.

The two latter defendants filed pleas, but were not represented by counsel.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. H. Jones) for plaintiffs; Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Upington) for defendant Bonner.

Mr. Schreiner, in opening the case for the plaintiffs, said it was one brought by the Colonial Government, through William Aldred Collard, in his capacity as Assistant-Treasurer of the Colony. It appeared that Mr. Bonner, the defendant, had a bonded warehouse at Port Elizabeth. In September last, one Wolf placed in the bonded warehouse certain cigars and cigarettes. There were 30 cases of the former and 10 of the latter, which he had purchased.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Who is this Woolfe?]

Mr. Schreiner: Woolfe is a fraudulent party, and what your lordship has to decide is on whom the results of his fraudulent actions will fall. Continuing, Woolfe was a man who had businesses in Johannesburg and Port Elizabeth. He was a man of many aliases, such as Green, Watson, etc. He appeared to have practised various frauds, and at the present time a warrant was out for his arrest. The circumstances of the case were exceptional. Woolfe put the cigars in Bonner's bonded warehouse some time in September. About the 17th, he requested Bonner to have the goods removed from bond at Port Elizabeth, in bond, to Johannesburg. To do this Bonner had to make out forwarding notes. Woolfe somehow or other obtained possession of these forwarding notes from Bonner. Bonner accounted for their disappearance by suggesting that they must have been taken by Woolfe. Woolfe got possession of the documents in which Bonner purported to have forwarded these cigars and cigarettes to J. Wilson, Johannesburg. Woolfe brought wagons, which he hired in Port Elizabeth, to the warehouse. He produced the forwarding notes to the clerks, and loaded the 40 cases referred to in the documents. He then sent 19 of the cases to Jaekes and Co., Port Elizabeth, and 21 of the cases by rail to Kimberley. He appeared at the railway with 39 cases on the wagons, which he delivered to the Railway Department. The contents of these cases were simply rubbish. The railway authorities took the cases as cigars and cigarettes. The evidence of the checkers on that point would be important. He (Mr. Schreiner) contended that the action of the defendant in allowing Woolfe to take these cigars away without sending anybody to look after them, was a very unwise proceeding. The cases going into bond in Johannesburg naturally remained there some time before there was any question of delivery, and then only the deception was discovered.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose when the fraud was discovered it was impossible to get the goods back?]

Oh, yes. The goods were placed on the market in Cape Town and elsewhere, and sold, and Woolfe had gone. The defendant said he had receipts from the Railway Department, but they were receipts for things they had never received.

Mr. Gardiner said the checkers acknowledged having received cases to be delivered to Johannesburg, bearing the same numbers as those that were in the warehouse when the cases arrived at Johannesburg. They were not the same as those received by the railway authorities at Port Elizabeth.

De Villiers, C.J., said he thought that as the onus of proving that he was not responsible fell on the defendant, he would like to hear him examined first.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is William Aldred Collard, in his capacity as Assistant Treasurer of the Colony and Receiver-General of Revenue, and as such representing the Colonial Government. The defendants reside at Port Elizabeth, in this colony. The first-named defendant is the owner or occupier of a bonded warehouse, situated in Britannia-street, in that city.

2. On or about the 20th August, 1903, the first-named defendant as principal, and the other defendants as sureties, in solidum entered into and executed at Port Elizabeth aforesaid, in proper form of law a general inland removal bond.

3. On or about the 16th September, 1903, and on subsequent days until the 26th September, there were warehoused in the said bonded warehouse without payment of the proper Customs duty thereon certain 30 cases of cigars and 10 cases of cigarettes.

4. On or about the said 26th September, the said 30 cases of cigars and 10 cases of cigarettes were entered, suffered, and delivered to be removed from the said bonded warehouse into the custody of the proper office of Customs at the free warehousing port of Johannesburg, in the Transvaal.

5. Neither the said cases of cigars and cigarettes nor any part of them were within the space of 21 days next following the date of such sufferance duly re-warehoused, according to law, at the said free warehousing port of Johannesburg.

6. The Customs duty payable and unpaid upon the said cases of cigars and cigarettes amounts to the sum of £1,358 8s. 10d.

7. By reason of the premises, the defendants are liable to the plaintiff jointly and severally in the said sum of £1,358 8s. 10d.

Defendants' plea and claim in reconvention was as follows:

1. For a plea to the plaintiff's declaration, the defendants say: They admit paragraphs 1, 2, and 3 thereof, save that they say that the Hon. the Treasurer-General is the proper person to sue on behalf of the Colonial Government.

2. As to paragraph 4 thereof, the said goods were, on or about September 26, 1903, delivered over from the said warehouse to the Railway Department of the Colonial Government, for the purpose of conveyance by the said Government to Johannesburg, and the said Government issued receipts acknowledging that it had received the said goods.

3. The said Government has not delivered the goods to the defendant Bonner or to anyone on his behalf, although application has been made therefor by defendant Bonner, who has paid the said Government the sum of £58 1s., in and about railway and Customs warehousing charges in respect of the said goods; nor have any of the said goods been delivered or come into the possession of defendant Bonner, or of anyone on his behalf.

4. The said Government has tendered to defendant Bonner in discharge of its obligations, certain worthless cases, 39 in number, containing rubbish, to wit, straw and stones, but the said cases are differently numbered, and are of different size and description from those warehoused and forwarded by the said defendant as aforesaid, and whereof the said Government acknowledged the receipt.

5. The defendants submit that, under the above circumstances, the defendant Bonner is not liable to pay to the plaintiff the sum of £1,358 8s. 10d., claimed in this suit, nor are the defendants Phillips and McNair, as sureties for the said Bonner, liable to pay the said sum.

6. Save as above, the defendants deny all the allegations contained in paragraphs 4, 6, 7, and 8 of the declaration.

7. They admit paragraph 5 thereof, and that the amount of duty which would be payable on the said goods, when duly delivered, is the sum of £1,358 8s. 10d.

Wherefore they pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

Should the above plea be over-ruled, but not otherwise, the defendants say: Should this Honourable Court hold that the defendants are liable to pay the amount of the Customs duty to the said Government under the terms of the said bond, although the said Government has failed to deliver the said goods, the defendants say that they have a claim against the Government for the aforesaid sum of £1,358 8s. 10d. as damages sustained by them through the negligence of the Government. Wherefore they pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed, with costs.

And for a claim in reconvention, should this Honourable Court hold that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the sum of £1,358 8s. 10d. on the said bond under the terms thereof, the defendants (now plaintiffs in reconvention) say: They crave leave to refer to the matters pleaded in the first seven paragraphs of the plea. Owing to the failure to deliver the aforesaid goods at Johannesburg, and in consequence of the negligence of the said Government through its Railway Department in connection with the aforesaid goods and the receipt and carriage thereof, the defendants have wholly lost all control over and possession of the said goods, and have sustained damages in the sum of £1,358 8s. 10d., and the defendant Bonner has further sustained damages in the sum of £58 1s., for which sums the plaintiff (now defendant in reconvention) is liable. Owing to the non-delivery of the said goods and in consequence of the negligence of the said Government in connection with the receipt and carriage thereof, the defendant Bonner has sustained serious loss in his business as a forwarding and commission agent, and has been compelled to relinquish the same; the said damage amounts to the sum of £1,000.

The plaintiffs in reconvention claim: (a) The sum of £1,358 8s. 10d. as damages; (b) alternative relief; (c) costs of suit.

And the plaintiff in reconvention (Bonner) further claims: (e) the sum of £1,000 as damages; (f) the sum of £58 1s.; (g) interest a tempore morae; (h) costs of suit.

W. M. Bonner (the defendant) stated he knew Woolfe, who resided in Port Elizabeth for a time, and then went to reside in Johannesburg. Witness acted as his agent then. In 1905, Woolfe came to Port Elizabeth, and placed in witness's bonded stores 30 cases of cigars and 10 cases of cigarettes. Witness received instructions shortly after from Woolfe to transmit the goods in bond to one Wilson, Johannesburg. Witness had the necessary documents made out for the transit of the goods. The goods were taken from the store on the 26th September, and on the 28th the "rail notes" were returned from the railway. Witness did not recollect giving them to Woolfe. The numbers on the cases received by witness into his bonded warehouse were the same as the numbers on the railway notes. Witness contended that when that was done his business was finished. While the cases were in his store they were not tampered with. He had since seen the alleged bogus cases. In no instance, with one exception (where the number was written in in chalk) did the numbers correspond with the cases to be forwarded. He first heard, early in December, that something was wrong: when a railway official told him that the cases had not been re-warehoused in Johannesburg. When witness heard that a fraud had been prepared, he, in company with a detective, traced certain of the original cases to Kimberley and Cape Town. If he had received notice immediately that there was anything wrong with the cases, he would have been able to have traced the cases at once. He did all he could to assist the authorities.

Mr. Gardiner: If there was a fraud perpetrated, were you a party to it?—No, certainly not.

Mr. Schreiner: We were very desirous of saying there is no reason to suspect Bonner at all.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness had never known Woolfe by an alias. Woolfe called at the bonded warehouse, and told witness's clerks that he had just come from witness's office. That was not so. When the clerks heard that they began to load the goods. Woolfe handed witness the railway receipts on the Monday following. Witness had not since seen Woolfe. Woolfe's firm in Johannesburg paid witness the amounts due to him. Woolfe remained in Port Elizabeth about a week after the transaction. The person who supplied Woolfe with the cigars had not received payment for them. The goods were forwarded to J. Wilson, Johannesburg. Witness believed there must have been somebody there to receive them. Witness never sent a clerk with goods to the railway station.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Wouldn't it be safer to send a clerk?]

It would but it would be very expensive.

Cross-examination continued: Witness had never seen a clerk accompanying a wagon under such circumstances.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What do you do with the drivers who are strangers?]

We trust them all.

Mr. Schreiner: It is a peculiar thing that with such a business, you trust all humanity.

Cross-examination continued: Witness identified the photograph of Woolfe (produced). He supplied the police with 50 copies of it, which he got from a local photographer. Woolfe was a "plausible" looking man. Witness believed that the cases were taken charge of by the railway.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is your contention?]

It is that these cases got to Johannesburg, and were taken from the store there. The case (produced) was not one of the cases stored in witness's warehouse. Witness only saw Manilla cigar cases in his store, and the one produced was not one.

William Frederick Wright stated he was chief clerk and warehouse-keeper at Port Elizabeth. He produced the right Mr. Bonner had to keep a bonded warehouse. He explained the procedure with bonded goods. Witness saw the bogus cases emptied. They all contained rubbish. In one there was a broken bottle, with a Port Elizabeth seal on it.

[De Villiers, C.J., asked if there was any suspicion of collusion between Woolfe and the railway people?]

Mr. Schreiner: We cannot say that. I am examining the checkers later on.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I cannot understand how it is that Wilson received goods at Johannesburg.]

Wilson was only brick and stone. Woolfe was managing the whole thing himself.

Andrew Kinmont, Railway Goods Superintendent, Port Elizabeth, produced the railway receipts for the various cases. Although they were entered as 40 cases, there was a note stating that they were only 39 in number. He produced a consignment note for 21 cases of cigarettes going to Kimberley. They were consigned to "B. Watson." Witness knew nothing of the transaction until the return of the truck from Johannesburg. The cases only weighed 5,000 lb., whereas they should have weighed 9,290 lb.

Henry Mann, checker, in the employ of the C.G.R., Port Elizabeth, said he knew Woolfe, whom he had always taken to be a commercial traveller. On the 8th September last he saw Woolfe at the door of the Johannesburg shed. Woolfe brought goods there on a dray. He only saw a portion brought; the others were received by subordinate officials. He next saw the cases on the platform. According to the notes, he should have had 40 cases; he only saw 39 cases. Then he was informed by Arthur Guthrie's checker that there were two cases enclosed in one large case. The cases were put on a truck for Johannesburg. Subsequently he saw the cases again at Port Elizabeth, after they had been sent back from Johannesburg. He saw the seal of the truck broken. The cases had been opened, but otherwise did not seem to have been tampered with. He loaded the trucks with the cases to be brought round to Cape Town.

Mr. Schreiner said that, at the request of the defendant Bonner, the cases had been brought to Cape Town for the information of the Court, and were now in the vicinity.

De Villiers, C.J., said he had seen three or four wagons standing in the street loaded with boxes.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness was absolutely sure the cases sent down from Johannesburg were the same as those he sent up. As to the double case, he saw through a slit of the outer case indications of another inside. On close inspection and by the insertion of a penknife, it would be found that it was not a case that was inside.

Re-examined: The goods were received by Gill and Arthur, the latter of whom was employed by Guthrie, the contractors. Arthur told witness that the large case contained another inside. The wagons conveying the goods to the station were private ones.

Mr. Kinmont (recalled) said that, although the goods were brought to the station on private wagons, the merchant would have to pay the contractor through the railway rate, as long as the goods were checked by the contractor's servants. The charge was embodied in the rates charged by the Government.

John W. Gill, checker in the employ of the C.G.R. at Port Elizabeth, said he saw Woolfe bring the cases to the station. Mr. Mann was not there at the time. Guthrie's boys off-loaded the cases in the shed, and the checking was performed by Mr. Arthur. Mr. Arthur called out numbers, which witness entered. Witness had no conversation with Wolfe as to the number of cases. He heard Woolfe say to Arthur that the big one held two cases. He saw the cases brought back from Johannesburg in a sealed truck. They were the same as those he had seen Woolfe bring to the station at Port Elizabeth. He identified Woolfe by the photograph produced.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He checked the number of cases, but not the numbers on the cases.

William Arthur, clerk in the employ of Guthrie and Co., Port Elizabeth, said he checked the cases as they were brought to the Johannesburg shed. The goods were brought in private wagons to the station. They generally checked the goods brought on private wagons to make way for the goods brought on the contractors' wagons. He only checked one number on a case. Woolfe told him about the double case. Woolfe made the remark across the forwarding note to that effect. Witness made a similar remark on the receipt note. The note was inscribed by Woolfe, "One case double." He identified the photograph produced as that of Woolfe.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness did not know who made the pencil marks on the note produced. He could not say who put the number "7071" on the "double" case; he, himself, did not. The figures were on the case when it was pointed out to him. From looking at Gill working, witness thought that he (Gill) was checking the numbers.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: It was only witness's supposition that Gill checked the numbers.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did you know Woolfe well?]-No.

[De Villiers, C.J.: And why did you accept his statement?]-Well, as they stated that they were Bonar's notes, we accepted them.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is that your way of doing business?]-We ought to check them.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you often omit to check them?]-It's not a common occurrence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: And why did you, on this occasion, omit it?]-I really cannot say. We were probably very busy.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Does the customer make any difference; would you check them in the case of one man and not of another, whom you know?]-No; that would make no difference.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Have you ever, before or after, omitted to check the numbers?]-That I cannot say.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It seems so extraordinary that, if it's your custom, you omitted to do so on this occasion. Did Woolfe assure you that the numbers were all right on the notes he handed you?]-Yes, he said that there were 45 cases. When I counted them I found that there were only 39, and then he said that one was a "double" case.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But did he tell you that the numbers on the note were correct?]-No, he never informed me to that effect.

[De Villiers, C.J.: And although he said nothing about it you took it that they must be correct?]-Yes, I took it that they must be all right.

Gilbert Owen Smith, clerk in the office of the Controller of Customs, Cape Town, stated that he had turned up the documents in connection with the consignment in question. The value of the 19 cases was given as £712; and they were delivered to Jecks and Co., Cape Town. The owner's name was given as J. Craig.

Harry Slade, railway foreman, at Johannesburg, stated that a truck, No. 3,348, arrived at Johannesburg on October 4. Witness had the truck-book to support his statement. Amongst other things, it contained 39 cases. On October 6 the truck was off-loaded. Witness saw the cases; the cases outside the court were the identical ones taken off the truck. There was no possibility of the cases having been tampered with whilst in shed No. 1. Subsequently, they were taken to shed No. 2.

Charles Walter Berry, a checker, in the employ of the Railway Department, at Johannesburg, stated that the consignment purported to contain 40 cases, but contained really only 39. When the trucks were unloaded, they showed no traces of having been tampered with. Whilst the cases were in the shed, they were not tampered with.

Thomas Hannan, a railway checker, at Johannesburg, stated that he received the cases from shed No. 1 into shed No. 2. The cases remained in shed No. 2 until they were removed to the Customs. They were not tampered with whilst in shed No. 2.

Charles Dobson, railway inspector, Johannesburg, stated that in October last, he was called to the examining shed. He there examined 39 cases, delivered from No. 2 shed that day. Witness was present at the opening of the cases. They contained straw, bricks, slates, stones, and two broken bottles. The bottles bore a Port Elizabeth mark. There was nothing but rubbish in the cases. Subsequently, witness saw the contents put back in the cases, and the cases sealed up.

Daniel Harrison, a checker, at Johannesburg, stated that he received the 39 cases from shed No. 2 into the Customs. Witness examined one of the cases, and found that the contents were such as described. Witness then called Inspect-tor Dobson to open the other cases. Witness corroborated the previous witness's examination as to the results of the examination, and the re-sealing of the cases. The cases were loaded on a truck, which was sealed, and sent back to Port Elizabeth.

Arthur L. Bollter, a member of the firm of Bollter Bros., cartage contractors, Port Elizabeth, stated that he knew Barney Woolfe well. Witness remembered that Woolfe engaged two wagons, the drivers of which had since left the firm's employment. Witness saw one of the wagons loaded up; he thought that the load was put on at Bonner's bond. Witness left the wagon and Woolfe outside the warehouse. He did not see any other loads loaded up. That was on a Saturday. On the following Monday, Woolfe ordered some more wagons. They were to meet Woolfe at the Victoria Quay. Witness accompanied the wagons, at Woolfe's request. Witness saw the wagons loaded; he thought that the cases put on the wagons were second-hand cases. Witness thought that there were three loads altogether. He went with one load to the railway; he believed that it went to the Johannesburg door. These goods did not come from Bonner's bond; of that there could be no doubt.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness was paid a couple of days after the Monday. Woolfe then said that he was going to Johannesburg in a few days.

Charles Peary, formerly employed as a storeman by W. R. Jacks and Co., Port Elizabeth, stated that he knew Woolfe. Witness remembered that one day in October, 19 cases of cigars and cigarettes were delivered at the store. Witness saw Woolfe at the office; and he issued to Woolfe a receipt for the 19 cases. Subsequently the cases were sent to Cape Town. Some of the cases were in bad condition, and, while witness was putting battens on them, some cigars fell out of one.

Angel Wolf, watchmaker, of Cape Town, stated that the case produced in court was sold to him full of cigarettes by Woolfe, whose photograph witness recognised. Witness bought altogether four cases of cigarettes, and one of cigars; but the case in court was the only one of the five that witness had left. Witness had no idea that these cases were "running" the Customs. Woolfe was paid by cheque.

Cross-examined: Witness could not say on what date he paid Woolfe; he thought it was in September.

Herman May, lately chief clerk at Woolven's Agency, stated that in October last a man came to him and arranged for the storage of some cases of cigars and cigarettes. Witness identified the photograph produced as that of the man who came to him. Witness received 18 cases on October 8 and 9—one case was damaged, and was not delivered by the Harbour Board. On October 12 five of the cases were delivered from the store to Wolf, the previous witness. The remainder were taken away by Woolfe.

Oscar Steven, C.G.R. detective, stated that he had traced the 19 cases through the docks to Wolman's Agency, and then the five cases to Wolf.

Charles Waugh, checker in the employ of the C.G.R., at Port Elizabeth, said that he had been in charge of the Kimberley door, and he received 21 cases of cigarettes from the man Woolfe on the 26th September last.

The witness Wolf (recalled) said that they made a payment of £10 odd for cigars and cigarettes.

By the Court: They did not consider the purchase very cheap, or think they were getting a special bargain.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Counsel handed in the correspondence and copies of the Acts and regulations of the Customs, especially in so far as they affect the position of bonded warehousemen.

Mr. Gardiner submitted that it was never intended by the Act that a bonded warehouseman should be responsible for the custody of goods once they had passed out of his charge, and may be on the wagons going to the Railway Department. If this contention were not held good, then he submitted that if the defendant Bonner proved delivery to the railway of the proper or actual goods, he was absolved from any liability. They had proved at any rate the giving of a railway receipt by the railway authorities to Bonner. His learned friend might contend that this receipt was not given by a railway employee, but by one Arthur, who was employed by the cartage contractors. He submitted that the Railway Department were bound by the receipt given by Arthur, who, to all intents and purposes, acted as a servant of the Railway Department. He submitted further that the Railway Department were now estopped from denying that they had received these cases, and that they were genuine. Supposing it were held that the department were not estopped, then he submitted that they were liable to damages for negligence. Negligence had been admitted by the plaintiffs witnesses in not giving proper receipts. He contended that, but for the negligence of the Railway Department, in failing to take proper steps as to receiving the cases, the fraudulent person Woolfe would have been discovered, and the goods would have been recovered.

Without calling upon Mr. Schreiner,

De Villiers, C.J.: It is clear from the evidence that a bold and ingenious fraud was committed by Woolfe. He was the importer of the cigarettes and cigars which were placed in the defendant Bonner's bonded warehouse at Port Elizabeth. After they had been in the warehouse for some weeks, he induced Bonner to make application to the Customs for surffiance to allow these goods to be taken to Johannesburg. When the rail notes had been prepared and other preliminaries had been complied with by the defendant Bonner, Woolfe managed on the 26th September to obtain possession from Bonner, not only of the goods (the cigars and cigarettes), but also of the rail notes relating to them, and upon these rail notes appear the proper numbers which appear upon the Customs papers. Woolfe having got possession of these documents and of forty boxes from Bonner, forthwith proceeded to send part of them to Kimberley and part of them to Cape Town—not immediately to Cape Town, but first of all to Jacks and Co., in Port Elizabeth, and from there to Cape Town. The remainder of the cigars and cigarettes were forwarded by Woolfe to Kimberley on the 26th. Then, on the 28th of September, having possession of these rail notes, Woolfe goes to the Johannesburg receiving part of the railway-station at Port Elizabeth, and there hands over certain thirty-nine cases to the officials of the Railway Department. Clearly, I agree it was the duty of these officials to check the cases, and to see whether they agreed with the numbers which appeared upon the rail notes; but they seem to have taken the word of Woolfe as sufficient reason for holding that the numbers corresponded. When I say "the word of Woolfe," I do not mean to say that Woolfe told them that the marks on the cases corresponded with the marks on the rail notes; but I say that the fact that Woolfe handed to them the goods and the rail notes amounted to a representation that the goods were the same as those referred to in the rail notes. The railway officials, taking this representation to be correct, did not efficiently check the goods. When they found there were only 39 cases instead of 40, they called the attention of Woolfe to the fact, and he pointed out a case amongst the cases, and said, "That large case includes another case, and that makes up 40." It so happened that that case was marked with one of the numbers which appear on the rail notes. By whom that number was placed is not made clear. It is suggested that the number was placed by the railway officials, but there is nothing to indicate that it was, and it seems far more likely that the numbers were placed there by Woolfe. The cases which were handed over by Woolfe were duly forwarded to Johannesburg to Wilson, to whom they were consigned, but there was no Wilson at Johannesburg to receive the goods. Consequently, they were kept there in the sheds of the Railway Department for some weeks, and ultimately it was discovered that these cases, which had been forwarded to Johannesburg, instead of containing cigarettes and cigars, contained rubbish and fragments of broken bottles. I am satisfied that the cases which were found to contain rubbish at Johannesburg were the cases which had been delivered to the Railway Department at Port Elizabeth by Woolfe. When this was discovered, the fact was intimated to the Customs officials and also to the defendant Bonner. The Customs Department then demanded payment of duty from Bonner under his bond. The bond which is entered into by the warehouse-keeper is a very wide and comprehensive one. It is the general inland removal bond, and it would appear, where such a general inland removal bond is entered into, that no special bond is required in respect of any particular goods which are removed if the warehouseman applies for such removal from Customs. It would have been different if the removal had been applied for by the importer, because, under the 16th section of the regulations put in, the importer would then have been bound to give a removal bond. Bonner was not asked to give a removal bond, because he had already given a general removal bond, under which he is now sued. By that bond he acknowledged himself to be indebted to the Government in the sum of £2,000. Having read the conditions and obligations of the bond, the Chief Justice continued: It is clear then, under this bond, Bonner is liable for the duty, because the goods have not been duly rewarehoused according to law at Johannesburg. The defence is really raised by way of claim in reconvention, and it amounts to this, that Bonner had duly delivered the goods to the department, and that the Railway Department had failed to deliver the goods at Johannesburg, and in consequence of the negligence of the Government through its Railway Department in connection with the aforesaid goods, the defendants have wholly lost all control and possession of the said goods, and sustained damages to the amount of £1,358 10s., and the defendant Bonner further sustained damage to the extent of £58 1s. Then, further, that owing to the non-delivery of the said goods, and in consequence of the negligence of the Government in connection with the receipt and carriage thereof, the defendant Bonner has sustained serious loss in his business as a forwarding and commission agent. On this loss there has not been any evidence. The real question, therefore, to be determined is whether circumstances exist in this case which would entitle Bonner to claim damages from the Government in the sum of £1,358 8s. 10d., being the amount of duty which he is liable to pay the Government. The rejoinder puts forward the negligence of the checkers, to which I have referred, as a ground of estoppel, and it is really upon the points raised in the rejoinder that the whole case at present hinges. The contention for Bonner is that there was negligence on the part of the checkers, that the checkers by their conduct represented to Bonner that the department had received the goods appearing on the rail notes, and that the Department is now estopped from denying that the goods had been duly received. I may say at once that there does appear to me to be a difference between a case where receipts are given for packages actually received, but with different marks from those appearing in the receipts and the case of Standard Bank v. Union Boating Company (7 Juta 257), where receipts were given for goods which had not been received at all. The real difficulty in Bonner's way is that it was his own act which enabled Woolfe to mislead the railway officials into the belief that the goods which he brought to the station were the same as those appearing in the rail notes. If Bonner had himself represented to the Railway officials that the marks appearing on the cases corresponded with the marks appearing in the rail notes he could surely not have relied upon the receipt given by such officials as a misrepresentation giving rise to an estoppel. In fact he did not make such a representation himself, but he did it through Woolfe by handing the goods and the rail notes to Woolfe as his agent for delivery to the Railway Department. If it be said that Woolfe had no authority to make a misrepresentation to the Railway Department it would be equally true that the checkers had no authority to make a misrepresentation in behalf of the department. As to the agency of Woolfe, it is true that he was the owner of the goods, but Bonner alone was treated as the owner as between him and the Government. His name alone appeared in the rail notes, prepared by himself, as the consignor, and his claim in reconvention is founded upon his title to the goods. So far, therefore, as the Railway Department is concerned, he cannot be heard to deny that he is the principal, and that Woolfe, whom he entrusted with the goods and the rail notes was his agent for such further dealings with the department as were necessary to complete the contract for the conveyance of the goods by rail to Johannesburg. It so happens that Woolfe did not consider it necessary to mark more than one case with marks corresponding to those appearing on the rail notes, but if he had marked all the cases with the corresponding marks before delivering them at the railway station, as he might so easily have done, there would not have been the semblance of a case in support of the claim in reconvention. The fact is, that the initial cause which enabled Woolfe to perpetrate the fraud was the delivery to him of the goods and the rail notes. If Bonner wished Woolfe to have possession of the goods he might have told Woolfe to apply for a suffrance order himself, as the importer of the goods, in which case Woolfe would have given a bond before removal from the warehouse. Unfortunately in his desire to assist Woolfe Bonner placed it in his power to commit a fraud, for which, according to the ordinary rule, Bonner must now suffer.

The plaintiff does not object to the claim in reconvention for £58 1s., being for the amount of the freight paid by Bonner. There will consequently be judgment for the plaintiff in convention for £1,358 8s. 10d. against the defendants jointly and severally, and for the defendant upon his claim in reconvention for £58 1s.

As to the costs it is clear that the defendants must pay them, but the plaintiff's counsel has asked the Court to declare the defendants to be liable in solidum. His contention is that inasmuch as the Bond on which judgment has been given makes the principal and sureties liable in solidum, the costs incurred for the purpose of enforcing their liability should also be paid severally as well as jointly. It by no means follows, however, that the costs should always be payable in the same proportions in which the claim is payable. In the case of Lery v. Calf (1 Wat. 1), certain ship owners were held liable in different proportions on the claim in suit, but they were held liable on the authority of Voet (42-1-24) for equal shares of the costs. According to Voet if consortes litis are condemned in costs they ought to bear the costs in equal shares not only where they are condemned to pay the principal claim in equal shares but also when they have been condemned singuli in solidum. Without saying that according to our practice the Court would have no discretion in the allocation of the costs. I certainly consider that under a general prayer for costs the plaintiff is not entitled to claim costs in solidum. The sureties did not appear, which they might have done if the declaration had prayed for costs against them jointly and severally. The judgment will therefore be in the simple form of costs against the defendants.

Hopley, J., concurred.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

CANTUM V. CANTUM. { 1904.
{ Aug. 24th.

This was an action for divorce. Mr. Williams appeared for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default. Counsel said that the parties were married at Wellington in March, 1897, in community of property. In June, 1900, the defendant committed adultery with one Cupido Cupido, and since then deserted the plaintiff. There was no issue of the marriage. Plaintiff claimed a decree of divorce and forfeiture of the benefits arising out of the marriage in community.

Christian Cantum (plaintiff) stated that he went to Simon's Town in 1899, and while there he heard of his wife's unfaithfulness. When he went back to Wellington, he found his wife living with Cupido. The defendant told him she would rather have Cupido than the plaintiff.

Evidence having been called as to the relationship between Cupido and the defendant,

A decree of divorce was granted as prayed.

TRUTER V. TRUTER.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, forfeiture of the benefits under the marriage in community. The parties were married on 15th April, 1903, at the Paarl. In October, 1903, the defendant deserted the plaintiff.

Mr. McGregor was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

Frederick Truter (plaintiff) stated that three months after he was married he went to Kimberley in the military service for a short period, and then came to Cape Town to work. Regularly he visited his wife at the week ends, but one Saturday in October he found her gone. There was no apparent reason for her desertion. Subsequently the defendant said to witness, "You can look for one, and I will look for one."

Order granted, the defendant to return to the plaintiff by 30th September, failing which, to show cause by the 15th October why a decree of divorce should not be granted.

Postea, October 17. The rule was made absolute.

HARPUR V. FINCHAM.

Building contract—Time limit—
Damages.

This was an action to recover certain moneys for work and labour done:

The declaration set out that about June, 1903, the plaintiff agreed to erect a certain building in Vryburg for the defendant for £1,500, the building to be completed and ready for occupation by 8th November, 1903. The plaintiff duly erected the building, and on the said date the defendant took possession. The plaintiff thereupon became liable for £1,500, less £1,340 10s. and £68 4s. 1d. paid on account, and he now claimed the balance, £91 5s. 11d.

The plea admitted the formal allegations, but the defendant denied that the building was completed by the 8th November. It was not completed until 15th February, 1904, and defendant had suffered damages to the extent of £960, which he claimed to set off against the plaintiff's claim.

Mr. P. Jones was for the plaintiff, and Mr. W. P. Buchanan (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) was for the defendant.

Wm. Harpur (plaintiff) stated that, at the request of the defendant, he tendered for a building at Vryburg. The defendant wanted the building completed in five months, but witness pointed out that he could not do that. Certain slabs which were ordered from England did not arrive in time, and the defendant was aware of this. The defendant said that boards could be put on the counter, so that the business could be carried on. When the slabs arrived in February, witness put them in. The specifications did not specify how the tiles were to be put in. He did some extra work on the buildings, but he had not charged for it. The defendant accepted the building as complete on the 7th November, with the exception of some slabs for the counters, which it was agreed should be put in afterwards. The defendant drew rent for the building from November. The slabs arrived on the 15th February, and were put in in a day. Witness received a demand from the defendant for a fine at the rate of £10 per day—160 days, £1,600. Defendant allowed £90 5s. 11d. as due to witness, and thus found a balance in his (defendant's) favour of £1,509 14s. 11d. Witness now claimed £91 5s. 11d., which was really the figure admitted by the defendant in a subsequent statement. The defendant appeared to be very well satisfied with the building, and remarked to him that the building was the best in Vryburg.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Fincham left Vryburg about November, and the building operations were superintended, in his absence, by Mr. Pavert. He tendered for £1,427 to do the work in six or seven months. Mr. Fincham asked him to finish in five months, and promised to make the tender £1,500 if he would do so.

By the Court: The defendant received £12 10s. per month rent from the store building which witness had built, and which was let as a butcher's shop.

Wm. Knight Norquay, butcher, Vryburg, said that he had had full occupation of the building since the 7th November; he had paid £12 10s. a month as rent to the end of June this year. The rent had now been reduced to £10 owing to the bad times. He was not inconvenienced by not having the slabs.

Mr. Jones closed his case.

The defendant, Arthur Wm. Fincham, of Wynberg, said that he went to Vryburg, for the express purpose of spending nine months there. He was away from February to November last. Pavert was to move into the new premises as soon as plaintiff could give possession, and was to remain in the meantime in the old premises, so as to continue the business. At the end of October it was arranged that Norquay should take over the business on the 1st November. Mr. Norquay went into the old portion of the building on the 1st November, on the understanding that he was to go into the new building when the plaintiff gave him possession. Witness's object in getting the work completed by November was to have the work under his eye while he was in Vryburg. He returned to Vryburg in February, and found that the plaintiff was still working at the building, being engaged on the verandah. He had never given the plaintiff to understand that he was dissatisfied with the delay. He had expected the £73 to be expended in labour, thus expediting the completion of the work. The plaintiff did not expedite the work, and thus was not entitled to anything more than the original contract price.

Cross-examined: He was not aware that the slabs had to be sent for from England until he had a demand for the money last March. He was not aware that he had suggested to the plaintiff that he should get the slabs from Cape Town. He did not remember having talked over the matter of the slabs with the plaintiff. It was quite possible that he had forgotten a conversation on such a matter. The main object of the special contract was to have the building completed before witness left Vryburg. He had suffered £73 damages. He had made a miscalculation in his demand for payment of a fine, and should have charged for 90 odd days instead of 160. They were liquidating the business of Pavert in the course of December. He was engaged in electioneering matters in Vryburg last year.

Re-examined: He was at Vryburg frequently between November and February, owing to electioneering matters. He was nominated in October.

Mr. Buchanan having closed his case was heard in argument on the facts.

Hopley, J., said it did not seem that the case of Maryon and Carter, which had just been quoted, was in point in this case. There the plaintiff, who was a builder, and who was putting up a row of houses, sold the houses to the defendant, and undertook, for an additional £80, by a specified date, the houses should be completed, roofed, sashed, and paved in front, and should be occupied by tenants on not less than yearly tenancies. By the expiration of the time specified, the pavements had not been completed, as the plaintiff had contracted for, and therefore he was not entitled to the additional £80. But in this case they had an owner of property at Vryburg getting the plaintiff to tender for the rebuilding of his house, and accepting his tender of £1,427. No time limit was specified in the original contract, and the plaintiff might properly have occupied seven or eight months. To avoid unpleasantness, and to hurry up the plaintiff, the defendant offered him, in a letter dated the 11th June, better terms than his tender gave him, for which he exacted something from the plaintiff. The defendant offered to raise the contract price to £1,500, on condition that the building was completed in five months, reckoned from the 8th June, 1903, a fine of £10 to be imposed by the defendant for each day if the work were not completed on the 8th November. The plaintiff agreed to this proposal. The question was, had the plaintiff carried out his contract? Was the building complete on the 8th November? After reviewing the course of events after the 8th November, his Lordship said that the new premises were let from the 1st November to Norquay, who had become tenant, instead of Pavert, and no inconvenience seemed to have been suffered by the defendant, who must be taken to have acquiesced in the course adopted. Mr. Fincham had had his tenant, and drawn his rent from the 1st November; he had had all the benefits that he possibly could have had if the shop had been as complete as it possibly could be. It seemed to him (the learned judge) that for the defendant now to say that the plaintiff had not carried out his contract was taking a position that was wholly unreasonable, and wholly illegal. It seemed to him that the defendant had made such an acceptance of the work done, and the conduct pursued by the plaintiff that he could not now be heard to say that the plaintiff had not performed his contract. Judgment would be given for the plaintiff, as prayed, with costs, plaintiff to have his expenses as a material witness.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

ADMISSIONS.

1904.
Aug. 25th.

Mr. Close moved for the admission of George Barnes Shaw as an attorney. Applicant had lately been an attorney of the Transvaal. Counsel added that the case was on all fours with the cases of Hofmeyr and Kotze.

Application granted, subject to proof of service with an attorney in the Transvaal to the satisfaction of the Registrar of this Court, and oaths to be taken before the Registrar of the Eastern Districts Court.

Mr. Close moved for the admission of Frederick John Swan as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, oaths to be taken before the R.M. of Graaff-Reinet.

Mr. Gardiner moved for the admission of George Henry Hunter as an attorney and notary.

Application granted, oaths to be taken before the R.M. of Dordrecht.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

KOTZE V. ANDREWS.

Mr. Struben moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £200, with interest, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable; the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

BOESSEN V. DAY.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent. Counsel stated that the matter had previously been before the Court, and had stood over to enable the defendant to sell certain property in order to pay the plaintiff. The debt was £1,300 odd, and the movables realised considerably less than that sum.

Mr. Gardiner (for the defendant) opposed the application, and said that the property had been sold, and there was a prospect that everything would be in order on the 2nd or 3rd September. Certain informalities had arisen, which were beyond the control of the respondent, and, if allowed an extension of time, she would be able to satisfy the plaintiff's claim.

Ordered to stand over until the 12th September.

MASTER V. PIENAAR.

Mr. Howel Jones moved for the usual order upon the defendant to file an account in an estate of which he is executor in the estate of Hendrick Wernich. Usual order granted.

ROOS V. CHETTY.

Practice—Ejection—Motion.

Where the plaintiff had issued summons for ejectment.

Held, that ejectment could not be granted on motion.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence for £50, upon certain lease, being rent for two months, due and unpaid, and also for an order of ejectment in terms of lease.

Mr. Roux (for the defendant) read an affidavit, in which the latter stated that he had made many and great improvements to the property, with the knowledge and consent of the plaintiff, having expended in this way over £400. He prayed that, until the plaintiff had paid him compensation for the improvements, he should not be ejected from the premises.

A replying affidavit by the plaintiff stated that there had been negotiations for the purchase of the property by the defendant. The property was sold to respondent upon certain conditions, but he failed to meet his obligations, and plaintiff afterwards let him have the house on a six months' lease. With regard to the alleged improvements, these were made while the respondent was owner of the property, but, instead of being improvements, they were a detriment. He denied that "improvements" were made with his knowledge or consent. He was entitled to £300 or £400 from the defendant for damage done to the property. He intended to sue the defendant for damage to the property.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: The summons consists of two parts—a claim for provisional sentence and a claim for ejectment. As to the provisional sentence, there is practically no defence to that. The amount of rent is due, and provisional sentence must be given for the amount. As to the claim for ejectment, counsel for the plaintiff quite correctly said that the Court has on previous occasions ordered ejectment on motion, but in the present case, the plaintiff has not proceeded by motion. The plaintiff has proceeded by summons, and, having proceeded by summons for ejectment, he must also file his declaration. It is not in accordance with the practice of this Court to grant provisional sentence on a claim for ejectment. Of course, if there had been default of appearance by the defendant, then, judgment would be given in the ordinary way. But a defence has been raised in the present case, and the practice is that, the plaintiff having proceeded by summons, must file his declaration. Then the defence is raised that there is a right of retention for improvements. That claim for retention can be heard when the action is brought for ejectment. Provisional sentence will be granted for £50, and the plaintiff will be ordered to proceed to the principal case for the purpose of ejectment, with leave to add in his declaration a claim for damages.

Costs will abide the result. There will be provisional sentence for £50, with costs, the plaintiff to file his declaration upon his claim for ejectment, with leave to add a claim for damages.

KENNER AND CO. V. ISRAELSOHN BROS.

Mr. Russell moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note, dated Oudtshoorn, January last, for value received, the note having been dishonoured. Counsel applied for provisional sentence for £550, less £180 14s. paid on account.

Order granted.

POLLOCK V. PULVERMACHER.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence upon a mortgage bond for £1,700, with interest, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

BEAKE V. CAROLESEN.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £700, with interest, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

BOOTH AND SONS V. HARRIS.

Mr. Pymont moved for provisional sentence for £176 9s. 5d., with interest, being balance due on promissory note, bill of exchange, and dishonoured cheque.

Order granted.

MALCOLMSE AND CO. V. CARY.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the partnership and private estates of the members of the firm of H. B. Cary, of Tarkastad.

Order granted.

Counsel also moved for the appointment of a provisional trustee, the name of Peter August Reimers being suggested.

Application granted.

BECKER V. DE VILLIERS.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence for £400 upon a promissory note, with interest.

Order granted.

ESTATE OF GORDON V. WOOD.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for provisional sentence for £2,000 upon a mortgage bond, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest; counsel also asked for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £12, being an extra 2 per cent. interest on the said sum, over and above interest claimed on bond and agreed by defendant.

Order granted.

RUTTER V. BLOCK AND GOLDSTEIN.

Mr. Pymont moved for provisional sentence for £1,900, due on a mortgage bond, with interest, less £25 paid on account, counsel also applied for £14, premium of insurance; and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

DE HETON V. COHEN AND KAPLAN.

Dr. Greer asked that this matter should stand over in view of a prospect of settlement.

Application granted.

Later, Mr. Greer moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note, a net sum of £164 11s. 2d. being due.

Order granted.

HOPKINS V. PLATJES.

Dr. Greer moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £100, with interest, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

JOHNSON V. ERNIE. { 1904.
{ Aug. 25th.

Mr. Pittman moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £80, rent due, with interest a tempore morae, and costs of suit.

Order granted.

L. AND J. HERMANN V. VIVIERS.

Mr. Burton moved for judgment, under Rule 319, upon declaration, for £300, for 30 bicycles, and also for interest on certain promissory notes.

Order granted.

MURRAY AND CO. V. NIEBURG.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved for judgment, under Rule 319, for £170 17s. 6d., balance of account.

Order granted.

MOORREES V. PENTZ.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £52 10s., less £42 10s. paid on account, for goods sold and delivered, with interest a tempore morae, and costs of suit.

Order granted.

DEYZEL V. DEYZEL.

Mr. Gardiner moved for judgment in terms of the defendant's tender in his plea.

Order granted.

REHABILITATION.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan applied for the rehabilitation of Benzel Kaplan. The matter had, said counsel, previously been before the Court, but had stood over for an offer of a composition, this having been accepted by four-fifths of the proved creditors.

Application granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

GLASS V. GLASS. { 1904.
{ Aug. 25th.

Mr. W. Buchanan moved, on behalf of the petitioner, Agnes Glass, for rule nisi to be made absolute, in default of defendant's compliance with an order for restitution of conjugal rights. An affidavit by petitioner was now read as to the efforts made to discover the defendant, who had formerly been in the employ of Texas Jack.

Rule made absolute.

Ex parte THE MUNICIPAL COUNCIL OF RONDEBOSCH.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Mr. Upington appeared on behalf of Aletta Barbara How, of Stellenbosch, to oppose.

From the petition of the Municipal Council, it appeared that a certain lot of land at Westerford, in the municipality of Rondebosch, formed the subject matter of the application. This land was registered in the name of Rudolph Cloete, but for some years past no rates had been paid upon it, and no building had stood there, the result being that an amount of £62 19s. 9d. had become due to the Municipality. Petitioners prayed for an order for the sale of the land, so that they might recover the sum due as rates, and authority to be given to the Registrar of Deeds to pass transfer. The rule nisi was granted on the 21st July.

Mr. Upington read an affidavit by Aletta Barbara How (born Cloete), widow of the late Captain How, and at present residing at Stellenbosch. She stated that she was one of the daughters of the late Rudolph Cloete, and that other children still survived. Her mother died at Stellenbosch in 1866, and her father died at Newlands in 1871, and deponent and other children inherited the estate. From the liquidation and distribution account filed in the estate of her late father and his predeceased spouse, it did not appear that the piece of land referred to in the rule had been brought up and allotted to the heirs. Owing to an act of omission the ground had been left unadministered, and deponent prayed that an executor dative should be appointed for the purpose of administering the same and paying out the proceeds, after satisfying the claim of the petitioners. She stated that the value of the said land was far in excess of the amount alleged to be due to the petitioners.

The further hearing of the case was postponed to next term, to enable an executor to be appointed.

DARTER V. DARTER AND BOARD OF EXECUTORS.

Mr. Close applied on behalf of Georgina Darter for an interdict to restrain the defendants from disposing of certain moneys, pending the hearing of a civil action, to be brought by the applicant against her husband.

The order was granted.

KUIL V. UNION-CASTLE CO.

Mr. Gardiner applied on behalf of the plaintiff to make absolute a rule nisi ordering the plaintiff to sue the defendants in forma pauperis.

The application was granted, Mr. Gardiner being appointed counsel.

DAVIDS V. ESTATE DAVIDS.

Mr. Roux applied on behalf of the plaintiff to have an order of the Court enabling him to sue in forma pauperis made absolute. He also applied for an interdict to restrain the defendant from disposing of certain properties.

[De Villiers, C.J., said the Court had to presume that the executors would not part with the property. He wished to know if they were men of means or men of straw.

Mr. Roux: We believe they are men of straw.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The estate may be of straw, and the executors may be men of means.]

An order calling on the defendants to show cause on the 15th October why the plaintiff should not sue in forma pauperis, and also why they should not be restrained from disposing of the property, was granted.

Ex parte HIGGS.

Mr. P. Jones applied on behalf of the plaintiff for leave to sell certain property. He said the applicant was executrix testamentary of the will of her late husband. In the estate there was a certain property, which had been lying idle, and bringing in no income for a number of years. She now wanted to sell that property for £150. The Divisional Council valuation of it was £50. The Master's report was favourable.

The application was granted.

Ex parte SEALE.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for leave to raise a mortgage bond on certain property belonging to a minor, for the purpose of making improvements.

The matter was referred to the Master.

Ex parte BEARS SON AND CO., LTD.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order approving certain resolutions, unanimously passed at meetings of the company, to reduce the capital of the company. The whole share capital of the company was represented at the meetings.

The application was granted.

HAMP V. HAMP.

Mr. Gardiner moved on behalf of the wife for an order on defendant to pay £30 to enable her to institute proceedings against the defendant for a decree of judicial separation, and for a sum of money to enable her to support herself. An affidavit was made by the applicant alleging that her husband had disposed of his business as a cabinetmaker for £1,200, out of which he would receive £500.

Defendant said he had no means. He could not supply his wife with the £30, nor could he pay a solicitor. His creditors had seized his business. He was providing for the children, and had sent moneys to his wife.

Mr. Gardiner said the action was for judicial separation, on the ground of desertion.

De Villiers, C.J., said the Court could give applicant leave to sue in forma pauperis upon her making application.

Mr. Gardiner said he would consent to allow the matter to stand over.

The Court ordered the matter to stand over until the 31st August.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

Ex parte WOOLF. { 1901.
{ Aug. 25th.

Mr. Sutton moved for an order authorising the transfer of certain property.

Granted.

Ex parte OLIVIER AND ANOTHER.

Dr. Greer applied for the appointment of a curator ad litem. Mr. Christian claimed to be appointed.

The order was granted.

ELLIS V. SMITH.

Mr. Pyemont, on behalf of plaintiff, sought an ejectment order against the defendant.

Plaintiff's affidavit stated defendant, who gave himself out as a medical practitioner, undertook to rent a furnished house from her at £13 10s. per month. He did not return to sign the agreement. When plaintiff went to take over possession of the house from the then tenant, she found the defendant in possession. She demanded the rent from him. He promised by letter to pay the amount due, but had failed to do so.

Hopley, J., inquired if the furniture was plaintiff's.

Mr. Pyemont replied in the affirmative, and said that the plaintiff rented the house. Twenty-four hours should be sufficient time to clear out.

[Hopley, J.: He got in quicker than that.]

An order for the ejectment of the defendant from the premises by Saturday was granted.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

PETERSEN V. GRIFFITH. { 1904.
(Aug. 26th.

Negligence—Damages—Pleading.

This was an action brought by Martinus Petersen, of Diep River, to recover from John Griffiths, of Maitland, the sum of £50, damages sustained by plaintiff owing to the negligence of defendant.

The plaintiff's declaration stated he was a gardener, and owner of cart and horses, which he used for carting vegetables to Cape Town market. The defendant was a dairyman and farmer residing at Maitland. On the 31st May, plaintiff sent his cart and horse in the care of his brother to the Cape Town market. The cart was standing in New Church-street whilst the vegetables were being delivered. Whilst doing so, the defendant's cart, with two horses attached, came galloping along New Church-street, and rushed into plaintiff's horse. The pole of the wagon pierced the horse's chest and killed it on the spot. The collision also broke a window, which defendant replaced. Plaintiff called on the defendant on the 1st June, 1904, and told him of the occurrence. The defendant the following day called on plaintiff, and tendered him £15, which amount plaintiff declined to accept. In consequence of the accident, plaintiff claimed £30 for the loss of the horse, £6 15s. for hire of another horse, and £14 for loss of services.

The defendant's plea admitted the accident, but denied that it was due to careless driving. His horses bolted owing to a bridle breaking. Although not admitting liability, defendant tendered plaintiff £15 for the horse, which he refused to accept. He was still prepared to pay the same amount.

Mr. Sylvester Williams appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Rainsford for the defendant.

Martinus Petersen (the plaintiff) stated he was a gardener, and resided at Diep River. On the 31st May last he sent a quantity of vegetables on a cart to Cape Town market. The horse, although in good condition, was an aged one, probably about twelve years old.

To the Court: When witness bought the horse five years ago, he gave £37 for it. He would not have sold the horse for less. He considered the horse was worth £60.

Examination continued: Witness heard by telegram of the accident. He inspanned his cart and came into town. He got the defendant's address, and went to see him. Defendant asked him how much he wanted for the horse. Witness replied that he would take £30. Defendant said it was all right, and promised to fetch witness's cart. He did so. The next day defendant offered witness £15, which he refused to accept.

Cross-examined: Witness asked Mr. Griffiths to bring him a horse that was quiet. He would have been quite satisfied with that. Witness had not since purchased a horse. He had to hire one whenever he required it.

John Braun, horse dealer, of Wynberg, valued the plaintiff's horse at £35.

Mr. Rainsford: This horse was "bandy-legged," was it not?—No, indeed.

Samuel Goldberg, general dealer, of Diep River, stated he knew the horse in question. It was a good puller and clean worker. He valued it at from £30 to £35.

Mr. Rainsford: What was the age of the horse?—I do not know.

And yet you place a value on a horse without knowing its age?—We do not go according to age on the Flats.

You say you do not attach any importance to the age of horses on the Flats?—That is so. It makes no difference to us what a horse's age is.

[Hopley, J.: At the age of twenty-one a horse on the Flats can work with as much ease as a five-year-old?]

I do not think the horse was twenty-one.

[Hopley, J.: When does a horse get old on the Flats?]

I do not know, my lord.

Carl Kinney valued the horse at £45 or £50.

Peter Peterson, brother to the plaintiff, stated he was selling vegetables in Cape Town on the morning of the accident. He was standing on his own cart when he saw the horse bolting, and he immediately jumped down. The pole of the wagon pierced the breast of his horse, knocking it down and killing it. Witness did not notice that the harness of the defendant's horses was broke. The horses, after knocking witness's horse down, continued galloping until defendant controlled them.

Cross-examined: After the horses were captured Mr. Griffiths went to look at witness's horse. Defendant mentioned nothing about the bridle being broken.

To the Court: Witness followed the horses after they knocked his horse down, but could not overtake them.

Peter Solomon, an eye-witness of the accident, gave corroborative evidence.

Antonio Parkinson also gave corroborative evidence.

In cross-examination he admitted that the bridle was broken.

Abdulla Mahomed stated he heard the conversation between Griffiths and Petersen, the former offered the latter £15.

John Griffiths, the defendant, examined stated that one of the horses by means of the pole pulled off the bridle. The horses bolted and witness could not control them. They ran into plaintiff's horse and killed it. Witness had the harness three months at the time of the accident. Witness had never had any trouble with the horses before. They were young horses. He saw the horse lying dead and he did not think it was worth more than £15.

Cross-examined: Plaintiff refused to accept the £15 witness tendered him. Witness considered that a fair amount.

To the Court: At the time of the runaway witness was busy serving out milk.

[Hopley, J.: The weak part in the defendant's case is that he was not attending to his horses at the time of the accident and that he took no steps to prevent such an occurrence. Most people would do as he did, except a very careful man.]

Police-constable Rivet (257) stated he arrived on the scene shortly after the accident. The horse was dead. He valued it at about £12 or £15.

Witness had had vast experience of horses. He was transport-sergeant in the K.O.R.'s for two years, having charge of 800 horses and 200 mules.

[Hopley, J.: Have you any experience of buying or selling?]

I have sold them on the Parade for the Imperial Government.

[Hopley, J.: From what I know of the Parade, horses do not fetch their value there, especially horses the property of the Government. The witness has not seen the extravagant part of the thing. He has only seen Army horses sold.]

Evidence of value was given by James Louw, who stated he did not think the horse was worth more than £10. It was an aged horse, and seemed in poor condition.

Cross-examined: If it had been his horse he would have valued it at £12. This closed the evidence for the defence.

Hopley, J., asked what clause C (£14 for loss of service) meant?

Mr. Williams: It means the loss sustained through being deprived of the service of the horse.

[Hopley, J.: But he charges hire for another horse.]

Mr. Williams: I leave that matter to the discretion of your lordship.

Counsel having argued on the facts.

Hopley, J., said that although the case had been fought on the grounds of the defendant's carelessness and negligence, no mention was made in the declaration of that fact. Sooner than let the case stand incomplete, he proposed to allow the plaintiff to alter his declaration to read properly.

This was done.

Hopley, J.: In this case the plaintiff and defendant had had misfortune, and "bad luck," to use an ordinary parlance. The plaintiff had lost a horse, which to him seemed to have been a valuable one, and of which he seemed to be very fond. He thought the plaintiff's feelings on that point were really sincere. On the other hand, the defendant had had the misfortune to have his cart run away, and do a considerable amount of damage. The question as to whether the defendant's action could be brought under the category of negligence, was a question for the Court to decide. In the opinion of the Court he should be held liable. Although he sympathised with him, he (his lordship) felt that it would be wrong on his part not to hold him liable for neglect. It was not gross neglect. It was neglect that a good many people would be liable to incur under the circumstances. The defendant must be held legally guilty for the consequences of such negligence. It was the duty of the Court to fix on something that would be a fair price for the horse. The measure of damages should not be added to, by hire of other horses, and loss of services. The proper measure of damages was the value of the horse, as it was before it was killed. He had heard evidence on that point both from the plaintiff's and defendant's witnesses, and he thought that £25 would fairly meet it. It seemed unfortunate that the defendant, who seemed to be a reasonable man, did not carry his reasonableness a little further. There would be judgment for the plaintiff for £25 and costs.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte PASCOL. } 1904.
Aug. 26th.

Mr. Sutton moved for an order authorising the alteration of the name, Andriana Maria Pascol, under which the petitioner signed an ante-nuptial contract, and for an order on the Registrar of Deeds to amend the name in a certain transfer of property.

Order granted.

Ex parte KLEYN.

Mr. Rainsford moved for an order releasing the petitioner's estate from sequestration. No creditors appeared on the occasion of the first meeting on the 1st July, 1904, before the R.M. at Oudtshoorn, and the second meeting was adjourned in order to consider a compromise, and a majority of the creditors had signed in favour of the release.

Order granted.

BLIGNAULT V. WEPENAR AND OTHERS.

Mr. Burton was for the applicant, and Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. M. Bisset), appeared on behalf of the respondents, Snyman and Verschuur.

This was an application to have an award of arbitrators made a rule of Court. The parties had agreed to the award with the exception of the one particular clause, which now came before the Court.

Mr. Schreiner contended that the arbitrators had exceeded their powers, and applied for a remission of the third clause back to the arbitrators.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he thought if it had been intended that the arbitrators should deal with water beyond the boundaries of the farm Buffelsvlei, the memorandum of agreement would have been more specific, and he considered the arbitrators had gone beyond their powers in assigning any rights to farms outside the boundaries of Buffelsvlei. It might be that there were common law rights or they might be able to make good their position by immemorial usage, but the order of the Court would be that the clause in dispute would be remitted back to them for reconsideration, in accordance with clause 16 of Act 29 of 1898, and the costs of this application would follow the same line of provision fixed upon by the arbitrators in the general costs.

Ex parte FIENHABER AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for an order amending the name of the petitioner in a certain deed of transfer in which his second name had been omitted, and also that of his wife, whose name appeared as Augusta Dorothea instead of Dorothea Augusta in a certain ante-nuptial contract.

Order granted.

Ex parte DU PLESSIS.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for an order amending the petitioner's name on a certain deed of transfer.

Order granted.

Ex parte BEYLEVELD.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order including the name "Joachim" in a certain deed of transfer.

Order granted.

Ex parte GOW.

Dr. Greer moved for an order authorising the Master to pay out a certain monthly allowance out of the inheritances of two minors to whom the petitioner was tutor.

An order was granted authorising the Master to pay out to Frederick Babb the sum of £6 10s. in settlement of a debt for board and lodgings, and £4 a month to each of the minors as suggested by him. The Master to report in case of any change in the circumstances of the minors which would render such payments unnecessary, the costs to be paid by the Master out of the inheritances.

Pauperies—Noxal action—Horse—Damages—Abrogation of law by disuse—Culpa.

The plaintiff's horse, while standing in harness before a farrier's door, was kicked by the defendant's horse which had been brought there to be shod, and was being led by the servant of O., to whom the defendant had lent the horse. There was no proof of negligence on the part of the servant nor was there any evidence that the defendant's horse had previously been known to kick or injure any person or other horse.

Held, that although under the Roman and Dutch Law the defendant would, as owner, have been liable for damages, unless he tendered to surrender his horse as compensation, he cannot, under the law of the Colony, be held liable in the absence of any culpa.

The case of Seavill v. Colley (9 Juta 39) followed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Somerset East. The appellant sued the respondent in the Court below for £25 (less £5, to bring the matter within jurisdiction), for loss of a horse through the maiming of one of its fore legs by a kick from a stallion pony belonging to the defendant. The incident happened in front of a farrier's shop at Cookhouse, and the animal had to be shot in consequence of its injuries. The contention of the plaintiff was that the injuries were due to the negligence of the defendant's servant. The Magistrate gave judgment for the defendant.

The Magistrate, after setting out the facts of the case, gives his reasons as follows:

"To maintain this action plaintiff is required to prove that the injury was caused by the carelessness of the employee of the defendant. Evidence has been led to endeavour to prove that the stallion was a mischievous animal, and that the owner must have been aware of the stallion's vicious nature, and further that the stallion had no right to be at the place where he kicked plaintiff's horse. There are no decided cases in any of our Colonial Courts that I can find to assist the Court in arriving at a decision, but of reference to some of the cases heard in the County Courts in England, it is laid down that the owner of a domestic animal is liable only if he knows that the animal is accustomed to do mischief. The animal was produced on view in front of the Court and exhibited no signs of vice. It is contended on behalf of the defendant that defendant's horse was known to be vicious and that the damage resulted from a trespass for which defendant's boy was responsible. But there is no satisfactory proof that defendant's horse was of a vicious temper, and whether the horse had a right to be in front of the farrier's shop or not, is immaterial, because even supposing that there was negligence in this respect, the owner would only be liable for the ordinary consequences of his neglect, and that the horse kicking another horse was not a consequence of this nature. But I go further and say that it is reasonable to admit that the stallion had every right to be in front of the farrier's shop where the accident happened. It has not been proved that the stallion had a previous mischievous propensity. The animal was not what may be termed "a kicking horse" and the damage was not caused by the horse committing such an act as he might naturally have been expected to commit. I have therefore no alternative but to enter judgment for the defendant, with costs.

Mr. McGregor was for the appellant; Mr. Schreiner, K.C., was for the respondent.

Mr. McGregor submitted it was a fair inference where the owner was aware, or, speaking generally, knew his animal had done damage, or that the animal belonged to the class that does damage—then it was only fair that the proprietor should make good in money any damage done by the animal. It was only fair because he had sufficient warning from the previous history of the animal, and it was rather too much to say that, because the horse was under the stern eye of the Magisterial Court that it was not a vicious animal.

Mr. Schreiner said that on the summons as it stood it was quite clear that his learned friend could have nothing to say. As far as negligence was concerned, there was an absolute answer in the fact that the boy, who was in charge of the horse, was not the servant, or the agent of the defendant. In England an action of this sort would have to be founded on negligence. The neat point their lordships would have to decide was whether a horse, tamed or not, carried with it the responsibility for any damage resulting.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The old authorities put a slave and a horse on the same footing, and held the latter to be a rational animal.]

Mr. Schreiner contended that the authorities were obsolete, as a horse could not be put on the same footing as a slave. Continuing, counsel said that if it was held that it was an inherent probability on the part of a horse to kick under certain circumstances, then it must be shown that the owner of the horse put it in those certain circumstances.

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea, September 5.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an appeal against the judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Somerset East in an action for damages for an injury done to the plaintiff's horse by a horse belonging to the defendant. The injury was caused by a kick, but there was no evidence that the defendant's horse had previously done any similar injury, or that the servant who had charge of it was guilty of any negligence. In the absence of such evidence the Magistrate found a verdict of the defendant.

The question whether the owner of the animal is liable to make compensation for damage done by it has repeatedly been before this Court, but in every decided case there has been an element of culpa, which left no doubt as to the owner or custodian's liability. In the case, for instance, of dogs chasing ostriches, the natural propensity of the dog to pursue a fleeing bird was held to impose on the owner, or custodian, the duty of preventing the dog from indulging in that propensity at the expense of the owner of ostriches, which are not trespassing on the property of such owner or custodian. If through failure of his duty, damage is done, he has been held liable for such damage on the ground of his culpa, and not of his mere ownership or possession of the dog. In the same way, seeing that it is part of the ordinary nature of animals, such as cattle, to wander wherever their instinct leads them, and so to commit trespasses, our law, quite independently of the Pounds Act, holds the owner liable for trespasses committed by such animals. So, also, it has been held in Beatty v. Donnelly (Buch., for 1876, p. 51) that the owner of a monkey is liable for damages for personal injury done by it, on the ground that the animal being ferae naturae, the owner ought to have known of its mischievous propensities, and guarded against their being exercised at the expense of others.

In the present case the Court has to decide upon the liability, or otherwise, of the owner of a horse for a sudden act of a violent nature, contrary to its usual habits. It is the case of mischief done by the vice of an animal, such vice having been causelessly stirred within it, and not excited by provocation from without. If the horse had been known to the owner to have the vicious propensity of kicking, he would be liable, not on account of his ownership, but on the ground that, with such knowledge, he did not guard against the probability or even possibility of its doing mischief. The question is, whether without such knowledge the owner should be held liable?

If the case had arisen for decision under the Roman law, there could be no doubt as to the result. According to the Institutes (4, 9, pr.), "a noxal action was granted by the Law of the Twelve Tables in cases of mischief done through wantonness, passion, or fierceness by irrational animals, it being by that law provided that if the owner of such animals surrender them in satisfaction for the damage, he is thereby released from liability, as, for instance, if a horse that is apt to kick does damage by kicking, or a bull with a propensity to butt does damage with its horns. But the action only lies in cases where the animal is acting contrary to its nature. If it is the nature of the animal to be fierce, the action is not available. Thus, if a bear runs away from its owner, and causes damage, the former owner cannot be sued, for immediately with its escape his ownership ceased to exist. The term pauperies is used to denote damage done without any wrong on the part of the doer, for an unreasoning animal cannot be said to have done any wrong." This passage clearly shows that the liability attached to the owner, not on account of any negligence of his, but by reason of the bare fact of his ownership. According to the Digest (9, 1, 1, section 12), if the owner transferred the ownership, his liability ceased, and the person who acquired such ownership became liable. He also, like the original owner, could escape liability for damages by surrendering the animal which did the mischief. Some of the illustrations given in the Digest bear a very close resemblance to what actually took place in the present case. Thus, it is said by Alfenus (Dig. 9, 1, 5) that where an oetler was leading a horse which smelt at a mule mare, which on her part kicked and broke the oetler's leg, the owner of the mule was liable in the noxal action.

In regard to the Dutch law, the writers are not unanimous, but the preponderance of authority supports the retention of the Roman law in regard to noxal actions for injury done by animals. According to Van Leeuwen (Comm. R.D. Law, 2 Vol., Kotze's Transl., p. 323), "he whose animal causes damage to another must make compensation or deliver up the animal for the same. But if the animal be wild by nature, or otherwise of a mischievous propensity, as, for instance, a dog accustomed to bite, or a horse accustomed to kick, or the like, the owner will be liable to make full compensation for the damage done, without being able to get off by giving up the animal." In his note to this passage, Decker says: "Whether by our Dutch laws the owner can escape further liability by giving up the animal is, not without reason, a matter of doubt with many." Vinnius also in his Commentary on the passage in the Institutes already cited says: "At the present day the surrender of the offending animal (noxæ deditio) is not in use, but the damage done is assessed by the judge." On the other hand, Groenewegen (De Leg. Abr.), in his Comment upon the same passage, and Voet in his Commentaries (9, 1, 8), maintain that the Roman law remained in force in the Netherlands. It does not appear from any of the published reports I have consulted that the point was ever decided by the Dutch Courts, but I take it that if the present case had come before them for decision, they would have held the defendant liable, either to surrender his horse or pay the plaintiff the damages by him sustained.

The question remains whether the noxal actions are still maintainable in the courts of this colony. The Roman law placed injury done by a man's slave on the same footing as injury done by his cattle, but it is obvious that since the abolition of slavery the noxal action for damage done by slaves must be considered as having been likewise abolished. As to animals, it does not appear that the noxal action has ever been brought in this colony, or, so far as I can ascertain, in any other colony or State of South Africa. In every case in which the owner of an animal has been held liable in this colony for mischief done by it, there has been proof of some degree of culpa, rendering the owner liable under the Aquilian law, rather than under the Law of the Twelve Tables. In no case has the owner tendered to surrender the offending animal, in order by that means to escape liability. It goes without saying that in a pastoral country like this cases of injury done by animals to each other or to human beings, without any fault on the part of their owners, must be a matter of very frequent occurrence. The fact that the persons injured have never sought to recover damages without, at all events, alleging negligence or circumstances from which culpa might be inferred, and the further fact that persons whose animals did the mischief have never attempted to escape further liability by surrendering such animals, go far to prove a general custom which is inconsistent with the rule of the Roman law. Not only is there no reported case in which any South African Court has recognised that rule, but there are several dicta of our judges which are somewhat at variance with the rule. In the case of Le Roux v. Vick (Buch., 1879, p. 29), Smith, J., in his instructive judgment, held that the owner of a dog is liable for damage done to an ostrich on a commonage, but he was careful to explain that it was the mischievous propensity of dogs and not the mere ownership which rendered the owner liable. "I am afraid," he added, "a suitor would scarcely think that, moribus hujus seculi, a judge was acting in accordance with the highest principles of equity in deciding that a Kafir dog was all the compensation he could obtain for the loss of a valuable breeding bird that had been bitten to death by that dog." In Spies v. Scheepers (3 E.D.C., 173), Buchanan, J., said that the liability for injury done by animals is founded upon the doctrine of culpa or negligence. It is obvious that he could only have referred to the law of this colony, because the liability for pauperies under the Roman law and Dutch law was independent of any negligence on the part of the owner. In Graham v. Viljoen (8 Buch., 126), the liability of the owner of a dog for injury done by it was placed on the ground of the mischievous propensities of dogs generally, and not of his mere ownership of the dog which did the mischief. In Eastern Telegraph Company v. Cape Town Tram- ways Company (17 Juta, 95), I ventured to point out that our law requires some degree of culpa to render any person liable for injury done to others by reason of the otherwise lawful user of his own property. The Judicial Committee, which affirmed the judgment in that case, seems to have misunderstood my remarks in regard to the case of Fletcher v. Rylands. I did not say that the law of this colony differs from the law as there laid down, but I remarked that I should not be prepared to hold it to be a binding authority in this court if the question of culpa did not enter into the decision of that case, and I indicated that the want of due care taken by the engineer in that case would constitute culpa as defined in our law. It is true that by our law a master is liable for damage done by his servant while acting within the scope of his employment, although the master may have exercised due care in the selection of his servant. The culpa of the servant is deemed to be the culpa of the master who employed him, but if the analogy of the Roman law were to apply, the master should, by forthwith dismissing his servant, be relieved from liability for injury done without any personal negligence on the part of the master. A servant is a rational being, which the animal is not. The Roman law treated them both as equally capable of doing an injury, and allowed the master of an offending slave to surrender him in the same way as the owner of an offending animal could surrender him in lieu of paying compensation. The liability followed the animal, or the slave, as the case might be, and only attached to the owner so long as he remained the owner. It was a primitive law which is hardly consistent with modern notions regarding the nature of animals, and their relations to their owners, and others than owners. If that law were still in force, some extraordinary results might follow. Supposing, for instance, a valuable horse were causelessly and contrary to its usual habits to commit a serious injury, and were then sold at a high price to a person who had never heard of the injury. The purchaser would be liable in damages to the person injured, unless he were prepared to surrender the animal. The seller may have spent the money, or have left the country, and the purchaser would find that with the horse he had purchased a liability, which he could only get rid of by getting rid of the horse also. If such is still the law, it must, of course, be enforced, but it appears to me fairly to fall within the principles laid down in the case of Seavill v. Colley (9 Juta, 39). The presumption is that the law relating to pauperies is still in force, but this presumption cannot prevail in the absence of any recognition, judicial or otherwise, of the existence of such a law, and in the face of repeated decisions, which require proof of some degree of culpa in order to attach liability to the ownership, custody, or use of property. In the absence of any evidence of culpa on the defendant's part, I am of opinion that the Magistrate gave a proper judgment, and the appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

REX V. KEENE. { 1904.
{ Aug. 29th.

Native area—Act 28 of 1883, sections 21 and 22—Acceptance of licence subject to condition—Aboriginal native.

Where the Governor has by Proclamation defined any area as one, within the limits of which it shall not be competent for any Licensing Court to authorize licences in terms of the 21st section of Act 28 of 1883, it lies upon any one who denies the validity of the Proclamation to prove that the area is not one to which the section is applicable.

The acceptance of a licence purporting to be subject to such a Proclamation issued by the Governor is an admission by the licence-holder that the area within which his licence holds good is one to which the Act is applicable.

This was an appeal from a decision of the A.R.M. of Molteno, by which the appellant was ordered to pay a fine of £10, or two months' imprisonment, with hard labour, for supplying an aboriginal native with a bottle of brandy. Mr. W. P. Buchanan was for the appellant, and Mr. Howel Jones appeared for the Crown.

Mr. Buchanan said that the accused was summoned under the Act 28 of 1883, which had been applied to the district of Molteno by the Proclamation 10 of 1904, for selling a bottle of brandy to one John Human. Human, in evidence for the prosecution, said that his mother was a Hottentot and his father was a German; while, for the defence, the accused said that he had repeatedly served Human openly, and Human had told him his father was a German and his mother a Cape woman, and from his appearance he concluded that there was white blood in his veins, and that he was a Cape boy. Counsel contended that it was not competent to proclaim the Magistracy of Molteno under section 22 of the Act 28 of 1883; otherwise Cape Town could be proclaimed, and no person would be safe in giving his own native a glass of liquor of any kind.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The only point in your favour is that the summons ought to have been for acting contrary to the licence, and not for contravening the section of Act 28.]

Mr. Buchanan then proceeded to argue that the Crown must prove that liquor was sold to an aboriginal native, and between aboriginal native and native there was a vast difference.

[Hopley, J.: What is an ab-original native?]

It must be very hard to define.

[Hopley, J.: You had better be careful; some of us may be involved in this matter.]

That just shows the hardship on licensed victuallers.

[Hopley, J.: Would you go so far as to say that any one born in the country was a native?]

According to the dictionary meaning aboriginal natives are the descendants of the first inhabitants of this country, but I cannot claim that myself.

[Hopley, J.: You say this man may be a native, just as you and I are, and not an aboriginal native?]

Simply because an ab-original native's ancestors were here from the start.

[Hopley, J.: The moment his blood is infused with the blood of other people he ceases to be an aboriginal native?]

Mr. Buchanan proceeded to quote the case of Queen v. Parrott (9 C.T.R., 460), in which it was held that the appearance of the person was the truest test of all, but in this case Human had long hair and straight features.

[Hopley, J.: This is his father.]

Yes, my lord. Proceeding, counsel asked the Court to look into the difficulty experienced by licensed victuallers in distinguishing between natives and non-natives. If this conviction stood, it would mean that licensed victuallers would not be able to sell to any man of dark colour, whether he was a Spaniard, an Italian, a Frenchman, or even the Northern Scots, some of whom they knew were dark, like "Dark Douglas." The question was whether Parliament should not meet the difficulty without thrusting the responsibility on the licensed victuallers, who would be simply forced to total prohibition to all persons of dark colour.

Mr. Jones said there was no authority against him on the question of the framing of the summons. Attempts had been made to prove that these Proclamations were ultra vires, but they had been all set aside, and counsel contended that it was a sufficient admission on the part of the appellant when he accepted his licence that natives congregated in the Molteno district. The question in this case was whether Human was not a Hottentot, and if he was a Hottentot, it was perfectly clear he was an aboriginal native. In all cases of this kind that had come before the Supreme Court, the Magistrate's opinion on the personal appearance of the native was largely accepted. The licence was accepted under the Proclamation.

De Villiers, C.J.: The appellant was charged with a contravention of section 22 of Act 28 of 1885, "in that he did wrongfully and unlawfully sell or give a quantity of brandy to an aboriginal native, namely, one John Human, within the limits of an area proclaimed by the Governor under the 21st section of the Act." The Court has held in various cases that, if a proclamation is issued in an area to which it is not legally applicable, there can be no charge of selling contrary to the Proclamation. There have been cases in which evidence has been given that the area is one in which the Proclamation is wholly inapplicable, and the fact that such area has formed part of the seat of magistracy has been an important factor in coming to the decision as to whether it is such an area or not. In a subsequent case, namely, the case of Brown, the Court held that where a licensed holder accepts his licence subject to a proclamation, that that is an admission by the licence-holder that the Proclamation is applicable to that particular area. In the present case, we find that the licence of the appellant has been accepted subject to the Proclamation. That in itself is evidence that the area is one to which the Proclamation is applicable, and in the absence of other proof on the matter, in my opinion there is not sufficient evidence that this area is one to which the Act is not applicable. It is therefore no longer necessary to charge the accused with selling contrary to the licence, because, if this area was one to which the Proclamation was applicable, the accused was rightly charged for a contravention of section 22 of Act 28 of 1885. Therefore, in regard to the objections as to the form of the summons in the present case, I am of opinion that it cannot be sustained. I come next to the objection on the merits. The defence is that the man to whom the accused sold the liquor—this John Human—was not an aboriginal native. Amongst aboriginal natives included in the Act are Hottentots, and the question therefore is, can this man be fairly called a Hottentot. The man himself says: "I consider myself a Hottentot," which he is not likely to have said if he had not been one. His friends looked upon him as a Hottentot, and it is an important statement that he looked upon himself as a Hottentot. It is true he said his father is a German, but he only heard that by repute. He does not say whether he has ever seen his father. But then there is other evidence that his father was a Bastard, and that his father was darker than he was. The Magistrate saw the man, and, although the man had straight hair, the Magistrate was satisfied that he was a native, and following the usual principles I think the Court would not be justified in interfering with the decision. The Magistrate has had a far better opportunity of judging the man's nationality than this Court. The man admits he is a Hottentot, the Magistrate found him to be a Hottentot, and I am of opinion the conviction ought not to be interfered with. The appeal must be dismissed.

Hopley, J., concurred.

GENERAL MOTION.

Ex parte COHEN AND { 1901.
KAPLAN. { Aug. 29th.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved, as a matter of urgency, for an interdict restraining Saed and Co., of 330, Hanover-street, from removing any machinery from the premises until certain arrears of rent were satisfied.

A rule was granted, calling on the respondents to show cause why they should not be interdicted from removing any goods, pending an action, the rule to operate as an interdict in the meanwhile, and to be returnable by the 12th September, with leave to the respondents to apply to have it discharged.

Postea (September 13th). Rule made absolute, but the Court refused an order to attach all goods of respondent wherever they might be found.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

HASSERIS V. MARKS.

Landlord and tenant—Extension of lease—Evidence—Damages.

This was an action in which the plaintiff (M. J. Hasseriis) sought an order of ejectment, and damages fixed at £250 against the defendant (J. E. Marks), who is proprietor of the Columbia Steam Laundry, Cape Town.

Plaintiff's counsel mentioned that since filing the pleadings the defendant had given up possession of the premises, so the sole issue would be the matter of damages.

Plaintiff's declaration stated he resided at Observatory-road, and was the registered owner of certain premises in Cape Town, in which the defendant carried on the business of laundryman. In May, 1899, plaintiff let certain buildings, machinery, plant, and fixtures to one Fule for the period of a year. Thereafter the lease was renewed for a further period, ending May 31, 1904. Fule, with the consent of the plaintiff, let the building to the defendant, who had remained in possession until the expiration of the lease. In May it was agreed that defendant should continue in possession during the month of June on payment of £40. Thereafter in or about the month of June, plaintiff gave defendant notice to give up the premises on the 1st July. He refused to quit or give up possession. Plaintiff, to the knowledge of the defendant, required the premises, plant, machinery, etc., for the purpose of carrying on the business of a laundry, and, in consequence of the defendant's action, had been prevented from so doing. In consequence he claimed damages estimated at £250. The defendant's plea admitted the formal allegations, and also the lease to Fule, and the subletting to defendant. With reference to the paragraph of the declaration in which the plaintiff said the defendant was given a month's tenancy, the defendant held that he was given a monthly tenancy, terminable with a month's notice. He admitted the plaintiff demanded possession, but said that he did it wrongfully and unlawfully. On the 29th June, defendant gave the plaintiff notice that he would give up possession on the 31st July, and tendered him a month's rent, which he refused to accept. He denied that he had any knowledge of the fact that the plaintiff intended carrying on a laundry business himself.

The plaintiff's replication admitted the offer of the defendant to pay rent for the month of July, but he considered the offer totally inadequate.

Mr. Upington for plaintiff; Mr. Wilkinson for defendant.

Mr. Upington said that since possession had been obtained, an examination of the premises showed that the machinery and plant had been badly used, and had the plaintiff known that when drafting his pleadings, he would have claimed for it.

The plaintiff, examined, stated that prior to 1897 he carried on business as a laundryman in Observatory-road and Cape Town. Owing to ill-health, he had to lease the Cape Town premises to one Fule, who with plaintiff's consent sublet them to defendant. In May last, defendant's manager interviewed witness, and asked him if it was possible to remain in possession for the month of June, as they had been very busy during the month of May, and had been unable to remove their machinery. Witness consented, and said he would take £40 for the month's rent. The lease was not one that was terminable by a month's notice. Witness required the premises for his own use, as he intended restarting a laundry business, or else letting them on better terms to somebody else. During the month of June, witness cabled to Chicago and England for new machinery, and also purchased a horse and wagon, because he determined to take the place over himself. Witness went to the laundry several times during the month of June to ascertain how the defendant was getting on with the removal of his machinery, but he seemed to be doing nothing. Towards the end of June, witness felt sure that defendant would not be out by the end of the month. At the end of June the defendant's manager tendered witness £40 as rent for the month of July, and also gave a month's notice. Witness then took legal advice, in consequence of which he declined to accept the cheque. Witness went to the defendant's laundry at Wynberg on the 29th June, to endeavour to arrive at an amicable settlement. Witness offered him the premises for three months at £60 a month. He refused to accept those terms. Witness saw a notice on the door of the defendant's premises in Cape Town stating that the business would be moved to Wynberg on the 16th June, but that the wagons would call at Cape Town, Sea Point, and Kalk Bay weekly. The date had been changed from the 16th May. Witness was unable to get the premises in July. Defendant gave up possession on the 2nd August. The machinery was in a frightful state. Witness claimed £250 damages, made up as follows: Rent for two and a half months, £60; upkeep of horse and wagon, £10; placing premises in decent working order, £75.

By Maasdorp, J.: That state of affairs would have existed if the plaintiff had got the premises in June.

Witness (continuing) stated he found the laundry business very successful. He made about £80 a month profit whilst working the Cape Town laundry.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: Witness did not know all the damages that had been caused to the machinery when he filed his pleadings. Had he done so, he would have claimed more than he did. Witness did not leave the arranging of the damages to his attorney.

[Maasdorp, J.: It might be well if he had.]

Cross-examination continued: Witness only claimed damages for loss on machinery and horse hire. He did not claim damages through not being able to carry on his business. The defendant did not hold the place on a monthly tenancy. Witness gave him a month's notice, although it was not necessary.

Amelia Hasseriis, wife to the plaintiff, gave corroborative evidence with regard to the conversation that took place between defendant's manager and plaintiff when the former asked for the premises during the month of June.

Henry Wrensch stated he was an attorney practising in Cape Town. In company with plaintiff, witness visited the defendant at his Wynberg office. Witness asked him what he intended doing, and he said he had given his agent instructions to communicate with the plaintiff's attorneys. He gave as his reason for not clearing out the fact that the Wynberg Municipality had not laid the gas to his new place.

Mr. Upington said he could if the Court wished call evidence as to the state of the machinery, but as there was no claim for that he thought it would be wasting the time of the Court.

Maarsdorp, J., said that would form another cause of action. The defendant probably had not come to meet that.

Mr. Upington then closed his case.

Joseph Edwin Marks, the defendant, examined, stated he took the premises over from a man named Fule. When the lease terminated, he sent his brother to interview the plaintiff, and, in consequence of the report his brother made, he gave him instructions to forward a cheque for £40. Witness had the place on a monthly tenancy, terminable on a month's notice. Witness found that he could not get his machinery out in time, so he offered the plaintiff a month's rent at the beginning of July, which he refused to accept.

In cross-examination witness denied that when he sent the cheque, on the 9th May for the June rent that it was to secure his tenancy. He did not want a month's extension; he wanted it for an indefinite period.

Thomas Craven Marks, brother to the defendant, and manager of the laundry, stated he, at the instance of the defendant, interviewed plaintiff about taking over the premises. The plaintiff agreed to let them have it for three, six, or twelve months, if necessary, at £40 a month. Witness sent him a cheque for one month's rent on the 9th May. When the cheque for the month of July was tendered, the defendant refused to accept it.

In cross-examination, witness denied that he agreed to take the place for a month only from plaintiff. He got the place for an indefinite period. Witness did not send the cheque on the 9th May to secure the tenancy of the premises. They intended, if possible, to remove their laundry business by the 15th June.

Edward William Biffin, clerk in the defendant's employ, said he was present when plaintiff and defendant's manager had a dispute about the rent. The manager said plaintiff was taking advantage of the defendant.

Mr. Wilkinson closed his case.

The defendant, re-called, said he often paid his rent in advance to Fule.

In reply to Mr. Upington, witness admitted that he had done a good business in the plaintiff's premises. He made about £75 a month.

This closed the case, and counsel having been heard in argument on the facts. His Lordship delivered judgment, and said it appeared in this case that the defendant was in the beginning of May last in the occupation of certain premises in Plein-street belonging to the plaintiff, which he was using for the business of a laundry, under a lease which was then in existence, but which was to expire on the last day of May. At that time it also seemed that the defendant was engaged in setting up the business of a laundry and erecting machinery in another place at Wynberg, where he intended to remove his business, on leaving the plaintiff's premises. At that time the defendant became aware that he would have some difficulty in completing the new place before the end of May in consequence of the work he had to perform in the erection of his machinery, and also because of some works for the completion of which the Municipality were to some extent responsible. The defendant thereupon sent his brother as his agent to the plaintiff's place to endeavour to get an extension of the lease, for the purpose of enabling him at greater leisure to remove from one place to the other the plant he required. What took place between the brother and the plaintiff was the question in dispute. A contract was there entered into between the defendant's agent and the plaintiff, in the presence during part of the time of the plaintiff's wife. There was a direct conflict of evidence between the parties as to what took place. The plaintiff stated that, upon being informed that the defendant wished for an extension of the lease, he told Mr. Tom Marks that he was willing to extend it for a few months, if necessary. Tom Marks told him that they did not wish it for longer than a month, and thereupon a contract was entered into for the hire of the place for the month of June. The defendant's agent, on the other hand, stated that he informed the plaintiff that they would require the place for an indefinite period, which they could not then fix on, and that the plaintiff answered him that they could have it as long as they liked at the rental of £40. The Court had now to decide whose evidence it had to believe. He wished to state in starting that in testing the evidence they had on the part of the plaintiff a direct contract for a period of a month at a rental of £40, and on the part of the defendant they had a statement that an agreement was entered into, that the place should be held for as long as the defendant pleased at a rental of £40 per month.

Now, it struck him that the contract, as alleged by the defendant's agent, was of a very unbusinesslike character, and one would expect if his statement was correct that the receipt would state more details. Such an indefinite contract considering the manner in which the parties had done business hitherto certainly seemed strange. But he would not on that ground have thought it necessary to doubt his statement. It was evident that Mr. Tom Marks was sent by his brother to enter into a contract with the plaintiff, the object in view being to have the period extended so as to cover any time that was required to comfortably remove from one place to another. When the agent was at the plaintiff's place he told him that he thought he could move out of the place in a month. This was about May 9, consequently they expected to be out of the place by about June 9. It seemed to him that they thought that that would be the time required to get out. The agreement, therefore, would be made to meet that difficulty, and the agreement to extend the lease to the end of June would have met this difficulty. The question then arose as to whether it was the intention that the place should be vacated before the end of June. On reference to the notice that was put up at the defendant's place of business, they had some light thrown on the view the defendant held. In March they thought they would go by the end of May, they thought fifteen days would be sufficient to clear out. But at the beginning of May they found they had miscalculated, and they intended to be out of the place by June 15, as the notice signified. He did not see any reason for them to enter into a lease that would take them much beyond that period. If that was so, they would not want an interminable lease. They seemed to be aware of their circumstances, and of the time that would meet their difficulties, and they fixed that time to be somewhere in the month of June. Consequently, he came to the conclusion that he could accept the evidence given by the plaintiff and his wife that they offered to plaintiff to let the property for more than one month if necessary, but defendant would not accept it. The Court had to decide what damages the plaintiff was entitled to. The defendant had, according to his own admission, offered £45 per month, and he (his lordship) took it that that would be a fair claim for the use and occupation of the property after the expiration of the lease. There would therefore be judgment for that amount, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

ESTENBERG v. COOPER. (1904.
(Aug. 30th)

Defamation — Verbal injury —
Theft—Damages.

The defendant made a statement to others that the plaintiff had committed theft and qualified the statement by adding that the plaintiff had removed goods of his after they had been duly attached by the Messenger of the Magistrate's Court.

Held, that although such removal might not constitute theft in the proper sense of the term, yet that as it was, at all events, a dishonourable act, the statement was defamatory and constituted a verbal injury to the plaintiff.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Jansenville, the appellant, Nicholas J. Steenberg, having sued the respondent, Philip Cooper, in the Court below for £20 damages for alleged slander and defamation. The Resident Magistrate gave judgment for the defendant with costs.

The summons set out that the defendant had on May 10 last informed sundry persons that the plaintiff had stolen half the mealies out of the coop. The allegation was made in Dutch. The defendant pleaded the general issue.

From the evidence, it appeared that the defendant denied having accused the plaintiff of stealing the mealies, though he said that the plaintiff had removed some mealies.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that, from the evidence recorded, it appeared that a quantity of mealies belonging to the plaintiff were attached by the Messenger of the Court on the 2nd May last, in execution of a judgment obtained against plaintiff by defendant, and that on the 10th May the Messenger was at the plaintiff's farm for the purpose of removing the mealies to sell them. The summons said that the defendant alleged that plaintiff had stolen half the mealies, while the defendant said that what he did say was that certain of the mealies had been removed between the 30th April and early in May, and that he believed the plaintiff was the man who had removed them. The question now arose, did the defendant make use of the language stated in the summons? He (the Magistrate) was satisfied that the defendant did use the language complained of, and he was unable to accept the defendant's version of what he said. Having come to that conclusion, it was clear that the defendant was liable. The Magistrate proceeded to discuss the question whether the original owner could be charged with the crime of theft if he had, as a matter of fact, removed goods under attachment, and he went on to say that he had come to the conclusion that the plaintiff could not have been convicted of stealing the mealies in question if he had made away with them, as suggested by the defendant. This action, therefore, fell to the ground, and judgment must be given for the defendant. If this suit (the Magistrate added) had been brought in a superior court, the question between the parties would most likely have been decided upon exception, but the form of the summons adopted by the plaintiff's attorney did not allow of this course being followed here. The defendant would be granted his costs of suit. If it were held that he was wrong legally, and that he should have found for the plaintiff, he should only have allowed him one farthing damages, without costs.

Mr. McGregor was for the appellant; Mr. Gardiner was for the respondent.

Mr. McGregor said that the misapprehension seemed to have arisen from the fact that the Magistrate had not broadly followed the principle of Roman-Dutch law that there was slander where there was injuria. It was quite true that the word used was the Dutch equivalent for steal. Such an accusation being made on the country-side by a business man against a farmer undoubtedly constituted an injury to the plaintiff. There was no doubt this allegation was made with a intention of injuring the plaintiff.

Mr. Gardiner contended that slander had not been proved, because the allegation of the defendant did not amount to accusing the plaintiff of a crime. The defendant did not say that the mealies had been removed subsequently to attachment. If the Court were against him on that point, counsel then submitted that removal after attachment was not a crime.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an action for defamation, the defamation consisting in the defendant charging the plaintiff with theft. It was not denied that the charge of theft was made, the Magistrate so found it; but then (said the Magistrate) the word "theft" was qualified by the defendant saying that the plaintiff had taken the goods after attachment, and inasmuch as that was not theft, there was no defamation, and consequently there should be judgment for the defendant. On this point the Magistrate has erred. It is quite possible that Mr. Gardiner may be right in saying that where a person is charged with being a thief, and the word "thief" is qualified by words which would not imply anything dishonourable or disreputable, then in such a case there is no defamation. But in the present case, even if it would not be theft on the part of the plaintiff to remove the goods "in attachment," it would, in my opinion, have been a highly dishonourable and disreputable act. Confidence was placed in him by leaving the goods with him without security being taken, and there can be no doubt that the statement that he removed those goods was defamatory. Our law does not agree with the English law in requiring for the purpose of the finding of a person guilty of defamation that there must be proof that a crime was alleged. It is clear, to my mind, that the words used conveyed the meaning that the plaintiff had been guilty of a dishonourable or a disreputable act. The only question which remained was what damages should be awarded. The Magistrate said that if he had found for the plaintiff, he would have given a farthing damages. That would certainly not have cleared the plaintiff's character. There was no attempt on the part of the defendant to prove that there was any truth in the suggestions he had made. It is poor compensation to a man to have a farthing damages awarded him when he seeks to clear his character, and show that he has not been guilty of a dishonourable act imputed to him. It appears to me that the Magistrate would have been quite justified in giving at least £5 damages. The appeal will be allowed, with costs in this Court, and judgment entered for the plaintiff for £5 damages, with costs, in the Court below.

SOLOMON V. STEFANI.

Aug. 30th
Sept. 5th.

Sale and purchase—Non-delivery of goods sold according to sample—Damages.

The defendant, a merchant in this Colony, purchased boots in separate lots and at different prices from the plaintiff, a manufacturer in London, and paid part of the price. On arrival of the boots in the Colony, the defendant rejected several lots, which were wholly unmerchantable and not according to sample, and gave notice to that effect to the plaintiff.

Held in an action to recover the balance of the price and the cost of insurance and freight paid by the plaintiff, that as the plaintiff had failed to deliver certain boots according to sample, the defendant was entitled, by the actio empti, to claim in reconviction delivery of such boots or damages for non-delivery.

Held further, that the measure of damages was the difference between the contract price and the price at which the defendant could purchase goods according to sample in the local market, and that in the amount of the contract price should be included the expenses which under his contract the defendant had to bear for the conveyance of the boots to South Africa.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of East London.

From the record in the Court below it appeared that an action had been brought by the present appellants in the Court below for £107 9s. 11d., on certain bill of exchange, with noting charges and interest from the 10th March last, the said bill of exchange having been dishonoured. The respondent had pleaded a claim of a similar amount against the plaintiffs for breach of contract, in that goods supplied by them were not according to contract. The matter arose out of a shipment of boots sent by the plaintiffs to defendant on his order. It was alleged that a quantity of the goods were unmarketable and unmerchantable, having been packed damp, and that they appeared to be shop-soiled. The defendant had a survey prepared, and he forwarded it to the plaintiffs, who, however, returned no acknowledgment.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said that the total price of the shipment seemed to have been £358

15s. 4d., and that the defendant had paid £300 on account, but he denied that he should pay the charges for freight, wharfage, etc. The plaintiffs said that a balance was due to them of £58 15s. 4d. for the goods, and £48 14s. 7d. for freight, wharfage, etc. The Magistrate found that, in accordance with the survey, goods of the value of £64 14s. 10d. were unmerchantable, that the defendant was entitled to be allowed £17 8s. 2d., proportion of charges, and also £20 as damages, being the difference between the English cost price and the local market price of the goods, making a total of £102 3s. He gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £107 9s. 11d., as claimed, and found for the defendant on the counter-claim for £102 3s. As in the opinion of the Court, added His Worship, the plaintiffs did not act reasonably in response to the letter sent by the defendant, and the surveyor's report, costs were awarded to the defendant.

Mr. McGregor, for the appellants. A. Solomon and Co., of London, England; Mr. W. P. Buchanan was for the respondent, Antonio Stefani, East London.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. McGregor): Do you appeal on the question of costs?]

Mr. McGregor: Both costs and law. Counsel said that one point was that the defendant could not go and choose which of the goods he would have, and which he would not have. He must either accept or reject the whole consignment. If the consignment were not good enough, then he must reject the consignment as a whole.

Hopley, J., remarked that it would have been very awkward if the defendant had had to reject the whole lot and sue the plaintiffs in London for the return of the £300 which he had paid.

Mr. McGregor said that of the whole shipment £294 worth was rejected. He quoted the case of Irrim v. Berg (Buch. 1879, 183) and submitted that the Magistrate was wrong in allowing the defendant £20 damages for loss of profit. Again, it appeared that there had been no attempt at sale by the respondent of the goods that he rejected. He contended that the defendant having bought a consignment of boots, could not be allowed to select a certain number of the best and then reject the remainder, and be allowed a loss of profit on those he rejected. If the whole consignment were rejected by the purchaser, then there was a chance of disposing of it, but if only the bad material were rejected, then the plaintiff was simply left with so much waste. Counsel contended that there had been delivery by the plaintiff to the defendant, who had had physical possession of the boots. Defendant had written to the plaintiffs saying that he had goods at plaintiffs' risk.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What do you suggest? That he should have thrown the goods out of door?]

In the case of Greenshields the goods were sold. Counsel went on to contend that, though there had not been acceptance by the defendant, there had been delivery by the plaintiff. He quoted, on the question of delivery, the case of Theron v. Africa (10, Juta). Assuming for a moment that the Court were against one on the question of the whole consignment, Mr. McGregor submitted that the Magistrate had awarded an excess of damages. There ought, he urged, to have been a total dismissal of the defendant's claim in reconvention. He maintained that there had been no wantonness on the part of the plaintiffs that should be specially penalised.

Mr. Buchanan submitted that there had been no delivery of the rejected articles, that this was a divisible contract, and that defendant was entitled to reject the unsatisfactory goods. On the question of damages, counsel contended that defendant was entitled, as measure of damages, to the difference between cost or purchase price in London (England) and market price in East London.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the plaintiffs sued the defendant in the Court of the Resident Magistrate of East London for £107 9s. 11d. upon a bill of exchange. This bill of exchange represented the balance of what was owing to the plaintiffs on a sale of boots and shoes, and also the costs of insurance and freight for these goods from London to East London. Part of the purchase price had been paid. The defendant did not deny having purchased the boots, but his defence was that he had a claim in reconvention for damages sustained by him by reason of the defective condition in which some of these goods arrived in this colony. It is clear that the defendant never accepted these goods—the defective goods—because, as soon as the defect was discovered, the boots were set aside, and notice was given to the plaintiffs that they were kept for and on account of the plaintiffs. As to the defective condition, there could be no doubt; two experts gave their evidence that these boots were wholly unmerchantable, that they were shop-worn and shop-soiled, and that the defendant could not have been expected to accept these goods. It appears also that these boots were purchased in different lots, and it was in separate lots that they were rejected. The defendant did not accept part of a lot and reject part; but where he rejected, he rejected the whole lot, on the advice of experts. It is not, therefore, like the case of Irrine v. Berg, where a quantity of goods has been bought at a certain price, and the whole accepted and re-sold, and then an attempt made to recover damages for the lot which was not up to sample. It is a case where the vendor has failed to deliver certain goods corresponding to sample and the purchaser is entitled by the actio empti to claim delivery of such goods or damages for non-delivery. The only difficulty in the case is as to what should be the measure of damages. The way in which the Magistrate arrived at the amount was to take the purchase price in England, then to add to that purchase price the cost of insurance and freight, and then, in order to ascertain the damages sustained at this end, he deducted the difference between the purchase price in England and the market value in South Africa. But in ascertaining what is the cost price to the defendant, the Magistrate should have added to the price in England the cost of freight and insurance. He should have added the sum of £17 8s., which formed the cost of freight and insurance, to the price, for the purpose of ascertaining the damages. It is clear that that is the measure of damages which has always been recognised by this Court—the difference between the contract price and the market price at the place where the goods are to be delivered, but, in ascertaining the contract price, it is not enough to ask what was the original price. To the amount of that contract price must be added the expenses which under the contract the purchaser was bound to pay of conveying the goods to the place where they were delivered. The difference, therefore, between the measure of damages, as found by this Court, and as found by the Magistrate, is £17 8s. 2d. The judgment of the Magistrate was for £102 3s., on the claim in reconvention; that ought to be £84 14s. 10d. On the claim in convention, he gave judgment for the plaintiffs (the present appellants) for £107 10s., thus leaving a very small balance in favour of the plaintiffs. As to the costs, I consider that the Court should not interfere with the decision of the Magistrate. The costs were incurred on the claim in reconvention, and the defendant succeeded on that claim. As to costs in appeal, it is quite clear that the appellants now succeed in obtaining a substantial reduction in the amount awarded to the defendant in the Court below. The result, therefore, will be that the judgment of the Court below is amended by reducing the judgment for the defendant from £102 3s. to £84 14s. 10d. That being a substantial reduction, the plaintiff will have to pay the costs of appeal.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

TRIAL CAUSES.

CLOETE V. CLOETE. 1904.
Aug. 30th.

This was an action for divorce, brought by Anna Cloete, against her husband, on the ground of his adultery.

The declaration set out that the parties were married at Colesberg, in March, 1897, and on 15th July, 1899, he wrongfully deserted the plaintiff.

Mr. Van Zyl was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was in default.

The plaintiff stated that she lived happily with her husband until 15th July, 1899, when, without the slightest warning, he deserted her without any reason. At the same time another woman, named Du Plessis, left the village of Colesberg. She had since written to her husband, but got no reply.

A witness, named Maber, said that he was appointed by the Dutch Reformed Church, at Elliott, to inquire into the defendant's conduct, and found him living with the woman Du Plessis, as her husband.

Decree of divorce granted, the defendant also to forfeit all benefits under the marriage.

VAN DER MERWE V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. 1904.
Aug. 30th.
Sept. 5th.

Scab Inspector—Acts 28 of 1889 and 20 of 1894.

M., a duly appointed scab inspector, during the Martial Law regime failed to obtain a permit from the Military to visit his district and discharge his duties. The evidence showed that he was always ready and willing to perform the same. He was thereupon suspended by the Agricultural Department, but did not receive the letter notifying his suspension.

Held, that he was entitled to the full amount of his salary accruing during the period of such suspension.

This was an action to recover salary due from defendants.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was a scab inspector, and he sued the Government through the Colonial Secretary for £311 10s., as salary due to him. About February, 1900, the Colonial Government agreed to employ the plaintiff as a scab inspector for the field-cornetries, numbers 2, 3, and 4, of the Aberdeen division, at a salary of £200 per annum, payable monthly, with an allowance of £25 per annum for forage. It was also agreed that the agreement should be terminable upon one month's notice. The defendant paid the plaintiff his salary up to the 28th February, 1901, but wrongfully and unlawfully refused to pay salary from the 1st March, 1901, until 19th July, 1902, and he claimed that the amount of £311 10s. as and for the said salary.

The plea admitted the formal allegations, but set out that it was a statutory appointment, and that it was competent under the Act of 1899, for the Minister for Agriculture to dismiss or suspend the plaintiff from his employment. During the period between 28th February, 1901, and 19th July, 1902, the plaintiff did not discharge his duties, and on the 6th June, 1901, the Minister for Agriculture lawfully suspended the plaintiff from his appointment, and the plaintiff acquiesced in the suspension. Subsequently the plaintiff was authorised to take up his appointment from 19th July, 1902, and he took up his appointment from that date.

The replication denied that the plaintiff was lawfully suspended, or that he acquiesced in the suspension.

Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Gutsche) was for the plaintiff; and Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Howel Jones), was for the Government.

David van der Merwe, plaintiff, stated that he was first appointed on the 20th February 1895, under section 6 of Act 20 of 1894, and subsequently under the Act 28 of 1899. In 1901 the district of Aberdeen was disturbed owing to an invasion of the Boers, and in January of that month he saw the Civil Commissioner, and reported to Mr. Robertson that he had difficulty in carrying out his duties. Prior to that date he had been paid through the Civil Commissioner's Office. The Commissioner, when he was asked for a pass, said he would not take the responsibility of allowing him to perform his duties. Witness also tried the commandant, but could not get a pass. The Civil Commissioner told him to keep himself quiet, and the Government would pay. At the end of March, 1901, he went to the office for the purpose of drawing his salary, and the clerk said that he had had a wire from the department not to pay. In April he wrote, along with Mr. Naude, another sheep inspector, about his salary, but he got no reply. In May he wrote himself to Mr. Davidson, and received no reply. He did not receive a letter in June, 1901, purporting to suspend him from his official duties. In October, 1901, he received from the Chief Inspector (Davidson) a circular, with regard to the cleansing of infected stock. About this time he was desirous of standing for the Municipal Council of Aberdeen. He went and saw the Civil Commissioner (Mr. McGuinness), who told him he could not stand, as he was in the Government service. Mr. McGuinness approached witness with a view to his taking employment as a rinderpest demonstrator, and he afterwards showed witness a telegram from the Government, stating that they did not sanction his appointment. From time to time he saw the Civil Commissioner with regard to his salary, and the latter said it would come all right. Witness was never told he would not be paid his salary. In the middle of 1902, witness received through Mr. McGuinness a wire from the department, authorising him to resume duties. After he resumed, he went to see Mr. McGuinness to draw his salary. He asked Mr. Drew, a clerk, what about his back salary, and Mr. Drew said it would be all right; Government would pay him. Witness knew that Naude was suspended in June, 1901. Naude showed him the letter he had received, suspending him. Witness never received such a letter.

In cross-examination by Mr. Schreiner, the witness denied that in June he received a letter from the Government notifying him that they intended to temporarily cease payment of his salary and allowance. Naude showed him a letter which he received in these terms. Witness was unable to carry out his duties, but he thought he was going to get paid his salary. He was told so. Witness was not aware that the military regarded him as being somewhat disloyal, and that on that account they would not allow him to go about the district.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: Naude had received his salary for the period for which the Government had refused to pay witness.

Wm. H. McGuinness, R.M. and C.C. of Aberdeen, gave evidence as to certain interviews with plaintiff, and as to correspondence which had passed relative to plaintiff's duties. In October, 1901, witness advised Van der Merwe not to stand for the Municipal Council. Both Naude and Van der Merwe used frequently to come and speak about their salaries, and witness told them that it was a matter for the Agricultural Department. Van der Merwe was not suspended through witness. Witness had no notice of his being suspended.

Naude, formerly a scab inspector, at Aberdeen, deposed that in March, 1901, he went with plaintiff to the Civil Commissioner for the purpose of getting their salaries. A clerk informed them that a wire had been received containing the instruction that no money was to be paid to them until further notice. Witness was shown the telegram. The Civil Commissioner told them to be satisfied, as the Government would pay them.

The Commissioner at that time was Mr. Green. He expressed surprise that Government had not paid them, at any rate, half their salaries to enable them to live in those hard times. Witness received notice that he was suspended, and subsequently he was instructed to resume duty. He showed the suspension notice to Van der Merwe.

Mr. Upington closed his case.

Mr. Schreiner called

Charles Alfred Currey, Under Secretary for Agriculture, who produced a copy of a letter written to sheep inspectors on the 4th June, 1901. Attached to the copy was a list of inspectors to whom copies were sent, and this included the plaintiff. Witness signed the letter himself. No letter ever came back through the Dead Letter Office. In February, 1902, a list of sheep inspectors was published, and those who had been suspended were denoted by an asterisk. An asterisk appeared in the cases of Van der Merwe and Naude, among others. Witness could not now, of course, produce a messenger who could swear the letter was posted. The thing happened three years ago, and the correspondence sent from the office daily was very great.

Mr. Upington contended that the posting of the letter must be proved before it could be put in.

Mr. Schreiner said it was impossible to now produce better evidence as to the posting than could be offered by Mr. Currey. It would be ridiculous to suppose that they could call a messenger who could depose to the posting of this particular letter. There was strong presumption, he urged, that, in accordance with the practice of the officials, the letter was posted.

Mr. Currey said the list of scab inspectors to whom copies of the letter were directed was made up in the copy-book after the letters were prepared for despatch.

Maasdorp, J., intimated that he would admit the letter for what it was worth. The authorities showed that the letter was admissible, and he was the more disposed to admit it in view of the witness's statement that the letters were prepared before the list of addressees was copied into the book.

Mr. Upington asked that before the letter was put in, he should be allowed to cross-examine the witness in regard to this.

Maasdorp, J., assented.

In cross-examination, the witness said he could not swear that in this instance the letters were prepared before the list was made up. This, however, would be in accordance with the common office practice. He regarded the copy as proof that the letter was prepared ready for despatch.

In reply to Mr. Schreiner, the witness said the list would be prepared from the letters lying ready for despatch by an officer in the department. It would be part of the duty of the same officer, having made his list, to enclose these letters in envelopes and address them. Witness did not affix his own signature to the copy. His original signature on the letters were copied into a book by a clerk.

Maarsdorp, J., said he had understood that the witness's own signature appeared on the copy. In the altered circumstances, he thought the copy was not admissible unless the person who made the copy was produced.

Witness said he would endeavour to produce the clerk who made the copy.

In answer to further questions by Mr. Upington, the witness said it was not correct, as stated in the plea, that the Minister suspended the plaintiff on the 6th June.

[Maarsdorp, J.: Did you, as the agent of the Minister, suspend this man from his appointment?]

No, my lord.

[Maarsdorp, J.: Then what did you do?]

I wrote this letter saying that his pay was stopped because he could not do his duties.

In further cross examination, witness said he understood that certain inspectors had been previously suspended by the head of the sub-department. He thought Van der Merwe was suspended before the letter of June. He did not know that Naude had been paid £225 as salary between March, 1901, and February, 1902.

Peter du Toit stated that in June, 1901, he was in the Department of Agriculture. He prepared the letter produced on instructions which in ordinary course would be multiplied in copies, and he would fill in the names of the sheep inspectors.

Allan Reid, one of the Government's attorneys, stated that he gave notice to the plaintiff's attorneys to produce a letter, dated 6th June, 1901. Naude and Van der Merwe had been jointly written up as the recipients of the one letter.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Mr. Upington said that the main question which arose in the case had already come before the Supreme Court in Muller v. The Colonial Government (12 Sheil, 947), in which the Government had been held liable on a contract with the plaintiff for conveying mails, though none had been despatched. If there was any impossibility in the present case, it did not arise on the part of the plaintiff. The impossibility was caused by the fact that the plaintiff could not get a pass from the military authorities, and the Government had not in any way aided him in his efforts to procure a pass. The plaintiff had always held himself ready to perform his duties.

[Maarsdorp, J.: Why should the Government put him in a position to perform the work?]

Mr. Upington said that an employer was bound to provide facilities for his workmen. If the employer had the key of the premises where the workman was to do his work, he was bound to open the premises before he could claim the services. The Government had made no attempt to procure a pass for the plaintiff from the military authorities, though the plaintiff had made application to the Civil Commissioner to help him to get this pass. The plaintiff was stopped from performing his contract by something analogous to public authority. Voet (19—2—27) laid it down that where the services were not rendered owing to the intervention of public authority, the party contracting to render the services was entitled to recover the covenanted reward under the contract.

Under such circumstances, the plaintiff was in a much stronger position than that of a servant who had fallen ill, and to whom the master was still bound to pay his wages. Even where the illness was caused by the misconduct of the servant, the master was still bound to pay his wages (Lookson v. Stones, 7 Weekly Reports, p. 134, and K— v. Raschen and Another (38 L.T.R., p. 38). Taking the analogy of incapacity caused by illness, the plaintiff in the present case was certainly entitled to recover salary where the incapacity was caused by no fault inherent in himself. The same principle was laid down in Fraser on Master and Servant, pp. 317-320. The plaintiff had therefore made out his case, assuming that he had not done any of the work whatsoever. But the letter to the Minister of Agriculture in June, 1901, suspending the services of the plaintiff constituted a waiver. If the contract had already determined, why was it necessary to suspend the plaintiff? The plaintiff had never been legally suspended under the Act. The Act never contemplated suspension mero motu by the Minister, but evidently had regard to a temporary suspension pending investigation. The Government had its remedy by giving the plaintiff one month's notice under the contract, but it did not do so because it wanted to avail itself of his services at the earliest possible moment. It wanted to have the benefit of the contract, so far as that was obtainable, without paying for it. The Government had never called upon the plaintiff to perform his duties, and when he was willing and anxious to carry out the work, it would give him no help whatever to enable him to do so.

Mr. Schreiner, in replying, said that this was an action brought by a servant on a monthly contract to recover salary from his employer. The plaintiff, in the first place, had to establish the fact that he had discharged the duties which he had undertaken. He ought never to have made this a cause of action. He had mistaken his remedy, which would have been the presentment of a claim for compensation if he had been prevented from fulfilling his contract by causes over which he had no control. In the present case, the plaintiff had frankly admitted that he had not performed the duties of the office. In the passage of Voet already referred to (19-2-27) it was further laid down that where the servant was absolutely incapable of rendering the contracted services, he had no right to the stipulated reward. It was evident that the plaintiff had not, and never could have, performed the duties required. The military authorities, who were in control at that time, rightly or wrongly suspected the plaintiff, and considered that he might have a baneful influence if he was allowed to go amongst the farmers, and consequently had refused to give him a pass. In case of illness, Voet (19-2-23) laid down the principal that where the illness was short and temporary, wages would be paid. But contrast that with the present case, where the services were not rendered during such a long period as that from February, 1901, till July, 1902. The case was analogous to that of a lease where the lessee was prevented from the enjoyment of the property by the incursions of the enemy or brigands. A modification was introduced by the General Law Amendment Act (8 of 1879), but in reference to contracts of hiring like the present remuneration was suspended during the incapacity of the servant. Nathan's Common Law, vol. 2, pp. 812 and 813. Thorne Stuttaford and Co. v. McNally, 8 Juta, 143). The case of Muller v. The Colonial Government did not apply at all. Muller was always ready and willing to perform his contract, and it was the fault of the Government that he could not carry out the contract. It was altogether in the hands of the Government as to whether he was supplied with the material necessary to performance, and that material had not been supplied. But in this case the Government had not failed; it was a third party, the military authorities, who rendered the plaintiff incapable of discharging the duties. That might have been a hardship on him, and many people had to suffer hardships at such a time, but it did not entitle him to claim salary for services that never could have been performed. The plaintiff denied that he had received the notice of suspension, but even if the letter had not been delivered the surrounding circumstances showed that he must have known of it. He remained silent, and apparently acquiesced in the suspension, and so had prejudiced the Government. If he had given notice that he was going to claim salary for the period during which he had rendered no services, the Government would at once have done what it was entitled to do—namely, to dispense with his services by giving one month's notice. The Minister of Agriculture, under section 7 of Act 20 of 1894 had the absolute right of suspension or of dismissal. Either the plaintiff was suspended or not. If he was suspended, then cadit questio. If he was not suspended, then he came under the other branch of the argument that he had not discharged his duties. The onus lay on the plaintiff. He had not discharged his duties, and he had not proved that the inability was caused by the fault of the Government.

Mr. Upington, in reply, said that as to the remedy being by way of compensation, a claim for compensation had been lodged, and the Commission had refused to entertain it.

Maaasdorp, J.: Considering the importance of this case, I should have preferred to have dealt with the arguments which have been advanced and with the authorities cited in a written judgment, and to have made it quite clear. I have taken into consideration all the legal points that have been raised this morning, and I think I would consult the convenience of both parties after all by delivering judgment at once, because any other delay may be a source of inconvenience to the parties. It appears that the plaintiff in this case was appointed as a scab inspector by a letter of appointment written by Mr. Currey, the Under Secretary for Agriculture, on the 24th February, 1900. That appointment was made under section 10 of Act 28 of 1899. Under that section the Minister has power to appoint, and from time to time suspend, dismiss, or remove any inspector appointed over any areas. Mr. Currey, acting as the Under Secretary for the Minister, and which full authority from him, wrote this letter of appointment, and amongst the stipulations contained in it we find one to the following effect: "It is clearly understood that this appointment is terminable upon one month's notice." Now, in my opinion, the Minister who had the power to make the appointment, had the power to introduce that stipulation, and the service having been undertaken under the condition therein contained, the plaintiff in this case has now the right to avail himself of it, and the plaintiff would therefore be entitled at any time to receive a month's notice, unless, of course, he was suspended for misconduct. On his appointment, the plaintiff entered upon the duties of his service, and continued to render these services until January, 1901. At that time he was prevented from further continuing his work by the operation of martial law, which came into force about that time. Notwithstanding that, his salary was paid for one month longer, and after that he received no salary until he resumed his duties in July, 1902. Now it seems to be pretty clear that the plaintiff was prevented from doing his work by certain persons over whom neither party had any control. It was not within the power of the defendant to induce the military authorities to remove the obstacles which they placed in the plaintiff's way, nor was it in the power of the plaintiff himself to do so under the administration of the martial law. It seems that it was necessary for any person to move about the district to obtain a pass from the military commandant of that district, and the plaintiff being a resident in the village of Aberdeen, and his sphere of work lying outside, it would have been necessary for him, in order to perform his work, to go into the country. But he could not do so without obtaining a pass from the military, and the military have refused to furnish him with such a pass, it became impossible for him to perform his services. Now, this is one of those cases in which neither the employer nor the servant had any control, and it will be necessary to consider from the nature of the service what the effect of such an obstacle would be. It would seem upon the reference to the Scab Act that the employment of an inspector does not require any daily work. The performance is not to be daily, nor is there any provision for any constant employment. Upon reference to section 22 of Act 20 of 1894, we find a provision which necessitates the inspector to do certain work for four months. It is to the following effect: "Every inspector shall once at least in every four months inspect all the sheep within his district." That is the only provision which requires, fixes, and regulates work to be performed by the inspector. It is quite possible that that work might be disposed of within a portion of that time. Then we find that the rest of the work, as I understand it to be performed, would be of an intermittent character. His duties are to see that the flocks of the farmers are kept clean, and whenever he receives notice that there are any infected flocks, he must take necessary steps to have them cleaned. The work is of such a character that he may be called upon at any time to perform it, and he must do it at once. The result of this is that for a month, or even two, at a time the plaintiff is not called upon to do any active work, though still in the employment of his duties, and, consequently, though he is ready and willing to proceed with the work, there may be no necessity for him to be employed for a month or more, and then he must resume his work. The nature of the plaintiff's work will affect the legal position of this case. The plaintiff, in January, 1901, was not in a position to proceed with his work because of the operation of martial law, and he did no work, as he admits, until July, 1902, but what was his position during all that time? The contract was still in force; he could have been called upon at any time to perform these duties if the obstacles were removed which prevented him from doing so, and the obstacles may have been removed at any time. Martial law is supposed to be only in force when military exigencies require it. At any time martial law might have been dispensed with, and the plaintiff would have been in a position to proceed with his work, and under the circumstances he held himself ready to come forward and do his work. As he said, during that period he could not undertake any other work, and consequently he was debarred from other work. Well, it seems to me, he was prevented from doing his work, which he might have resumed at any time, and further, it seems to me that from time to time he had interviews with the two Civil Commissioners, and made inquiries as to the position in which he stood, and he was assured that as long as he kept quiet he might rest assured that his salary would be paid. Now, I don't take it that the Magistrate had any authority to bind the Government if the Government had taken steps to suspend or otherwise deal with the plaintiff, but I take these assurances from the Magistrate as merely indicating that the plaintiff himself at that time was ready and willing to perform his services, and these services were available. Another circumstance also occurred, which is of some slight importance, and might be of later importance. It seems during this period he received a circular, and that circular contains instructions from the Chief Inspector of sheep as to the manner in which certain duties were to be performed. Now, it has been said, as he was suspended, this circular was sent by mistake, because the work could not be performed by him, but at any time he may have resumed the work, and upon the resumption of such work he would have had his instructions from Mr. Davidson upon how to perform such work. This is also an indication that he was considered at that time as holding himself at the services of the Government. In July, 1902, martial law was repealed, and we find that the plaintiff was immediately called upon to resume his work. There was no new appointment, and that is an indication that there was no dismissal or suspension because then it might have been necessary to take other steps to reinstate the plaintiff when he did resume his work. Now, consequently, we have here certain circumstances which exist in two of the cases cited by Mr. Upington; that is to say, there was no termination of the contract, and the servant was content and willing to perform his work at any time that the work may have been required, and at the cessation of the obstacle which prevented him from working he resumed work at once. I may say I deal with the case up to this point without reference to the letter in which an intimation is said to have been given to the plaintiff that no salary would be given to him. I treat that letter, so far, as not being in existence. Referring to the authorities cited by Mr. Upington, we find, in the case of Muller v. The Colonial Government, the following circumstances existed, which influenced the Court in finding in favour of the servant. It appears that a contract was kept open, and, that being so, the servant had to hold his services at the disposal of the employer. There was no suspension of termination of the contract, and there is also this further circumstance, that the work might have been accumulating during the period when the services ceased, and that that accumulation of work might have been disposed of later on. In that case, the Court held under these circumstances that the servant must be considered as being in continued service, and, that, consequently, his wages must be paid. In the English case in Fraser, I find on page 132 that the circumstances were somewhat similar, but I may say here that I do not rely wholly upon the English authorities, because they are to some extent different in principle from our law, but I merely take these cases as illustrating the general equitable principles on which a case of this kind may be decided. Fraser says, on page 142: "In England the servant's right to wages during sickness depends upon whether the contract remains in force, or is rescinded by the employer in consequence of the servant's incapacity to fulfil his part of it." In this important principle the question arises whether the contract is rescinded, or whether it remains in force, or whether the man is in a position to insist upon the services to be rendered, or whether he has released the servant to seek other employment. In the judgment of Lord Campbell, we find the following remarks: "(1) Instead of being dismissed he returned to the service of the defendant when his health was restored, and the defendant employed him and paid him as before." There, again, we have got a similar circumstance, to what exists in the present case, and I think the equitable principle there laid down amounted to this: that where a master is prepared to hold the servant bound to his contract, and according to the contract, the servant may be called upon to come forward and do his work, and when the contract prevents him from being free to earn wages in some other capacity, then the master cannot claim any abdications of the wages for the time the services are not actually performed. If the case ended here, I would certainly come to the conclusion, under all the circumstances, the plaintiff is entitled to be paid for the time he was willing to work. It is argued that there was, after all, a suspension of his services, and that consequently the case ought to stand in a different position, because then the master must have been taken to have indicated that the contract was at an end, and that the servant should have consulted his own interests by seeking other employment. In the plea, it is alleged that the Minister for Agriculture lawfully suspended the plaintiff from his employment, and the plaintiff acquiesced in the suspension. Now, it seems to me when that plea was drawn the correct circumstances of the case were not quite before the pleader, because if they stood as they do now upon the evidence, then it would be quite clear that there never was any suspension of the plaintiff from his service. Mr. Currey, who was the Under-Secretary for Agriculture, and he acted mainly in disposition of this business, stated positively that he never suspended the plaintiff, and that the only thing that might bear the construction would be the letter of June 4. Mr. Currey does not say it bears that construction, and that the only steps taken are steps in accordance with the letter of June 4. If we refer to that letter, and it is of some importance, we find this: "I am directed to inform you that inasmuch as you are unable to obtain a pass to travel about your area, and for this and other reasons you are unable to properly perform your duties as sheep inspector, the Secretary for Agriculture has given instructions to temporarily cease payment of your salary and allowance. When you are again authorised to resume duty, your salary and allowance will be paid as heretofore." (Signed, Charles Currey. I wish to say this, that two questions arise in respect of this letter. The first is whether it was ever received by the plaintiff, and the next is even if received by him, what would be the effect of it. Upon the question of fact, when the evidence was given, certain evidence was adduced to prove the circumstances under which this letter was written, and I have come to the conclusion that I would be entitled to infer from the evidence that this letter was written and posted, and I don't see any reason to vary my opinion now. I think there is sufficient evidence to prove it was written and posted, but in this case the question remains whether it came to the knowledge of the plaintiff. There are cases in which a letter having been posted, it is presumed it was received,

Mr. Upington read a replying affidavit by the plaintiff, Moses Aronstein, who said that he was afraid that the defendant had an intention of absconding. He would, however, be prepared to meet the defendant half way.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

Hopley, J., said he was not satisfied that the defendant could not make a better offer, or a better arrangement. He ordered a writ of civil imprisonment to issue. It would then remain for the defendant to make a better offer if he thought fit, or to offer some security.

Mr. Upington said he believed that there was a sum of £40, which had been attached in the name of Maisel Bros.

Hopley, J., said he should make no order upon that point.

Mr. Upington applied for costs of the application.

Hopley, J., said that costs would be allowed as prayed.

SINGE V. DORFMAN AND PIEMER.

Mr. Struben moved for provisional sentence on certain conditions of sale for £77, balance of purchase price of certain plots of ground, with interest.

Order granted.

INSOLVENT ESTATE COETSEE V. COETSEE AND VAN DER WALT.

Mr. Alexander moved for a provisional order of sequestration to be made final, declaring the private estates of Susanna Coetsee, Stephanus Nicolas Coetsee, and the late Johanna E. van der Walt insolvent. The action was brought by the trustee of the partnership estate. The insolvent partnership's accounts showed a deficiency of about £550.

Mr. Van Zyl (for the executor testamentary in the estate of the late Johanna Elizabeth van der Walt) read an affidavit sworn by the executor, Frank Rossouw, who stated that the sequestration of the private estate would not benefit the partnership creditors, inasmuch as there was already a deficit of £72 odd, and the sequestration would involve further expense on the estate. Counsel also read an affidavit by Susanna Coetsee, who said that her private estate disclosed a deficit of about £80 odd, and that sequestration would cause further expenses to be contracted.

Hopley J., said that the affidavits seemed to show that the defendants were hopelessly insolvent.

Mr. Van Zyl said that the only point they could take was that the private creditors would be prejudiced by further expenses being incurred.

Hopley, J., said that he did not see any reason why the private estates should not be declared insolvent.

Final order granted as prayed.

BAM AND OLIFF V. BLOOM.

Mr. De Waal moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Defendant said that he raised no objection.

Order granted.

MAXWELL AND EARP V. KLEGER.

Mr. Lewis moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

STURK AND CO. AND OTHERS V. CARALIS.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

LOMBARD V. ESTATE CLARK AND STEYTLEH, N.O.

Mr. Alexander moved for provisional sentence for £150, rent due by virtue of a notarial lease, with interest, and costs of suit.

Order granted.

FURMAN V. ZERF AND ZERF.

Mr. Alexander moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court for a net sum of £31 13s. and costs, £19 10s. having been raised on levy.

Defendants offered £1 a month each. Both said they were out of work, one having been unemployed for three months and the other for seven months.

Cross-examined: Adam admitted that about £160 was due to them on a school contract at Somerset Strand, but said that there was a counter-claim of £120.

Decree granted, with costs, to be suspended upon each defendant paying £1 a month, with leave to the plaintiff to apply again for an increased order.

CAPE DISTRICT BUILDING SOCIETY V. JACOBSON.

Mr. Russell moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £700 odd, with interest, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

COLONIAL MUTUAL LIFE ASSURANCE CO. V. BROOMBERG.

Mr. Struben moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £4,000.

and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, the bond having become due by reason of non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

PORTER V. KADER.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for a provisional order of sequestration to be made final.

Order granted.

WILSON, SON AND CO. V. NYMAN AND WIFE.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence on two acknowledgments of debt for £104 6s. 1d., less £25 paid on account, and also for £175 6s. 1d., with interest and costs.

Order granted.

ROBERTSON AND CO. V. HEATHORN.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for a provisional order of sequestration to be made final.

Order granted.

HALES, CAUD AND CO. V. BOESEN.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

The Registrar said that there had been no set down.

Ordered to stand over, pending set down.

Later in the day a final order was granted.

BROWN V. COHEN.

Mr. Rainsford moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £2,000, with interest, less £500 paid on account, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable, bond having become due by reason of non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

KOPPEL, LTD. V. KIRBY. { 1904.
 { Aug. 31st.

Mr. Struben moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £52 11s., with interest and costs, being balance of account.

Order granted.

DE VILLIERS V. CUSHING SYNDICATE.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for the syndicate) said that this was a motion for leave to purge default of plea, and enter appearance.

Mr. Burton (for the plaintiff) opposed the motion. He said that the plaintiff now applied for judgment for £10,000, purchase money of the farm Langverwacht, in the division of Stellenbosch, purchased by the defendants from the plaintiff, plaintiff tendering and offering to pass transfer, and also for interest on £2,250, from the 3rd February last.

Sir H. Juta formally moved for leave to enter appearance. He read an affidavit by George Trill, chairman of the syndicate, who said that there had been negotiations with a view of effecting a compromise, and that the plaintiff's attorney definitely promised not to enter appearance until the 19th August, to give an opportunity of a compromise being arrived at. On the 19th August a letter was sent to the plaintiff's attorney by the syndicate, in which they said that the plaintiff's terms were wholly unreasonable. Plaintiff still retained his property untouched, and uninjured, and it was as valuable to him now as it was before. The syndicate had decided that, inasmuch as it was impossible for them to carry out the contract on the terms arranged, because of the difficulty in regard to providing sureties, the same must be abandoned. They offered £500 damages for cancellation of the contract, and £15 incidental expenses. The solicitors of the company, deponent added, were instructed to enter appearance, and he was surprised to hear from them that the matter had been set down in default of appearance, on Thursday, the 25th August. Counsel also read an affidavit by Mr. Lawton, the syndicate's solicitor.

Mr. Burton read lengthy affidavits by Mr. Standen, the plaintiff's attorney, who said he believed the sole object of the motion was to delay the applicant in obtaining judgment. It transpired from the correspondence that the plaintiff had been willing to cancel the sale on condition that the syndicate paid him £1,000 by noon on the following Friday, and a further sum of £500 in three months' time. Deponent added that the farm would not realise at auction anything like the sum offered by the syndicate; it was purely an agricultural farm, and did not contain minerals. It was, however, specially valuable to the defendant syndicate, because of its water supply and other reasons.

His Lordship: What were they going to mine there?

Mr. Burton: Tin, I believe.

Sir H. Juta read a replying affidavit by Mr. George Trill, who repeated that the sale to the syndicate was upon terms that the syndicate were unable to carry out.

Mr. Burton The defendants are not entitled to cancel their contract simply because they are no longer able to fulfil a condition of their own making Stewart v. Ryle (5 Juta, 146) Smidt and Warner v. Harris (5 H.C., 193) in which case Lawrence, J., discussed the difference between English and Roman-Dutch law as to the rights of a vendor. These cases show that the inability of the purchaser to fulfil his contract does not disentitle the vendor to sue for the purchase price, provided the vendor makes tender. In April, 1904, the syndicate entered into a new arrangement with the vendor.

[Hopley, J.: In asking me for provisional sentence you ask me to decide a very important point of law. It hardly seems to me to be a case for provisional sentence.]

They had ample notice, and knew that the negotiations could not be carried out after the 19th, and yet they did nothing till the 23rd.

The Court refused provisional sentence and ordered pleadings to be filed. Costs to be costs in the cause.

INSOLVENT ESTATE OF LUCKE V. BELL.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved, under Rule 329d, for an order on the defendant to take transfer of certain property purchased from Lucke, who had been rehabilitated.

Granted.

WIENER AND CO. V. JACOBS.

Mr. M. Bisset moved, under Rule 329d, for judgment for £69 4s. 6d., for goods sold and delivered, less £15 paid on account.

Granted.

ZEEDEBERG AND DUNCAN V. GODLIEB.

Mr. Struben applied for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £72 5s. 2d.

Granted.

TRUTER V. DE VILLIERS.

Mr. Gutsche, moved for an order declaring the respondent to be of unsound mind.

Mr. Rainsford appeared for the curator ad litem. He did not oppose the application.

Affidavits were read made by Dr. Dodds, and others, showing that the woman was insane, and that she was confined in Valkenberg Asylum.

Order granted, Mr. A. R. Truter being appointed curator of property and person.

REHABILITATION.

{ 1901.
{ Aug. 31st.

Mr. Gutsche moved for an order for the rehabilitation of David Roelof Naude, who surrendered his estate in 1895, with a deficiency of £485.

Granted.

Mr. Alexander moved for the rehabilitation of Carel Aaron van der Merwe, who became insolvent in February, 1902. The account was confirmed in March, 1904. The consent of four-fifths of the creditors had been obtained, in accordance with the provisions of section 117 of the Ordinance.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte WALSH.

Mr. Rainsford moved to make absolute a rule under the Derelict Lands Act.

Granted.

Ex parte RUBIN.

Mr. Close moved to make absolute a rule for the appointment of a liquidator in the partnership firm of Claas and Rubin.

Mr. McGregor appeared on behalf of Claas.

A number of affidavits were read on either side, from which it appeared that there was only a minor difference of opinion between the parties as to the method in which the firm should be liquidated. The parties carried on business at Calvinia as general dealers.

Mr. McGregor urged that the applicant was not justified in the circumstances in rushing into court, and that therefore he should be made to pay the costs.

Hopley, J., said he thought the costs should come out of the estate.

The rule was made absolute, costs to come out of the estate.

Ex parte JOUBERT.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved to make absolute a rule authorising the amendment of a certain transfer.

Granted.

Ex parte SAVAGE AND SONS.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved to make absolute a rule authorising the registration of a certain bond.

Granted.

VAN EEDEN V. VAN FEDEN.

Mr. M. Bisset appeared for the wife to move for an order on the defendant, Benjamin Jacobus Eeden, to pay the sum of £20 as maintenance money to her, pending the result of an action instituted by her for judicial separation, on the grounds of cruelty.

Mr. Upington appeared on behalf of the respondent.

It was stated on affidavit that the parties resided in the division of Van Rhyn's Dorp, the defendant being a farmer there. Defendant had sent to his wife £25. Petitioner originally asked for £30 to enable her to proceed with her action, and for £20 for maintenance. Inasmuch, however, as defendant had sent £25, petitioner did not proceed with the prayer in respect of the £30. It was stated on behalf of the respondent that the joint estate of the parties was small, and that the £25 he had contributed bore a reasonable proportion to the value of the assets in the estate. He was unable to contribute more, and stated that the petitioner's parents were still alive, and were well-to-do.

Hopley, J., said he did not think that under the circumstances £20 was an unreasonable amount to ask for. The wife could not be left penniless, for she was a full partner in the joint estate, of which the defendant had been in full possession for something like a year. He thought, too, the estate was of more value than the respondent made out. An order would be made for the payment of the £20, the matter of costs to stand over until the trial.

ELLIOTT BROS. V. BARTLETT AND OTHERS.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved to make absolute a rule nisi granted by the Chief Justice, calling upon respondents to show cause why there should not be an attachment and sale of the usufructory rights of the first respondent, Sarah Ann Bartlett, in certain farms, and of the interest in the farms of the second respondent, Percival Douglas Bartlett. Applicants had obtained judgment for £900, and took these proceedings to satisfy the judgment.

Mr. Russell appeared for the respondents, and asked that time should be allowed for the payment of the debt in order that the mother might be allowed to raise money by mortgaging the property.

The rule was made absolute, with costs, as against Percival Douglas Bartlett. In regard to the mother, the matter was ordered to stand over until the 15th October.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

INSOLVENT ESTATE ESHACK { 1904.
V. ALLIE. { Aug. 31st.
{ Sept. 1st.

Undue preference—Ord. 6, 1843—
Sec. 84 and 88.

This was an action brought by the trustee in the insolvent estate of Moosa Eshack to declare a certain seizure of goods by the defendant, null and void, and to recover their value, £240 and £91 in money, and promissory notes to the value of £120.

The declaration set out that the estate was sequestrated on the 29th April, 1904, Eshack was indebted to the defendant in the sum of £63, and at a time when his liabilities by far exceeded his assets, he transferred goods by a collusive arrangement to the defendant of far greater value than £63. The defendant took money, in amount £91, and promissory notes to the value of £120, and plaintiff claimed accordingly.

The plea admitted that in April, 1904, the insolvent was indebted to the defendant in the sum of £63. It was agreed that Eshack should return the goods in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan (with him Mr. D. Buchanan) was for the plaintiff; and Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Roux) was for the defendant.

Cornelius Muller, clerk, in the insolvency Department, produced the minutes of the meeting in the insolvent estate of Eshack.

Edmund Thomas, trustee, of the insolvent estate, stated that the claims of the creditors at the second and third meetings amounted to £265 18s. 5d. In the schedules filed by the insolvent, the liabilities amounted to £695 0s. 4d., and the assets set down were £466 15s., but witness was unable to collect the debts, which were the sole assets. The estate was insolvent on the 31st March.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He could not give any details with regard to the 31st March, but from the information he got from the insolvent, he concluded that he was insolvent on that date. The insolvent partly ascribed his insolvency to the theft of these goods. He was unaware that the insolvent was carrying on business under another name.

Frederick Wiener, managing director of Wiener and Co., Ltd., stated his firm were the petitioning creditors in the estate. Their claim still stood at £226. The insolvent was to give witness the promissory notes that were alleged to be taken by the defendant. From the beginning of March the firm stopped supplying the insolvent with goods.

Harold MacQueen, traveller, in the employ of Messrs. Wiener and Co., stated that he was in the insolvent's shop on March 25, and he saw general merchandise, including a large brass scale, the goods being to the value of between £80 and £100. On the following Tuesday he saw goods in the kitchen and the passage to the value of £60 or £80. On April 4 he found the shelves dismantled, and a considerable portion of the stock taken away. The goods were cleared out of the passage.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He wasn't paying particular attention to the value of the goods when he visited the place.

Mahomed Dala, an importer, stated he was in the insolvent's shop towards the end of March, and he saw goods to the value of about £60, and in the passage and kitchen goods to the value of about £200. The defendant told witness that he removed the goods, because the insolvent owed him £63, and witness said the goods were worth more than £63.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Eshack did not open a shop in Stuckeristreet after his insolvency; it was opened by his assistant. Everything in the shop amounted to the value of £250.

Mahomed Ahmed stated that he was in the employ of Moosa Eshack, and kept the books of the shop, along with the latter. The goods in the passage and kitchen amounted to £200 or £250. He saw the defendants' partner burst the box open, and take the contents.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He told the detective that he did not know what the defendant's partner took from the box. He knew that if the goods and the money had not been taken away, Eshack would have been able to pay his debts.

Samuel Stead, a carpenter, stated that he saw a quantity of goods in the passage of Eshack's shop at the beginning of April. The goods were put in a wagon between eight and nine o'clock in the evening.

Moosa Eshack stated that in March his liabilities exceeded his assets. He had money to the amount of £91 in his box. He was at Wellington when the goods and the books were removed.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: If the goods had not been removed he would have been able to settle with his creditors. When he went to Wellington he did not think he would be insolvent.

Mr. Buchanan closed his case.

For the defence,

Abdul Gafoor, partner with the defendant, stated that Eshack owed the firm £63 at the end of March. About the beginning of April he asked for payment, but could not get it. Eshack was present when he took away the goods from the passage. He did not take more than £63 worth of goods.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Eshack did not offer to sell him the shop. He merely went to the shop to get his money.

John Lancaster, law agent, stated that the buyer of the shop believed at the time that Eshack would pay his liability.

Pandora Sahemi stated he bought the shop from Moosa Eshack. The arrangement was that he should buy everything in the place. The stock was valued at £113. Witness took £63 off the price. Gafoor took nothing except goods from the passage. Witness had a lease of three years from the landlord, but Eshack was not present when the lease was signed.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Witness was half-way through the taking of stock when Gafoor came in. The whole of the stock amounted to £113.

Sathe, a general dealer, stated that he took stock of Eshack's shop along with the last witness. The stock came to over £100. Gafoor demanded his money, and Eshack asked him to wait until the stock was taken.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He valued all the goods in the passage and the shop.

Another general dealer stated that Eshack told Mr. Lancaster he had sufficient money to pay the merchants. Eshack was present when a cartload of goods was taken away.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He weighed the goods again when he took stock.

Charles Benjamin, wagon driver, stated that Gafoor hired his wagon about two months ago to take away goods from Eshack's shop.

Haffies Ishmail stated that he let a room to Gafoor in January to store goods. The last witness brought goods to his place between five and six o'clock in the evening. There was plenty of room for more goods if Gafoor had wished to store them.

Detective Wight stated that Eshack complained on the 4th April to the C.I.D. about the theft of certain goods. Subsequently he found the goods stored at Ishmail's shop. Mahomaji made a statement to witness that he did not see Gafoor take the money back.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He did not proceed criminally in the matter.

John Robertson, clerk, in the employ of Rowland Hill and Co., stated that the insolvent was a customer of the firm. He bought goods in March last for his shop at Wellington.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

His Lordship, in giving judgment, declared the alienation of the goods to the value of £63, to be an undue preference. The defendant ordered to return the said goods, or to repay the value to the trustee, and also declared to have forfeited the claim for a similar amount against the insolvent, and to return other goods to the value of £77, or repay the same, with abatement from the instance on the other claims.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

TRIAL CAUSES.

INSOLVENT ESTATE GOLD—
BERG V. BERT. { 1904.
 { Sept. 1st.
 { " 2nd.

Insolvency—Undue preference—
Ordinary course of business—
Ord. 6, 1843—Sec. 86 and 88.

This was an action brought by John Andrew, trustee in the insolvent estate of Goldberg Bros., of Diep River, against Sarah Bert, wife of Julius Bert, to have a certain mortgage bond set aside and declared null and void, as an undue preference.

The declaration set out that the estate of Goldberg Bros. was placed under compulsory sequestration by an order of this Court on the 29th April, 1904, and the plaintiff was duly elected sole trustee thereof on the 16th May, 1904. At the first meeting of the creditors defendant proved as a preferent creditor against the estate for £400, and interest alleged to be due in preference on a certain mortgage bond passed by insolvents in favour of the defendant, on the 23rd February, 1904, and specially hypothecating certain landed property belonging to the insolvents. Plaintiff said that the bond was passed at a time when the insolvents contemplated the surrender of their estate, and that they intended thereby to prefer the defendant before their other creditors. The said preference was received by the defendant by a collusive arrangement, mutual understanding, or common consent, and plaintiff claimed that the bond should be set aside as an undue preference, under the 84th section of the Insolvent Ordinance, and defendant should be declared to have forfeited the amount of her claim against the estate, under the provisions of the 88th section.

The defendant, in her plea, admitted the formal allegations, but denied the allegations in paragraphs 4 and 5, as to undue preference, and said that the bond was made in her favour in the usual and ordinary course of business, bona fide, and for valuable consideration.

Mr. Burton (with him Dr. Greer) was for the plaintiff; Mr. Van Zyl was for the defendant.

Cornelis Johannes Muller, clerk in the Master's Office, produced a record of the proceedings in insolvency, from which it appeared that the provisional order was granted on the 14th March, and that the plaintiff was appointed curator of the estate on the 19th March. The estate was finally adjudicated on the 15th April. The election of the trustee was confirmed on the 11th May. The third meeting was held on the 10th June.

John Andrew (trustee in the insolvent estate) said that creditors had proved against the estate to the amount of £1,946. The assets actually realised amounted to £217. Then there were unrealised assets in the way of immovables, as represented by the two-storey building mortgaged to the defendant. The building was put up to public auction, and the highest offer received was £900 made by the defendant. The insolvents had also paid £22 on plots of land, for which witness credited them. The debts outstanding amounted to £235, and witness credited the insolvents with £25 as the value of these debts. He estimated the deficit at £782. Witness had also prepared a statement of affairs as at the 29th February last. In this statement he gave insolvents credit for £1,000, as the value of the building, and £400 for the stock-in-trade, and these, with other items, drawn out on a liberal basis, made the assets £1,609, against which were liabilities amounting to £2,024 11s. 11d. Witness proceeded to describe the condition of the books kept by the insolvents, and said that, taking the whole books as they stood, they were absolutely worthless. Witness put in certain promissory notes given by the insolvents in favour of the defendant, also certain cheques. He could not trace proper records of the transactions, but he found the following receipts entered from the defendant: April 20, £100; April 30, £100; May 11, £100. One bond was passed for the promissory notes. The defendant proved against the estate for a second bond of £400, the property having already been bonded for £500.

Cross-examined: He did not think the insolvents had kept a stock-book: he had not seen one, but, judging from the worthless condition of the books that had been kept, he should say no stock-book would be kept. Many of the entries in the books were in Yiddish, of which he had been supplied with a translation by the insolvents. The defendants undoubtedly were insolvent on the 29th February in fact, were insolvent six months before that date. He did not consider that the goodwill of the business was worth anything; there was no goodwill to an insolvent business. There were two horses in the estate, but neither of them was sound. One of the animals was shot, and the other was on the "road to destruction when the veterinary inspector was offered 30s. for it, and he accepted the money as his fee.

Ferdinand Karie, law agent, Cape Town, spoke to having convened a private meeting of the insolvents' creditors at his office on the 11th March last. The meeting, he said, was called at the insolvents' request. It was then resolved to sequester the estate. It had transpired that a bond had been passed by the insolvents a little while before the meeting, and the creditors at once decided not to entertain an offer by the insolvents of 5s. in the £, afterwards increased, he believed, to 10s.

Saul Albou, of the Cape and Kosher Meat Supply Company, gave evidence as to transactions they had had with the insolvents.

Cross-examined: He asked the insolvents to pass a bond in his favour in February, and said that he would stand security against any creditors. He subsequently found that the insolvents had passed a bond in favour of the defendant, and he then lost confidence in them.

Wm. Alderton, manager for Spicer, Langley and Co. (creditors against the insolvent estate), also gave evidence.

Phillip Mostyn Beaufort, Messenger of the Supreme Court, said he valued the stock-in-trade of the insolvents at £400. He could not say whether there was a stock-book in the books he collected from the insolvents.

Evidence was led to show that the books were handed to the trustee as received from insolvents.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

For the defence,

Julius Bert, the husband of defendant, said that Goldbergs approached him in March, 1903, a year before the sequestration, with a view to getting a bond over this property. He wrote to the Goldbergs a letter, dated April 8, 1904, stating that his wife would lend £300 on the property. The date of that letter was a mistake, which he could not account for. The date should have been April 3, 1903. Promissory notes were given for the amount, which was paid in instalments on the understanding that it was to be a first mortgage on the property when it was complete. As a result of another letter from the Goldbergs, a new loan of £500 was raised on first bond, Mrs. Bert agreeing to take a second bond for the £300. The matter was delayed by the Goldbergs from time to time. Witness offered to advance Goldberg another £200 if he brought him a valuation of the property at £1,300. He promised to bring it, and witness, on the 22nd December, gave him £5 on account. In January he brought witness a valuation of the property at £1,000. Witness refused him any more, but decided to advance him £65 to make up £400. Goldberg did not bring the bond, and witness consulted his attorney on the matter. His attorney sent demanding a bond, or payment of £300, on the promissory notes, with interest. Afterwards, on February 22, witness got the bond, and a cheque was given covering interest and attorney's charges. Witness signed a promissory note to Clark and Bohm for £50, as security. Afterwards, Clark and Bohm offered to take £40 for the note, and witness gave that amount. Afterwards, witness proved against the estate on the promissory note. Witness did not know anything of the financial position of the Goldbergs. He regarded the property as security for the sums he advanced. He never tried to get the Goldbergs to prefer him over the other creditors. The transaction was a bona fide one.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: It was arranged when the advances were made that a bond should be passed when the building was put up. Witness repeatedly asked for the bond, but did not press for it until he heard of the valuation of £1,000. Witness was surprised when he heard that the Goldbergs had become insolvent.

Sarah Bert (the defendant) gave evidence of a similar nature.

John Robert Lancaster, law agent, said Bert came to him about a certain £300, and he wrote a letter to the Goldbergs, as the result of which a second bond over the property was prepared, a cheque being handed to Goldbergs for £65, to bring the amount of the bond up to £400.

Nathan Goldberg, one of the insolvents, bore out Mr. Bert's statement. When the bond was finally passed, witness and his brother were doing well, but one of his creditors who had wanted a bond on this property began to press them, and they were forced to call a meeting of creditors. The bond was given according to arrangement, which should have been completed long before, and which he and his brother put off with a view to getting more, and these was no preference for Mrs. Bert.

Cross-examined: He said nothing about the bond arrangements before the Master, because he never got a chance to speak. He did not give the bond to Mrs. Bert before, because he wanted to get more money out of her. He did not know that it made any difference to Mrs. Bert's position whether he gave her the bond or not.

Cross-examined: He said he paid £55 for the land on which the property mortgaged was built. He estimated the value of the property at £1,326, because that was the amount he spent upon it. In his statement of assets, he put his horses down as worth £55.

By the Court: The creditors began to press the firm for money soon after they had given the bond in dispute.

Abe Goldberg, the other partner in Goldberg Bros., also gave evidence.

David Carlick, formerly in the employ of insolvents, said he took stock for the insolvents in January last, and made entries in a book which he packed up for the trustee. He did not see the book among those produced in court. He regarded the position of Goldberg Bros. at that time as passable.

The plaintiff, John Andrew (recalled), denied a statement made by one of the insolvents that he had never called upon them for vouchers. He had, he said, on several occasions called upon Nathan Goldberg for vouchers. They had had the utmost difficulty in obtaining information from Nathan Goldberg as to the estate. The vouchers had been deliberately retained by the insolvents, and were now produced by counsel for the other side for the purpose of assisting their case, vouchers that ought to have been in his (the trustee's) possession.

Hopley, J.: After stating the facts of the case, proceeded: There was correspondence amongst the parties, which, as far as he could see, in spite of one or two rather suspicious circumstances, was genuine enough. It was necessary to consider what it was these documents promised. It seemed to be a genuine transaction that the defendant advanced the money, and received promissory notes, it being all the while understood that she would receive a first bond on the property. This was varied by her agreeing to take a second bond for £300. At the same time, plaintiff said that she required the Goldbergs to pass the second bond at the time when the first was passed. That would have been a business arrangement, and in the ordinary course of business. He could not understand what object there was in delaying the passing of the bond to Mrs. Bert until the completion of the building. The building was completed in September, and still no bond was passed, nor did Bert go and insist that a bond should then be passed. In December, the Goldbergs went to the Berts for another £200, but on a valuation of the building at £1,000, Bert, according to his own statement, began to be alarmed, and thought it was high time that the bond should be passed. Afterwards, Bert and his wife considered they would be safe in advancing £65, a sum which made the total amount advanced £400. This £65 was advanced, and the bond passed. He considered that up to that time the plaintiff had no security, and that, as to the whole amount, with the exception of the £65, the bond must be held to be an undue preference. The first thing to be considered was whether the Goldbergs were in an insolvent state at the time—whether their assets were less than their liabilities. It appeared to him perfectly patent that the trustee's estimate of the insolvents' position at the time when his bond was passed was a very much juster one than the insolvents themselves made, and that the assets at that time were not so large as the liabilities justly calculated. If that were the case, the presumption in law would arise that the men contemplated insolvency at the time; but apart from that, there was sufficient evidence that the Goldbergs were contemplating insolvency in the sense which previous rulings of the Court had indicated. Once it was found that the Goldbergs contemplated insolvency, if they passed a mortgage bond, it must be taken as an undue preference, unless it could be protected as being in the usual and ordinary course of business. That was the point upon which the whole case turned: was this transaction in the usual and ordinary course of business? The whole circumstances of the case seemed to him to be unusual and extraordinary. It would be against commercial policy to hold that such a transaction should be protected by the 86th section as being in the usual and ordinary course of business. The public had to be protected, and if once it were held that a transaction of this kind was good, it would not be necessary for people to go and mortgage until they got right into the middle of their difficulties. In such an event a man could go to another with an underhand document and say: "Give me a thousand pounds. Here is my note of hand, or any other document you want—so long as it is not given publicly—pledging me to give you a mortgage on my property." The second party would advance the money, and hold the document, and as soon as the debtor began to be in difficulties, there would be nothing to prevent the second party, if this was the usual course of business, from going a week or so before the debtor became insolvent, and getting a bond registered. In the meantime, other people would be deluded into the belief that the debtor was a man with whom they could advantageously deal. They would have no knowledge of this liability, and would look upon him as a man possessing so much property, having no knowledge of this encumbrance. It seemed to him that one must hold that such a transaction was unusual and extraordinary, and could not be protected. In the present case, £335 was advanced prior to the bond being given, and this was wholly unsecured. On the day the mortgage bond was passed, a further sum of £65 was advanced. He thought the justice of the case would be met if the bond were set aside in so far as concerned the £335, leaving it good as regarded the £65, and the judgment of the Court would be to that effect. As regarded the costs, the case was a very hard one, and there was no doubt the defendant had acted bona fide in the matter. Collusion had been charged, and the defendant had appeared, and clearly disproved this, while she had also succeeded to some extent. Under the circumstances, the Court would make no order as to costs. Each party would therefore have to pay their own costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

KELLY AND CO. V. HERMANN. { 1904
Sept. 1st.

This was an action to recover the sum of £305 11s. 9d., balance of account due for goods sold and delivered.

The declaration set out that between 18th March, 1898, and January, 1900, the firm of B. Schocher and Co., in which the defendant was a partner, bought goods from the plaintiff to the value of £1,575 10s. 3d. £1,296 18s. 6d. had been paid on account, and there was still a balance of £305 11s. 9d., which the plaintiff was entitled to claim from the defendant.

The plea set out that the partnership was dissolved on the 12th August, 1899, the deed providing that Schocher should be responsible for all debts and liabilities of the said business, and that he was to indemnify the said defendant. The plaintiff was informed of the deed of dissolution.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan (with him Mr. P. S. T. Jones) for plaintiff. Mr. Schreiner. K.C. (with him Mr. Upington), for defendant.

The evidence of Mr. Michael Kelly, taken on commission, set out that the defendant formerly carried on business under the style of B. Schocher and Co., of Pietersburg. Schocher had left the country, and his whereabouts were unknown. Between March, 1898, and January, 1900, his firm supplied Schocher and Co., with goods to the extent of £1,575 10s. 3d. Between March, 1898, and May, 1899, the said firm had paid £1,269 13s. 6d., and there remained a balance of £305 11s. 9d. After the 12th August, 1899, £26 7s. 10d. was booked against the said firm on account of goods, but Hermann had refused payment of this. He was not aware of the dissolution of partnership at the time mentioned by the defendant. He never consented to release any of the partners of the firm.

Bernard Hermann's evidence, also taken on commission, set out that the partners had his consent to the dissolution. Schocher took over all the liabilities. The plaintiff was satisfied that Schocher should take over the liabilities. The defendant made no secret of his departure.

George Hughes and Ernest George Ireland testified to Schocher taking over the liability of the defendant.

Evidence was then called for the defendant.

Joseph Hermann, defendant, stated that since 1899 he had been carrying on business in Cape Town. Formerly, he was in business in Pietersburg, in partnership with Schocher. In 1899 there were four or five creditors on a dissolution of partnership. Witness and his partner saw the plaintiff, who seemed satisfied to release witness from any liability. The letter he received on October 1 by Mr. Kleinfenberg, was not accompanied by any account. Notice was given to all creditors, including Messrs. Kelly and Co., that the partnership was dissolved.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He was positive that Kelly let him out of his liability altogether. Schocher got about £250 more than witness. Schocher was to indemnify him to his creditors. In August Kelly did not say anything about the amount that was owing for six months.

Maasdorp, J., intimated that the evidence was highly unsatisfactory, and the case was ordered to stand over for further evidence sine die, with leave to either party to call further evidence before the Commissioner, or to produce evidence in Court.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

TRIAL CAUSE.

SKIPPOON V. DE WITT. { 1904.
Sept. 2nd.
" 5th.

Architect — Quantity surveyor —
Innocent misrepresentation — Peritia artis — Privy of contract.

W., a building owner, had employed the defendant, an architect and quantity surveyor, to take out certain quantities for a building he had commissioned plaintiff to erect. The defendant's estimate fell far short of the quantities which were actually required, but plaintiff had accepted defendant's estimate as correct, and in consequence made a tender for the erection of the building, which involved him in loss. This loss the plaintiff now sought to recover by way of damages from the defendant. Held, that as there was no privity of contract between plaintiff and defendant, the former could not recover.

Semble: (1) That an innocent misrepresentation made by a person who is under no legal obligation to make any representation affords no ground of action. Tait v. Wicht (7 Juta 156).

(2) Every professional man spondet peritiam artis and is liable to any person who employs him for loss arising from his innocent misrepresentations.

This was an action brought by Robert Skippon, a builder and contractor, to recover from Anthony de Witt, architect, £469 5s. 4d., being the amount of damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant's miscalculation in certain bills of quantities.

The declaration set out that about April, 1903, the defendant, on behalf of one F. Williams, prepared plans and specifications for the purpose of erection by the said Williams of certain premises on the Lansdowne-road, Claremont. The plaintiff tendered for the erection of the said premises to the defendant. The bills of quantities purported to represent and should have represented the correct quantities of work and material required for the erection of the premises in accordance with the plans. The usual charge was 2½ per cent., but the defendant had charged the plaintiff 5 per cent. The plaintiff, relying on the quantities, tendered for £2,697, but the bills contained so many errors that he had suffered damage to the extent of £469 5s. 4d., and he also claimed a refund of £8 13s. 2d., an amount which was overpaid.

The plea admitted the formal allegations, but set out that no satisfactory tender was received until 26th May, when the plaintiff tendered £2,697, which tender was a lump sum. The plaintiff did not supply priced bills of quantities as required by the conditions of the contract, and the defendant denied that the quantities were the basis of the plaintiff's tender. The defendant did not represent the said quantities to be absolutely accurate but merely approximate estimates. The work done and materials supplied by the plaintiff, did not in certain respects, according to measurements, exceed the quantities estimated in the defendant's bills of quantities, but in other respects fell short of such estimate of quantities, and after making a due and proper deduction of items, which so fell short, and other items, the balance in respect of the plaintiff's work and labour supplied was about £150 short of £2,697. The negligence and misrepresentation were denied.

Mr. Close (with him Mr. M. Bisset; was for the plaintiff; and Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington), was for the defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are you at one as to the degree the defendant has mistaken the quantities?]

Mr. Schreiner: No, our measurements are widely different.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would it be possible now to find out the correct estimates?]

In many cases quite possible.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the parties can agree upon this the whole case would be simplified.]

Mr. Close: We wrote to them suggesting the employment of Mr. Babbs, who, on several occasions, has been employed by the Court as a referee in building cases.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What do you say to Mr. Babbs?]

Mr. Schreiner said if his lordship would order his appointment his client would have no objection whatever.

De Villiers, C.J., said in case it became necessary, then they could refer to Mr. Babbs. For the present the Court would assume that there were errors.

Robt. Skippon, plaintiff, stated that he tendered for the contract in the usual way, and he got quantities, drawings, and specifications from the defendant before he tendered. The tender was based on the quantities supplied by the defendant. The lump sum included the item, "allow 5 per cent. for architect's fees." The usual allowance for quantities was 2½ per cent. £140 was paid for the bills of quantities. The defendant received 5 per cent. on £2,697, which included the 5 per cent., and £8 13s. 2d. was the amount overpaid. In June, 1903, he signed a contract with Mr. Williams, and then proceeded with the building. Some time after the building had been started, he discovered that the quantities were wrong, and on several occasions he told Mr. De Witt of the deficiencies. As he went along with the work he measured the details, and just about the time the building was completed, he had a list of the errors drawn up and sent to the defendant. He had received nothing for the items the defendant had miscalculated. The claim was a fair and reasonable calculation for the extra work he had to do through the defendant's errors. He had lost money on the contract.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: It was the wet weather which prevented him from starting the contract until July. He never actually ceded the contract to Small and Morgan. It was very probable he visited the defendant's office a few days before the tender, and told the defendant that business was bad, and that he was anxious to get some work. He had no recollection of asking the defendant as to what the tender would amount to, and that Mr. De Witt had said that Mr. Williams was not likely to pay anything more than £2,700. When he brought back the drawings to Mr. De Witt he had already made the calculations marked in pencil. He was unable to say what insurance premium he paid on the building, and if £50 was ridiculously high other items might be found to be ridiculously low. Long before the letter was written, the defendant's attention was drawn to the shortage, but he had never actually told the defendant that he held him responsible.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If your quantities had been correct you would have tendered higher?]

Witness: Yes, my lord.

Then you might not have got the tender?—That is so, my lord.

Mr. Schreiner: Now, just be careful. Did the defendant not tell you that Mr. Williams would not pay more than £2,700.—Never a word.

Re-examined by Mr. Close: Items such as insurance, £50. were just merely put down to arrive at the total sum. The contingencies were usually put down as he did, and not for making up for architect's errors. Assuming his account to be correct, he had never known a bill of quantities to contain so many glaring differences as that of the defendant.

Robert Charles Orr, architect and quantity surveyor, stated that at the plaintiff's request he measured up the whole building. The bill of quantities was handed to him for inspection in September last. In measuring up the work, he had found on the amounts required by the plans and specifications attended to, with the exception of some windows. Where the schedule of quantities did not contain what was required by the plans, he calculated the price on the same basis as that of the schedules. As a measure of damages, he thought £469 a reasonable sum to claim. The whole of the bad work in the roof was omitted from the quantities.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Two or three windows required by the plans were omitted. He was quite certain that the prices were on the quantities before the 28th September. The plaintiff did not consult witness before he tendered for the building.

David Boyd, manager to Messrs. Small and Morgan, stated he had checked their account with the plaintiff, and that the matter of £469 had not been received from Williams. The contract price included the 5 per cent., and it was an error of his firm to pay on the full amount of £2,697.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Small and Morgan had never claimed £469 from Williams.

Mr. Close closed his case.

Anthony de Witt (defendant) stated that on the quantities, he was quite clear he prepared them for Mr. Williams, and not for any builder. Originally on the bills of quantities 2½ per cent. was stipulated, but as he had to do the work a second time, 5 per cent. was put down. There had been a tender for £2,850, but Mr. Williams was dissatisfied with that. He was positive that he mentioned the sum of £2,700 to Skippon. The plaintiff never told him he would be held responsible for the shortage. Certain of the quantities were short and some lower, but as they stood, he would not call them erroneous.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: The builder had no recourse against the defendant, as he had to satisfy himself that the quantities were right. Skippon had no benefit from the first plans. The 5 per cent. was charged because there were two sets of quantities. It was usual to charge 2½ per cent. whether the job went through or not. It would lie with the builder whether he took the quantities as a guidance; the contract did not state that he should take witness's quantities. To what extent the quantities might guide the contractor, he did not know, neither did he care.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: There were two kinds of contracts, a quantity and an entire contract, and in the present case it was a lump sum contract. As far as he was concerned, he denied that he had any contract whatever with the plaintiff.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He would expect the quantities should be as nearly correct as possible. Bills of quantities were given with a view to the guidance of the tenderer, but he need not necessarily rely entirely on them.

Norris Cowan, quantity surveyor, stated that he had made measurements on the spot, and gone over the bills of quantities. The plaintiff's estimates were very far from being correct. He found the plaintiff well within the price of his tender.

Edmund Sherman, architect and quantity surveyor, stated that he had checked the last witness's work, and he corroborated his evidence.

Francis Wyatt Williams stated that he did not wish to exceed £2,700 in the contract. There was £170 odd, as per contract, due to the contractor. It was simply a portion of the retention money.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: The plans were drawn by the defendant, according to the money witness could provide.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case, and counsel were heard in argument on the facts.

Cour. Adr. Volt.

Posten (September 5th).

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an action for damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant's negligence and misrepresentation. The negligence consisted in failing to include in certain bills of quantities prepared by the defendant, as quantity surveyor, many particulars of work which ought to have been so included, and the misrepresentation consisted in representing to the plaintiff, as the intending contractor for the building of a house for a Mr. Williams, that the bills of quantities correctly described the quantity of work actually required to be done. The evidence shows that the defendant had been employed by Williams as architect, and that in order to prepare the bills of quantities required by intending builders, the defendant also performed the duties of a quantity surveyor. After he had taken out the quantities, prepared the plans and specifications, and drafted the contract which was to be entered into with the builder, the defendant communicated with the plaintiff, with the view of obtaining from him a tender for the erection of the building. The bills of quantities and other documents just mentioned were handed to the plaintiff, who tendered to do the work for £2,697. The amount of that tender was based upon the data appearing on the bills of quantities. Among the items appearing on these bills of quantities was the following: Allow 5 per cent. for quantity surveyors' fees, such amount to be paid to the architect." In filling up the amounts opposite to the different items the plaintiff allowed the sum of £111 in respect of this particular item, and in making up the amount of his tender, he certainly allowed for and included the fees which he would have to pay to the quantity surveyor on behalf of Williams, the building owner. That the money was to be paid on behalf of the building owner, and not on his own (the plaintiff's) behalf, would appear from the 78th clause of the contract, the concluding part of which reads as follows: "Before signing the contract, the contractor is to satisfy himself that there has been a sufficient amount taken in the bill of quantities for everything necessary to carry out the contract in accordance with the specifications, the drawings, the dimensions, and the architect's requirements, as no allowance will be made for any omission and shortcoming. Allow an amount of 2½ per cent. upon the total estimate for the quantity surveyor's fees. Such amount is to be paid by the contractor to the architect upon the amount of the several certificates, but a quarter of the total amount is to be paid out of the first certificate." After the plaintiff had commenced the work, he discovered, as he alleges, that the defendant had undercalculated the amount of work to be done, but he completed the work, and now seeks to recover from the defendant the additional sum for which he would have tendered if the bills of quantities had been correct. An initial difficulty was pointed out by me during the argument that the plaintiff would not have succeeded in his tender if it had exceeded the limit of £2,700, which Williams had placed on the cost of the building. The answer given was that, in point of fact, there was a loss on the contract, and that for that loss, at all events, the defendant should be held liable. Unfortunately the evidence as to such a loss was extremely vague and unsatisfactory, the plaintiff being wholly unable to say what the amount of the loss was. The pleadings, moreover, do not raise the question whether there has been a loss on the contract, but in the view which I take of the case on its merits, it is unnecessary to discuss the question as to the measure of damages any further. For the purpose of my decision, I will assume that there has been an under-calculation upon the face of the bills of quantities, and that the plaintiff has sustained some damages in consequence. In charging the defendant with misrepresentation, the plaintiff does not allege that it was made knowingly or wilfully or with the intention of deceiving the plaintiff. In the absence of some allegation of that nature, the plaintiff cannot succeed unless there was a legal obligation upon the defendant to furnish the plaintiff with absolutely correct bills of quantities. A similar question was considered by this Court in Tait v. Wicht (7 Juta, 156), and it was there assumed that an innocent misrepresentation made by a person who was under no legal obligation to make any representation at all would not be a good ground for an action to recover damages for a loss resulting from a contract entered into in consequence of such misrepresentation. "Fraud," it was added, "could not exist as a ground of action for the plaintiffs having been induced to enter into a contract resulting in loss, unless the person guilty of it had a fraudulent motive." It has not been suggested in the present case that the defendant knew that the bills of quantities were otherwise than correct, or that he was influenced by any fraudulent motive. The doctrine of estoppel cannot aid the plaintiff, for his object is not to estop the defendant from denying the correctness of the statements appearing on the bills of quantities, and the defendant, so far from denying their correctness, insists upon it that they are substantially correct. The action is based upon the incorrectness of those statements, and the question to be determined is whether, in the absence of fraud, the defendant is liable for damages resulting to the plaintiff from his having acted on those statements. It is evident that the plaintiff might have protected himself by employing an independent surveyor to take out the quantities for him. He based his tender upon the quantities supplied to him, but he also increased the amount of his tender by the sum which he would have to pay to the quantity surveyor on behalf of the building owner. The payment came out of the building owner's pocket, and not out of his own pocket. It was therefore not too much to expect of him to have an independent measurement at his own expense before entering into the contract. But whether this was to be expected of him or not, I am clearly of opinion that if, upon the facts of the present case, it appeared that the plaintiff had employed the defendant to make the measurements, the latter would be liable for inaccurate measurements, resulting in loss to the plaintiff. This liability would arise, not out of any guarantee or misrepresentation, but out of the legal obligation resting upon a professional person to exercise reasonable skill and care in the performance of the work which he contracts to perform for reward. This obligation he owes to the person who employed him, and the question therefore in the present case is whether the defendant was employed by the plaintiff. A very important test in such a case is, as was said in Hooper v. Reid (9 Sheil, 637): "Who paid the quantity surveyor?" But it is not the only test, for in that very case stress was laid on the fact that it was at the request of the builder that the quantity surveyor had undertaken the work. This was inferred from all the facts proved in that case, including the fact that by direct agreement between the builder and the quantity surveyor, the former was to pay, and did pay for the work. The building owner in that case had employed the defendant as architect to prepare the plans and specifications, but, as the Court understood the evidence, the plaintiff had employed the defendant as quantity surveyor. It was unnecessary, moreover, to decide the point, seeing that, in the opinion of the Court, the plaintiff had already received from the building owner whatever he might have been entitled to by way of damages. The head-note would have been more correct if it had read thus: "An architect who is also a quantity surveyor, and is employed and paid by a builder for taking out quantities for the construction of a building, is liable for any loss caused to the builder owing to his negligence in taking out the quantities." In the present case, there does not appear to me to be sufficient evidence of any contract between the plaintiff and the defendant. The only way in which such a contract could be established would be by holding that by the concluding portion of the 73th clause of the contract, Williams stipulated for the payment of the quantity surveyor's fees to the defendant, and that the defendant, by accepting the benefit of this stipulation, entered into a contract with the plaintiff, to supply him with accurate bills of quantities. But if the plaintiff is to have the benefit of the circumstance that such a stipulation was made on behalf of the defendant, then the defendant should also have the benefit of that part of the clause which throws on the plaintiff the obligation of satisfying himself as to the accuracy of the bills of quantities supplied to him. Due notice was thus given to the plaintiff that the handing to him of the bills of quantities was not intended as a guarantee of their accuracy. In the case of Hooper v. Reid there was direct payment of the quantity surveyor's fees by the builder, and there was no clause in the contract between the builder and the building owner, similar to the 73th clause of the contract now in question. That case, therefore, cannot be regarded as an authority applicable to the present case. In my opinion, the plaintiff has failed in proving that the plaintiff employed the defendant as his quantity surveyor, or that the defendant made any false and fraudulent representation to the plaintiff, or that he gave any guarantee as to the accuracy of his measurements, and there must consequently be absolution from the instance upon the declaration as originally framed. At the trial an application was made for an amendment of the declaration by adding a claim for £8 13s. 2d., being a sum over paid in error by the plaintiff. The defendant did not object to the amendment, and did not dispute the accuracy of this claim, and I am satisfied that if it had been embraced in the declaration as originally framed, the defendant would have tendered to pay the amount. There will, therefore, be judgment for the plaintiff for £8 13s. 2d., but the plaintiff will have to pay the costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

COHEN AND KAPLAN V. } 1904.
SAED AND OTHERS. } Sept. 5th.

Mr. D. Buchanan (for the plaintiffs) moved as a matter of urgency for an order for the attachment of the respondent Saed for contempt of Court in disobeying a rule nisi restraining him from removing certain machinery and stock-in-trade from premises situate at 330, Hanover-street.

Mr. Sylvester Williams (for the defendant) said that he was prepared to return the goods, and pay the costs of the proceedings. The defendant had acted in ignorance of the order of the Court, and had only taken advice that morning.

The defendant gave evidence to this effect.

An order was granted, attaching the respondent for contempt of Court, unless he should, before 5 p.m. this day (Monday) return the machinery, implements, and stock to the premises, 330, Hanover-street, from which he removed the same, respondent to pay costs.

SEAGULL AND CO. V. ARONSON.

Mr. Close moved, as a matter of urgency, for removal of trial to Circuit Court at Port Elizabeth.

Mr. Upington appeared to oppose.

It was stated on affidavit for the applicants (the plaintiffs) that the next Circuit Court would be held at Port Elizabeth on the 12th inst., and that it would be more convenient, and would facilitate the trial if the action were set down for hearing there. The plaintiffs resided at Port Elizabeth, where the contract, in respect of which the action was instituted, was entered into.

For the respondent, it was stated that defendant, who was an hotel keeper at Riversdale, would have to close his hotel if the case were tried at Port Elizabeth, as the attendance of himself and his wife as witnesses was required. Moreover, to go to Port Elizabeth would entail considerable inconvenience, and additional cost to the respondent. Respondent asked that the case should be removed to Riversdale Circuit Court, failing which, it should be set down for trial in the Supreme Court.

Mr. Close consented to the removal of the trial to Riversdale.

An order was made accordingly, costs to be costs in the cause.

STOFFBERG V. ALTSCHUL.

Sale and purchase—Magistrate's finding on facts.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Calvinia in a case in which the plaintiff, now respondent, sued for restoration of a certain cart, the property of the plaintiff, or for payment of the value thereof. £20. defendant, it alleged, having illegally and wrongfully possessed himself of the cart. The Magistrate gave judgment for the restitution of the cart, failing which, for £13.

From the record in the Court below it appeared that plaintiff had agreed to purchase a cart from the defendant, and had taken delivery of it. The purchase price of the cart was £13. He arranged with defendant to pay him in a few days, but during his absence from the farm the defendant came, and removed the vehicle. This happened several days after the sale. For the defence, evidence was led to show that there was no sale of the cart, which defendant had offered to sell for £14. The cart was removed from defendant's place by plaintiff's servants without the former's knowledge. After the cart was taken by plaintiff, defendant saw him, and said he must return the cart, or pay him £14 10s. Plaintiff asked him to allow negotiations to stand over until he returned from a journey to Reitsfontein, but he declined to do so, and said he would send for the cart. Subsequently, he sent his servants to get the cart from the plaintiff's place. The Magistrate found that there had been a sale of the cart for £13, and gave judgment accordingly.

Mr. McGregor appeared on behalf of the appellant; respondent was not represented.

Mr. McGregor argued that the facts did not justify the Magistrate's finding. He submitted that there was no consensus, and that whatever the facts were, unless the plaintiff offered the money, this being a cash transaction, he could not sue for the performance of the contract by the other party.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court is always loth to interfere with the decisions of Magistrates, where questions of fact are involved, but it does appear to me in the present case that the Magistrate has not given due weight to the probabilities of the case. Taking the evidence as a whole, the impression left on my mind, certainly was that there must have been a misunderstanding between the parties. The whole conduct of the defendant showed, at all events, that he did not consider there had been a sale of the cart for £13. Looking at the case as a whole, the improbability of the plaintiff's version is such that I think the Magistrate ought to have given absolution from the instance. Then there is another point. The plaintiff has never paid for the cart; yet, although he admits it was a sale for cash, he now claims re-possession of the cart, without tendering the money. Then the Magistrate gave judgment for the return of the cart, or payment of £13 damages, without any tender on the part of the plaintiff to pay the purchase price. Now, in my opinion, this cart being sold for cash, it was a condition that before the plaintiff could get possession of the cart he should be ready and willing to pay the money. That seems to me to be an additional reason for altering the judgment of the Magistrate. The appeal must be allowed, with costs, and judgment altered to absolution from the instance, with costs in the Court below.

MILES V. JAGGER AND CO.

Contract of service—Misconduct—Dismissal.

The plaintiff, who had been engaged by the defendant to perform the general duties of a clerk, either in the defendants' store or in the accounting office, used insolent language towards his superior, in consequence of which he received a month's notice, and was transferred from the store to the accounting office. Before the expiration of the month, the plaintiff flatly refused to perform the duties of a ledger clerk, upon which the defendant tendered him his salary up to that date and dismissed him.

Held, that the tender was sufficient and that the defendant was not bound to pay salary for the unexpired portion of the month.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of the Cape.

The appellant sued Messrs. Jagger and Co. in the Magistrate's Court for £18 for work and labour done from the 1st June to the 15th July. This amount was claimed as damages. The plaintiff was an assistant in the employ of the defendant firm, and worked up to the 23rd June, when he was dismissed. The defendants filed a written plea, in which it was admitted that they owed the plaintiff £8 2s. 5d. They stated that on the 15th June the plaintiff misconducted himself in such a manner as to prejudice their business, in that he used insulting and abusive language to the manager of the department in which he was employed. He was thereupon given a month's notice, and transferred to another department. On the 23rd June he refused to do certain work, and he was therefore dismissed. Defendants had tendered the plaintiff's salary up to the 22nd July.

In his evidence, the plaintiff said that on the 23rd June he refused to do some clerical work, stating that he was engaged as a checker, and was not going to be a clerk for the money. On behalf of the defendants, it was stated that defendant was engaged as a checker, but was distinctly told that he would have to do whatever he was told, either in the storeroom or the office. The Magistrate gave judgment for the defendants, with costs.

Mr. Alexander appeared for the appellant; Mr. W. P. Buchanan for the respondent.

After hearing Mr. Alexander, and without calling on Mr. Buchanan, the Court dismissed the appeal, with costs.

De Villiers, C.J.: According to the evidence of Mr. Westerton, who is a partner in the firm of Jagger and Co., the plaintiff was engaged on the distinct understanding that he would have to perform the general duties of a clerk either in the defendant's store or in the accounting office. He was first of all given the duties of a checker, and it was while performing the duties of a checker that the first trouble between him and the defendant firm arose. This occurred on the 15th June, and in consequence of what one might almost call insolent language on the part of the plaintiff, he was told he would no longer remain in the forwarding department, but that he would have to go to the accounting department, and a month's notice was given him. It seems to me that there was some consideration shown to him, considering the language he had used towards one of the heads of the firm in the store. He accordingly went to the accounting department, and after he had been there a few days, he was asked to do the duties of ledger clerk, which he did. Then he went back to the accounting department, and next day he was again asked to do the work of ledger clerk. He flatly refused, and not only did he refuse, but he used language in the presence of the other clerks which was certainly calculated to be subversive of all discipline in an establishment of the kind. He used language wholly improper towards his immediate superiors. The question is whether he was asked to do work which he was not bound to do. Upon this we have the evidence of Mr. Westerton that he would have been bound to do this work, and the fact that he had previously done the work goes far to show that he, at all events, considered he was bound to do it. Then the question of salary, though it is not conclusive, is of some importance. It appears that the ledger-clerks received the same salary as he did, viz., £12. The request made to him to do this work does not seem to have been an unreasonable one. According to Mr. Westerton's evidence, if it is correct—and I suppose the Magistrate thought it correct—he could have been called upon to do a ledger clerk's work. Upon his flatly refusing to do this work, the firm was, in my opinion, quite justified in there and then dismissing him. They offered to pay his wages to that date, but refused to pay him anything further. The Magistrate very properly gave judgment for the amount of the tender. The appeal will be dismissed, with costs.

APPEALS.

OOSTHUYSEN V. WASSUNG. { 1904.
Sept. 6th.

Sale and purchase—Return of goods.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Resident Magistrate of Mossel Bay, in which he found for the plaintiff for £94 16s. 6d., the amount of a promissory note.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, said the action was for a balance of £94 16s. 6d., due by defendant on an overdue promissory note for £288, of which plaintiff was alleged to be the legal holder. Defendant did not deny his signature to the bill, or his liability to plaintiff, but took exception to charges for £15 4s. 6d., made by plaintiff for cart hire, attendance, and discount. He considered these charges were contemplated by defendant, when he signed the promissory note: the conditions of sale and the subsequent verbal agreement, between the defendant and plaintiff and plaintiff's attorney, all seemed to show that defendant was aware of the fact, that if he failed to meet the bill when due, the mules would be seized, and sold at his personal risk, and expense. He did not credit the statements for the defence that the plaintiff was to cry quits on the transaction on receiving back the mules, as defendant had then had the use of the animals for nine months to ride transport with, etc. Moreover, plaintiff, as auctioneer, was responsible for the amount paid out on the day of sale, and subsequent sales showed the plaintiff sold the same class of mules at public auction for £10 each, showing that the market price had fallen considerably. The plaintiff incurred the debt of £15 4s. 6d., through defendant's neglect in not meeting the bill. The balance of £94 16s. 6d. was clearly due to the plaintiff.

Mr. Close was for the appellant, and Mr. Pyemont was for the respondent.

Mr. Close contended that the taking back of the mules was a cancellation of the whole agreement. The Magistrate was entirely wrong in saying that there was no denial of the debt. The plaintiff based his case on the fact that he would not take over the mules because they had gone down in value, but in this particular case it was clear that the mules had gone up in value. Counsel contended that the Magistrate's reasons were rather flimsy, starting off, as he did, by the assertion that the appellant did not deny his liability.

Mr. Pyemont contended that the evidence bore out the Magistrate's finding. Was it likely if there had been no condition the defendant would have given up the mules? The evidence was very strong with regard to the condition. The Magistrate who heard the whole of the evidence said he did not believe the evidence of the defendant that the plaintiff was agreeable to cry quits on the transaction.

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant bought fourteen mules at an auction sale held by the plaintiff at the rate of £20 per mule. Credit was given for three months. At the end of three months the defendant was unable to pay, upon which a promissory note was taken for the purchase price of £280, to which was added the sum of £8, for discount making £288. When this note fell due, the defendant was still unable to pay the amount, and not many weeks afterwards the plaintiff went to the defendant's farm for the purpose of obtaining a settlement of this account. It is quite clear that the plaintiff was very anxious to have his money, as he began to doubt the stability of the defendant, and he then asked the defendant to let him have the mules back. The defendant seemed quite willing to fetch the mules, and handed them back to the plaintiff. The important question is what took place at that meeting. According to the defendant, himself and his brother, who was present, the mules were handed to the plaintiff in full satisfaction. They were to be given back to the plaintiff in full settlement of the amount, which was owing, and the brother supports this. When the plaintiff was called the first time in re-examination, he made the following statement: "I took back these mules for a debt owing to me as my own property. The defendant had nothing whatever to do with them." Now, this statement is inconsistent with the case laid before the Magistrate. The case then made was that the plaintiff was merely an agent for the sale of these mules on behalf of the defendant, so that he would not have taken them as his own property. The only circumstance in favour of the plaintiff is the fact that he retained the promissory note. But then, against that, we have the fact that at the time when these mules were handed over to the plaintiff, he took a promissory note from the defendant for one mule which had died, the amount being exactly the same for which the mule had been purchased. This circumstance seems to me more consistent with the defendant's statement that the mules were given back in full settlement. I am quite satisfied, if the plaintiff had sold these mules at a profit, nothing more would have been heard of it. There was a drop in the price of the mules, and they did not realise the price anticipated. It seems to me the probabilities are entirely in favour of the defendant, and the Court is wholly unable to sustain the judgment of the Magistrate. All the circumstances seem to point to this, that the mules were handed over in full satisfaction, and for these reasons the appeal should be allowed, with costs, and judgment entered for the defendant, with costs.

SPECIAL CASES.

ESTATE BELL V. BELL.

Will—Construction.

This was a special case stated for the decision of the Court. The declaration set out that the first plaintiff, Katrina Petrus, was the mother of the defendant children, and the second plaintiff, John Furzen Drummond Elliot, was the executor dative of the estate of the late Albert Bell. On 30th May, 1886, Albert Bell executed a will, which provided inter alia, "that Katrina Petrus shall during her lifetime receive a life interest in the estate, not to exceed £50 sterling." The value of the estate amounted to £2,489. The first plaintiff contended that under the will, during her lifetime and until her marriage, she was entitled to receive from the estate an annual sum of £50, and that the second plaintiff was entitled before distribution of the residue of the estate between the defendants to set aside for the first plaintiff such a sum of money as, being invested, would produce the annual amount of £50. The curator ad litem of the minors subscribed to the contention of the plaintiffs that an annuity of £50 was payable to Katrina Petrus until her remarriage or death, and to an immediate realisation of the estate to produce such an annuity on investment.

Mr. Close was for the plaintiff, and Mr. W. P. Buchanan represented the curator ad litem for the minors and the other defendants.

Counsel having been heard,

De Villiers, C.J.: The parties to this suit are in the happy position that they are entirely at one as to what the judgment of the Court should be. There are minors interested, and these minors are represented by counsel, and he also, after full consideration, has come to the conclusion that the contention of the plaintiff in regard to the clause of the will in question is the correct one. The clause is as follows: "The said Katrina Petrus shall during her lifetime receive a life interest in the estate, not to exceed £50 sterling." The meaning of this clause is extremely doubtful. Any decision now holding that this £50 amounts to an annual payment would be a decision that could be quoted hereafter as an authority in similar cases, but seeing that the point is extremely doubtful, and all the parties are agreed, I consider this one of those cases in which the Court is quite justified in exercising its power to sanction the settlement of the doubtful question between the parties, all parties interested in the estate agreeing to the construction of the will. In view of the doubtful construction, the Court authorises the disposition of the estate in accordance with the contention of both parties to the estate. Costs to come out of the estate.

Legacy—Ademption—Sale of bequeathed property.

A testator by his will bequeathed his farm J. to his son

William, and his farms K. and L. to his sons Isaac and the plaintiff, subject to certain intricate fidei commissary substitutions. Attached to the bequest of the farms K. and L. was a direction to the effect that in case the testator should sell them and buy other ground in substitution for them, such other ground must be looked upon as bequeathed on the same stipulations as mentioned in regard to K and L. The testator did sell farms K. and L., and he bought two other farms, one of which he gave in occupation to William and the other to the plaintiff, but there was nothing to connect the sale of the former with the purchase of the latter, or to bring such giving of occupation to two of his sons into relation with the direction in the will.

Held, that there was an accomplishment of the legacies.

This was a special case submitted for the decision of the Court.

The plaintiff is Johannes Christian Steyn, personally and in his capacity as the natural Guardian of his minor children.

The defendants are:

(1) Douw Gerbrand Steyn, personally and in his capacity as Executor Testamentary of his deceased wife, Elizabeth Sophia Johanna Steyn (born Lessing);

(2) Elizabeth Sophia Johanna van der Walt (born Lessing), married in community of property to Nicolaas Albertus van der Walt, and assisted by him as far as need be, in her capacity as the Mother and natural Guardian of her minor children, Douw Gerbrand Steyn and Maria Magdalena Steyn;

(3) William Johannes Abraham Steyn, personally and in his capacity as the natural Guardian of his minor children;

(4) Isaac Jacobus Steyn, personally and in his capacity as the natural Guardian of his minor children,

1. The plaintiff is a son of the first defendant and his predeceased spouse Elizabeth Sophia Johanna Steyn (born Lessing), and claims herein both on his own behalf and also, as their natural guardian, on behalf of his minor children and further descendants under the will hereinafter referred to.

2. The defendants are:

(a) Douw Gerbrand Steyn, personally and in his capacity as executor testamentary of his deceased wife Elizabeth Sophia Johanna Steyn (born Lessing).

(b) Elizabeth Sophia Johanna van der Walt (born Lessing), married in community of property to Nicolaas Albertus van der Walt, and assisted by him as far as need, in her capacity as the mother and natural guardian of the minor children, to wit, Douw Gerbrand Steyn and Maria Magdalena, of herself and her deceased husband, Douw Gerbrand Steyn, a son of the first defendant and his wife.

(c) Willem Johannes Abraham Steyn, a son of the first defendant and his said deceased wife, and he is sued personally and in his capacity as the natural guardian of his minor children.

(d) Isaac Jacobus Steyn, a son of the first defendant and his said deceased wife, and he is sued personally and in his capacity as the natural guardian of his minor children.

3. On the 24th January, 1903, the said Douw Gerbrand Steyn and his said wife, Elizabeth Sophia Johanna Steyn, who were married in community of property, executed the mutual will, copy of whereof is hereunto annexed, marked "A," together with a true translation marked "B."

4. Under the said will the testators, inter alia, bequeathed to the plaintiff and the fourth defendant, Isaac J. Steyn, the portions owned by them of the farm Groenkloof and Geelsbekfontein, situate in the division of Colesberg, and further bequeathed to the third defendant their farm Jakhalsfontein, situate in the same division—both bequests being made subject to certain conditions mentioned in the will. Among these conditions were:

(a) The reservation of a life interest by the surviving testator, and

(b) The payment of an amount (on the bequest) of £1,500 by the third defendant and £400 by the plaintiff and the fourth defendant.

5. In the case of each bequest it was provided that the beneficiary should take as fiduciary heir with remainder over to the children of such beneficiary and further remainder over to the children of such children—such fidei commissum extending to the fourth generation of fidei commissary children, "or further in caseth law allow it." The mode of such devolution is set out in the said will.

6. It was further provided in respect of the bequest to the plaintiff, and the fourth defendant under clause (d) of the terms constituting the said bequest that in the event of the testators selling the said ground and buying other ground, such other ground should be deemed to be bequeathed subject to the like stipulations and conditions as those previously set out.

7. At the date of execution of the said will the said farms belonged to and formed a part of the said estate of the said testators.

8. After the date of the execution of the said mutual will, but prior to the death of the said testatrix, as hereafter mentioned, the several farms mentioned in paragraph 4 hereof were sold and transferred to a purchasing syndicate by the first defendant at a very good price, namely, £25,000, and thereafter, but still prior to the death of the testatrix, the testator purchased and received transfer of certain other ground, to wit, the farms "Wilbeestvley," in the division of Albert, bought for £7,500, and "Palmietfontein," in the division of Colesberg, bought for £7,750. Upon the purchase thereof the former farm was given in occupation to the third defendant and the latter to the plaintiff.

9. The testatrix died suddenly on the 3rd February, 1904, and no other will was made by her and the testator after the sales of the farms referred to in paragraph 4 hereof.

10. a. Besides the three sons herein aforementioned there was further issue of the testators, to wit:

1. Three daughters, viz., Elizabeth S. J. Steyn, now married to Jacobus Kruger; Hester Catharina Steyn, and Johanna Steyn, and

II. A son, Douw Gerbrand Steyn, married in his lifetime to the second defendant, but deceased at the date of the execution of the said will. The minor children mentioned in paragraph 2 (b) hereof are the issue of the said marriage.

b. By a former marriage of the testator, before his marriage with the testatrix, there was issue, to wit, one daughter Geertruida Catherina, now married to J. L. Venter.

c. The said children and other descendants are likewise interested under the said will as legatees and heirs, and the mode and extent of their interest will appear on reference to the said will.

11. During the lifetime of the testatrix, the fourth defendant, Isaac Jacobus Steyn, signed the acknowledgement hereunto annexed marked C bearing date the 18th May, 1903. The sum of £1,000 mentioned in the said acknowledgement was duly paid over to the said Isaac J. Steyn by his said parents on condition that he should not inherit any landed property either under the said will or any other will of his parents, the said money having been given to him for the purpose of buying ground therewith. The said Isaac J. Steyn does not personally claim to be entitled to any share or interest in or right to any part of the land mentioned in paragraph 8.

12. The first defendant has not decided whether to adiate and accept the benefit of usufruct as to his late wife's share of the joint estate until the questions in doubt raised in this suit are determined by this Honourable Court.

13. The plaintiff contends:

a. That by the sale of the first property bequeathed to the third defendant there was an entire ademption of the property bequeathed to him.

b. That by virtue of the provisions of the will as referred to in paragraph 7 hereof the whole of the "other ground" purchased by the testators, as mentioned in paragraph 8, became and was substituted for and should in law be deemed to be in place of the ground mentioned in the bequest to him and the fourth defendant as contained in the said will and to be bequeathed accordingly, or, alternatively, that the half of aforesaid farm "Palmietfontein," referred to in the said paragraph 8, became, and was substituted and should be deemed to be so bequeathed accordingly.

c. That by reason of the matters above set forth, and particularly those set out in paragraph 11 hereof, and by virtue of the jus accrescendi the fourth defendant became and was divested of all and every right, title and interest in and to the aforesaid ground or any part thereof, and the right, title and interest therein and thereto accrued to and in favour of the plaintiff for himself and his children and descendants.

d. That by virtue of the premises the plaintiff is entitled to an order declaring that the half of "Palmietfontein" should be deemed and taken to be and should devolve as if properly bequeathed to him in terms of and subject to the provisions of the said will and should that the due date be dealt with and duly made over and delivered to him accordingly.

14. The first defendant personally and as executor of his wife contends that as to the bequest of land in the will both that to the third defendant and that to the plaintiff and the fourth defendant there was an entire ademption by the sale of the bequeathed farms; but if this Honourable Court should consider that as the bequest in which the plaintiff was interested there was not such entire ademption, then the said defendant contends that half of the aforesaid farm, "Palmietfontein," and not also the farm "Wilbeestvley," should be held to be referred to in the said bequest under the words "ander grond," or "other land," in the said will.

15. The second defendant agrees with the contentions of the first defendant.

16. The third defendant personally and in his capacity as the natural guardian of his minor children, contends:

a. That if there has been any ademption of the legacy of the farm "Jak-halsfontein" there has been only a partial ademption, to wit, to the extent of the difference between the value of the said farm and the value of the farm "Wilbeestvley." The third defendant contends that the said legacy is preserved to the extent of the value of the farm "Wilbeestvley," which was purchased and assigned to him upon the disposal of "Jak-halsfontein."

b. Failing this the third defendant contends that by such purchase and assignment the testator and testatrix intended to and did substitute the farm "Wilbeestvley" for the farm "Jakhalsfontein" for the purpose of and in respect of the bequest thereof under the will annexed.

c. Failing the above the third defendant supports the contentions of the first defendant.

17 (1) The fourth defendant agrees with contentions (a) and (b) of the plaintiff, but he denies the correctness of all and singular the claims advanced in the two subsequent contentions (c) and (d).

(2) He contends that he, the defendant, by entering into the arrangement with his parents referred to in paragraph 11, did not divest himself, and had no power to divest himself in his representative capacity of his rights in and to the said farms "Wilbeestvley" and "Palmietfontein," or either of them, and thereby to prejudice and defeat the just and lawful rights of his children and further descendants, under the said will, to the said property, and maintains that the arrangement in question never had any legal force or effect so far as the rights of the said children or descendants were concerned.

(3) He contends that there was no accrual of his rights in favour of the plaintiff, and that, if the plaintiff's contention (b) should be upheld, he, the defendant, is entitled, as representing his children and descendants, to an order declaring their fidei commissary rights under the said will to half of the said farm or farms, and that their said share should be delivered to him on their behalf.

The parties pray for judgment for their respective contentions, and pray that the costs of this action may be ordered to come out of the estate.

The original will was in Dutch, of which the following is a translation:

On this the twenty-fourth day of the month January in the Year of Our Lord One Thousand Nine Hundred and Two (1902). We, Douw Gerbrand Steyn and Elizabeth Sophia Johanna Lessing, married to each other, declare to dispose of our property left after death, doing such of our own free will without advice or persuasion of anyone and revoking therefore all testaments, codicils or other documents having the force of a last will which we might before the date hereof jointly or singly have executed and passed, wishing and desiring therefore that none of the same after the passing hereof shall be of the slightest force or effect, but on the contrary shall be looked upon as never having been passed.

Now passing on the the choice of Heirs, I, the testator declare to name constitute and appoint as my only and sole heirs:

1st. The testatrix herein.

2nd. My child born of my marriage with Geertruida Catherina Snyman.

3rd. The children already begotten of this marriage and still to be begotten.

And I, the testatrix, declare to nominate and appoint as my only and sole heirs

1st. The testator herein.

2nd. The children already begotten of this marriage and still to be begotten.

And since your son, D. G. Steyn, is deceased we therefore declare that his children shall come in as heirs in his stead, so also in case of predecease of one or more of our other heirs, then and in that case their lawful descendants in their stead, and such of all the first dyings property, actions and credits, inheritances and legacies, nothing excepted on the understanding and condition however that the survivor off us will have to remain in full possession of everything until his or her death or remarriage, it being our wish and desire that the survivor in case of remarriage shall be obliged before contracting the same to choose and appoint two good and reputable men as guardians over the kindred, which must then be passed.

It is further our wish and desire that our estate shall be settled within six months after the death of the first dying.

We declare hereby to nominate and appoint the survivor of us as executor or executrix of this our testament, administrator or administratrix of our estate and effects, so also guardian of our minor children, and such with the power of assumption and all other such powers as are allowed in law.

We declare further to make over and bequeath as follows:

1st. To our son, Willem Johannes Abraham Steyn, our farm "Jakhalsfontein," situate in the district of Colerberg, as at present possessed by us, under the following conditions and "bemarkings" price.

a. That our said son shall pay as "bemarkings" price the sum of One Thousand Six Hundred Pounds sterling to be paid into the estate of the survivor six months after his or her death.

b. In case of predecease of our said son then the bequest shall devolve on his children as hereafter mentioned.

c. That the survivor of us shall retain the full free and undisturbed life interest in the said property until his or her death.

d. That our said son will be solely a fiduciary heir, and that after his death the said property must devolve upon his two eldest children in equal shares and on the same condition, namely, that the property shall devolve on the two eldest children of their fiduciary heirs after their death up to the fourth generation, and even further if the law allows it. In case the two fiduciary heirs have only one heir who would inherit the aforementioned conditions, he shall inherit the whole property on the whole conditions mentioned.

2nd. To our sons Isaac Jacobus Steyn and Johannes Christian Steyn, the portions of our farms "Groen Kloof" and "Geelbeksfontein," situate in the district of Colesburg, as at present possessed by us under the following conditions and "bemakings" price.

a. It is our wish that the ground in so far as the size is concerned shall be divided equally; our son, Johannes Christian Steyn, will, however, receive his portion so that the "werf" and lands and fountain, etc., of "Groen Kloof," known as "Vlakfontein," falls within his half share.

b. The legatees will be jointly as well as singly obliged to pay six months after the death of the survivor into the estate the sum of Four Hundred Pounds sterling as "bemaking" price.

c. That conditions (b) (c) and (d) of the bequest first abovementioned shall be considered as added hereto and with regard to the transferring of the property of our two sons, the same shall devolve in such a way on their two eldest children that both branches are represented one from each side and so on as far as the law of fidei commissum allows. In case, however, the fiduciary heirs have only one heir who could inherit under the aforementioned conditions, he shall be entitled to inherit the whole property (d). In case the testators shall sell the said ground and buy other ground, such other ground must be looked upon as bequeathed on the same stipulations and conditions as herein mentioned. In case, however, one of the testators may come to die before such other ground shall have been purchased, then the proceeds of the ground shall be equally divided between our two said sons after deduction of £400 aforesaid.

3rd. It is further our wish and desire that the above-mentioned sum of £2,000 to be paid into our estate shall be divided as follows:

a. £1,000 (one thousand pounds) sterling among our grand-children, being the children of our deceased son, Douw Gerbrand Steyn, in equal shares.

b. And the other £1,000 (one thousand pounds sterling) in equal shares to our four daughters, namely, Geertruida Catharina, married to J. L. Venter; Elizabeth J., married to Jacobus Kruger; Hester Catharina and Johanna.

4th. We bequeath further to the survivor of us all our erven situated at Venterstad, with the buildings thereon, as his or her free property. Lastly, we declare to reserve specially to ourselves the right and power at all times (the bequest excepted) to alter this, our last disposition, as we may be advised, either by separate deed or at the foot of this testament, desiring that all such alterations which may be found in this sense, confirmed by our signatures, shall be looked upon as if the same were inserted verbatim in this testament.

The foregoing we declare to be our testament and last will, desiring that the same shall be of force as such in every detail, notwithstanding any solemnities being neglected which we hereby consider observed, imploring the utmost benefit under the law.

Thus passed and attested at Venterstad on day and date above mentioned, in the presence of the subscribing witnesses.

Mr. McGregor, for plaintiff; Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for first and second defendants; Mr. Close, for third defendant; Mr. Burton, for fourth defendant.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

Cur. adv. vult.

Postea (September 8).

De Villiers, C.J.: The testators by their will bequeathed the farms Groenkloof and Geelbeksfontein to their sons Isaac and the plaintiff, and their farm Jakhalsfontein to their son Willem. After the date of the will, but before the death of the testatrix, the testator sold these farms together to a syndicate for £25,000, and he purchased the farm Wildebeestvlei for £7,500 and the farm Palmietfontein for £7,750. The bequests of the farms were subject to certain intricate fidei-commissary substitutions, but it is only necessary to refer to one condition which is attached to the bequest of the farms Groenkloof and Geelbeksfontein. It reads as follows: "In case the testators shall sell the said ground and buy other ground, such other ground must be looked upon as bequeathed on the same stipulations and conditions as herein mentioned; in case, however, one of the testators may come to die before such other ground shall have been purchased, then the proceeds of the ground shall be equally divided between our two said sons, after deduction of £400." No similar condition is attached to the bequest of the farm Jakhalsfontein. It is clear, therefore, that the legacy has been deemed by reason of the sale of that farm. There has been no revocation of the legacy by will, but the voluntary alienation of the farm amounts to a tacit revocation, or, as it is generally termed, an ademption of the legacy. That is the general rule, and independently of the condition to which I shall again presently refer, there are no circumstances in this case to prevent the application of the rule.

As to the farms Groenkloof and Geelbeksfontein, they also were sold after the date of the will, and unless the conditions show a different intention on the testators' part, the legacy of these farms must also be regarded as having been adempted. The question then arises, what effect has that condition upon the rights of the different legatees? It cannot assist Willem, for it does not apply to the farm bequeathed to him. One of the farms subsequently bought, namely, Wildebeestvlei, was given in occupation to him, but that circumstance cannot assist him unless such giving in occupation can be brought into relation with some direction in the will that land given in occupation to any legatee shall be considered as a substitution of one bequest for another, or as the books term it, a translation of the legacy. As to the plaintiff and Isaac, the condition certainly applies to the farms bequeathed to them. It is said, however, that Isaac received the sum of £1,000 from the testators, on condition that he should not inherit any landed property, either under the said will or under any other will of his parents, the said money having been given to him for the purpose of buying ground therewith. It is by no means clear to me that this condition ought to affect the construction of the will. The testators must be regarded as having expressed their final wishes by their will, and if under that will Isaac is entitled to the rights of a fiduciary legatee, his renunciation of those rights before the death of either testator is not conclusive as to the rights of the parties interested. It is unnecessary, however, to decide the question, seeing that he does not claim any rights as fiduciary heir, and adheres to the renunciation which he made as such. Any such renunciation cannot, however, affect the rights of the remainder men, which stand on exactly the same footing as those of the plaintiff himself.

Coming next to the meaning of the condition, it appears to me that the plaintiff and his co-legatee are either entitled to all farms bought by the testator after the sale of the original farms, or they are entitled to nothing at all. The giving in possession of one of the farms to the plaintiff cannot assist him, because there is nothing to show that this was done in pursuance of the condition in the will. Seeing that the original legacy had been adeemed, the plaintiff can only succeed by showing that the expression "other ground" was clearly intended to apply to the farms now claimed by him. That "other ground" must be land bought in substitution for the land originally bequeathed to the plaintiff and Isaac. I cannot quite agree with the contention of the first defendant's counsel that there must be proof that the proceeds of the farms first bequeathed were actually applied to the purchase of other farms. But I do consider that there ought to be some act of the testators to connect the purchase of the latter farms with the sale of the particular farms bequeathed to the plaintiff and Isaac, in order to show that a substitution or translation was intended. The supposition that the testators intended the plaintiff and Isaac to have all farms purchased out of the proceeds of all the farms sold was so devoid of probability that the plaintiff's counsel himself hesitated to press it. It appears to me, however, that if that is not the meaning of the condition, the plaintiff cannot succeed at all. The words "other ground," wide though they are, must be read by the light of the whole passage, and so read they can only mean ground bought in substitution for the specific farms then being dealt with—namely, Groenkloof and Geelbeksfontein. There is no evidence whatever as to which of the two purchased farms was obtained in substitution for the two original farms, and it does not appear that such evidence is procurable. The plaintiff therefore has failed to prove that the property claimed by him falls within the description of the "other ground" bequeathed to him and Isaac, and his contentions must therefore fail.

The only contention which can be supported is that of the first and second defendants to the effect that there was an entire ademption by the sale of the farms Groenkloof, Geelbeksfontein, and Jackalsfontein. The costs will be paid by the estate.

I confess that I do not regret having been driven to this conclusion. The intricate fidei commissary substitutions, if put into force, would have led to endless complications and law suits among the family, and would not have been of much benefit to any of them. The plaintiff himself would, if his father had refused to adiate, have been entitled to the life interest in one-fourth share only of the farms, whereas now if the father should adiate, as I presume he will, the plaintiff will receive his proportionate share of the inheritance free and unencumbered. As to Willem, it is impossible to avoid the supposition that the testators by giving him possession of one of the farms, intended him to have it as a legacy; but it is a supposition only, not founded on any clear provisions of the will. He also, by the finding of the Court, will come in as an heir; and as to Isaac, he, I presume, will have to bring the sum of £1,000 received by him into collation before he receives his inheritance. In the interest of all parties concerned, it seems well that the fidei commissum should fall to the ground.

Hopley, J., concurred.

HERALD V. TYLER.

{ 1904.
Sept. 7th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved, as a matter of urgency, for confession of judgment in anticipation of the return day of a certain writ of arrest. The defendant was arrested on September 2 on the suspicion that he was about to leave the country, and at the present was confined in Roeland-street Gaol. The action was in respect of a promissory note, which the defendants jointly signed along with one Frank Wynburg, in a transaction regarding mules. Myburg informed him before the arrest that he had sold certain mules grazing at Malmesbury, and the defendant had reason to believe if Myburg sold all the mules he would not account to him.

Mr. Close, who appeared for the plaintiff, said that he was in the hands of the Court in the matter.

De Villiers, C.J., said if there was any ulterior reason for the application he would not have granted it, but it seemed to be a bona fide one. The defendant proposed to do now what he would do five days hence. The object of the plaintiff in having him arrested was to bring him before the Court in order to get judgment.

The application would be granted, and the release of the defendant would follow in the ordinary course.

"The immovable property belonging to my estate shall continue under the administration of my executors for the benefit of my grandchildren, and the fruits, rents and interests therefrom accruing shall accumulate and remain with the immovable property under the administration of the executors until my youngest grandchild shall attain his 21st year of age, when, and no sooner, my immovable property shall be realized by public auction and my estate wound up, and the net proceeds be equally divided among my grandchildren, then alive, share and share alike."

Held, that grandchildren born after the testator's death and alive at the time of the youngest grandchild attaining his 21st year will be entitled to share in the distribution.

Held further, that the grandchildren acquire no right transmissible to their heirs until the youngest grandchild born, or still to be born, shall attain his or her 21st year: that no distribution can take place so long as any of the testator's children are capable of procreating children, and that in the meantime the dominium is in the executors who hold the property in trust for those who in due time shall be entitled to share in the distribution.

BLACK'S HEIRS V. ESTATE { 1904.
BLACK AND ANOTHER. { Sept. 8th.
Oct. 15th.

Will—Construction—Legacy to a class—Grandchildren—Distribution—Vesting—Executors.

The testator by his will made the following disposition:

This was a special case stated for the decision of the Court.

The plaintiffs were as follows: John Maule Black; Alexander Julian Fison Black; Edith Janet Alice Black; Julia Elizabeth Mitchell (born Glin Wright), married to and duly assisted by John Frederick Mitchell; Emily Ann Catherine Ball (born Glin Wright), a widow; Laura Alice Taylor (born Glin Wright), married to and duly assisted by Frederick Kibbey Taylor; Louise Wilhelmine Weeks (born Black), married to and duly assisted by Robert Foster Jeffrey Weeks; Frances Geraldine Hugo (born Black), married to and duly assisted by Heinrich Pieter Hablutzel Hugo; Norman Alexander Noel Black; Ronald Leslie Black; Archibald

Maule Black; John Richard Black; William Runciman, in his capacity as father and natural guardian of Alexander Walter Runciman and Alice Elizabeth Anne Runciman, minor children of himself and Elizabeth Sarah Runciman (born Black); Gardner William Runciman; and the defendants—The Board of Executors of Cape Town, in its capacity as executor testamentary of the estate of the late John Richard Black, and James Fergus Black.

The plaintiffs' contention was as follows:

The first twelve plaintiffs are majors, and comprise all the living grandchildren of the late John Richard Black (hereinafter called the testator), who in his lifetime resided and was domiciled at Simon's Town, in this colony, and who died on the 6th November, 1883.

The plaintiff (numbered 13) William Runciman, sues in his capacity as father and natural guardian of Alexander Walter Runciman and Alice Elizabeth Anne Runciman, minor children of himself and his wife Elizabeth Sarah Runciman (born Black), who was a grandchild of the testator, and who died on the 17th November, 1896, aged 38 years. The plaintiff, Gardner William Runciman (numbered 14), is a major son of the abovenamed William Runciman and his late wife aforesaid.

The first-named defendant is sued in his capacity as the executor testamentary of the estate of the testator, and was duly appointed such by letters of administration, granted by the Master of this Hon. Court on the 5th December, 1883.

The second-named defendant is the youngest child of the testator. He was born on the 16th February, 1850, was married on the 15th July, 1899, and though the marriage still subsists, there has been no issue thereof. He is joined in this action for the purpose of protecting the interests (if any) of such issue as may hereafter be born to him.

The testator died at Simon's Town aforesaid on the 6th November, 1883, leaving of full force and effect a will dated 14th February, 1860, a copy of which is hereunto annexed marked "A," which the parties crave leave to have regarded as inserted herein. The testator's wife (Anne Maule) predeceased him; she died at Simon's Town on the 13th May, 1875, leaving no will. Of the testator's children mentioned in the will, Alexander Nicholas Black died on the 18th March, 1899, and was the father of the first three plaintiffs and of Elizabeth Sarah Runciman, in paragraph 2 hereof mentioned; Elizabeth Anne Black is the widow of John Glin Wright, is aged 76 years, and is mother of the plaintiffs numbered 5, and 6; Juliana Margaretha Jeffrey Black died on 17th May, 1896, leaving no issue; John Richard Black is the father of the plaintiffs numbered 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12, and is aged 60 years; Alice Black is the widow of William Runciman, sen., and is aged 58 years and has no issue; James Fergus Black is the second-named defendant, and hereinbefore mentioned. All the plaintiffs who are grandchildren of the testator were born before the date of the testator's death, and the youngest of them is John Richard Black (numbered 12), who was born on 2nd November, 1882. The plaintiff, Gardner William Runciman, was born on the 3rd October, 1882, but the two minors represented by their father William Runciman as aforesaid are now of the age of 13 and 11 years respectively. The first twelve plaintiffs, being testator's surviving grandchildren, contend: (1) That under the will the immovable property became and was vested at the death of the testator in those of the grandchildren who were then living. (2) That of such grandchildren those who died before the coming of age of the youngest grandchild, John Richard Black, on the 2nd November, 1903, have become divested of their shares, and that such shares have accrued to the aforesaid plaintiffs equally. (3) That plaintiffs aforementioned became entitled on and after the coming of age of the said John Richard Black, and are now entitled to claim a realisation of the said immovable property and a division of the proceeds among them equally. Or alternatively, (4) that as they were and are the only grandchildren of testator alive when the youngest grandchild in being, viz., John Richard Black, reached the age of majority on the 2nd November, 1903, they are entitled to claim the realisation of the immovable property and the distribution of the proceeds among them equally. The 13th plaintiff (in his capacity aforementioned) and the 14th plaintiff contend: (1) That under the will the immovable property became and was vested at the death of the testator in those of the grandchildren who were then living. (2) That of such grandchildren, those who died before the coming of age of the youngest grandchild, John Richard Black, on the 2nd November, 1903, were not divested of their rights but transmitted their rights to their children as heirs, and that, therefore, the 14th plaintiff and the minors represented by the 13th plaintiff are entitled to receive, as heirs of their mothers, the share which their mother, the late Elizabeth Sarah Runciman (born Black), was, and would, have been entitled to out of the estate as a grandchild of the testator. (3) That all the plaintiffs became entitled, on and after the coming of age of the said John Richard Black, and are now entitled to claim a realisation of the said immovable property and a division of the proceeds equally amongst the various grandchildren, the heirs of deceased grandchildren representing their deceased parents in the division as aforesaid.

The defendants' contention was as follows: Defendants contend that so long as the said second-named defendant is alive, or so long as children may be born of him, the realisation of the said immovable property and the distribution of the proceeds cannot take place.

The clause in the will relating to the plaintiffs was as follows: "The immovable property belonging to my estate shall continue under the administration of the said Board of Executors, for the benefit of my grandchildren, that the fruits, rents, and interests accruing from the said immovable property shall accumulate and remain with the said immovable property under the administration of the said Board of Executors, Cape Town, until my youngest grandchild shall attain his 21st year of age, when, and no sooner, my said immovable property shall be realised by public auction and my estate be wound up, and the net amount thereof be equally divided among my grandchildren, then alive, share and share alike."

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. W. P. Buchanan) for first twelve plaintiffs; Mr. Close for thirteenth and fourteenth plaintiffs; Sir H. Juta (with him Mr. Upington) for the defendants.

Mr. Schreiner contended that as soon as the youngest grandchild reached the age of 21, the time for the distribution of the immovable property contemplated by the testator had arrived. The substantial point was that the testator contemplated when he made the will there would be a life interest intervening for his wife, who, however, predeceased him. It was not to be supposed that these unfortunate grandchildren should have now to wait, if the testator's son had a child, until it reached the age of 21.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It would be a greater hardship to such a child to get nothing at all, than it would be for the plaintiffs to wait.]

Mr. Schreiner said that it would certainly be a hardship if all these middle-aged people were to get nothing. All the present grandchildren were alive when the will was made, and after 21 years there had not been a single heir added to the estate. It would be cruel irony if all the grandchildren should have to wait another 21 years, if another grandchild should happen to be born, which was extremely improbable.

Mr. Close said that, on the question of vesting, the interest given to the wife, was obviously a usufructory interest, and then the only persons who could be treated as heirs were those coming in under the clause for the benefit of the grandchildren.

Sir H. Juta said in this case it was clear that the testator had postponed the distribution. The terms of the will were clear that the only persons to receive the distribution were those alive at the time the distribution took place. The object of the testator was to accumulate property. The words "then alive" could not be got over; they were perfectly definite. The testator clearly contemplated that some of the grandchildren might die when he said "amongst those then alive."

Cur. Ad. Vult.

Postea (Oct. 15th).

De Villiers, C.J.: The testator, by his will, made the following disposition: "The immovable property belonging to my estate shall continue under the administration of the Board of Executors for the benefit of my grandchildren, and the fruits, rents, and interests accruing from the said immovable property shall accumulate and remain with the immovable property under the administration of the said Board until my youngest grandchild shall attain his twenty-first year of age, when, and no sooner, my said immovable property shall be realised by public auction, and my estate wound up, and the net amount thereof be equally divided among my grandchildren, then alive, share and share alike." The testator, who during his lifetime resided at Simon's Town, died in 1883, leaving several children and grandchildren. Some of the children and one of the grandchildren have since died, leaving issue. The youngest grandchild at the time of the testator's death was John Richard Black, jun., who attained the twenty-first year of his age on the 2nd of November, 1903, and no grandchild has been born since the death of the testator. It is quite possible, however, that more grandchildren may come into being, for some of the testator's children are still alive, including James Fergus Black, who is fifty-four years old, and although married, has no issue. The grandchild who has died since the date of the testator's death is Mrs. Runciman, but she has left three children, who are plaintiffs in this suit, and their contention is that, as the youngest grandchild living at the date of the testator's death has now come of age, there should be an immediate distribution, in which they must share as the heirs of their deceased mother. The remaining grandchildren of the testator are all plaintiffs, and they join in the contention that there should be an immediate distribution, but they deny the right of Mrs. Runciman's children to share in that distribution, as she was not alive at the date when the youngest grandchild became of age. The defendants in this suit are the Board of Executors and the testator's son James Fergus Black, and they contend that so long as he, James Fergus Black, is alive, or so long as children may be born of him, the realisation of the immovable property and the distribution of the proceeds cannot take place. The main question to be decided is whether the testator intended to benefit all his grandchildren, including those to be born after his death, or whether he meant to confine the distribution to the grandchildren born before his death. The general rule laid down by Voet (28-5-13) as to the probable intention of a testator making a similar disposition would certainly support the view that all grandchildren who may still be born should share in the distribution, but that general rule was not observed by this Court in Bresler v. Kotz's Executors (2 Menz., 444). That case was followed in the case of re Henning (7 Juta, 53), where the testators had bequeathed a sum of money to the children of his daughter when they should attain a certain age, but I guarded myself against being supposed to decide that children born after the death of the testators would be excluded if they were born before one of the children reached the requisite age. In Wentzel v. Brink's Executors (9 Juta, 328), the Court refused to authorise the distribution of an inheritance given to the children of the testator's brothers with the condition that such brothers and their spouses should during their lifetime receive the interest. It was held that, as the brothers were still alive and might possibly procreate children, the portions accruing to the heirs were not yet ascertainable, and could not therefore be distributed. Now if, in the present case, the testator had directed that the distribution is to take place upon the eldest grandchild coming of age, there would have been no doubt that all grandchildren living at the time of such coming of age must share, even though born after the testator's death, and that grandchildren born after such coming of age must be excluded. The direction, however, is that the distribution shall take place upon the youngest grandchild attaining his twenty-first year. The plaintiff's contention is that the youngest grandchild intended by the will is John Richard Black, but if other grandchildren had been born after the testator's death and before John Richard Black attained his twenty-first year they would have been entitled to share in the distribution, which it would again have been necessary to postpone until the youngest of them should attain his twenty-first year. The fact that no grandchildren were born between the date of the testator's death and the coming of age of John Richard Black cannot in any way assist in the construction of the will. In directing the accumulation of the rents and profits and the distribution of the total proceeds on the coming of age of his youngest grandchild, the testator appears to have been influenced by the desire to enrich the surviving members of a class, rather than by personal affection for any individual members of that class. If personal affection had prompted him, he certainly would not have confined the distribution to those grandchildren who should be alive at the date fixed for the distribution. Mrs. Runciman had been born before the testator's death, but under the will her children are clearly excluded from the distribution, whether the date of such distribution be the coming of age of John Richard Black, jun., or of any possible grandchild that may yet be born. Until all the testator's children are dead or reach an age when it will be physically impossible for them to procreate any more children, it is not possible to ascertain who the youngest grandchild is, or what grandchildren are entitled to share in the distribution of the accumulated funds. The plaintiffs contend that on the death of the testator the immovable property became vested in them, and the question was asked: in whom is the dominium, if it is not in the grandchildren? The obvious answer is that the dominium is in the executors of the testator. They are the persons who will have to realise the property and pass transfer thereof, and in the meantime they hold it in trust for those grandchildren, who shall, in due time, be found to be entitled to share in the distribution of the proceeds. An interesting question is raised by Mr. McGregor in his notes to Voet 36, 1, 26, whether under similar circumstances a person shared with the administration of burthened property is a fiduciary or not but that question does not arise for decision in the present case. Our law clearly recognises the capacity of executors and administrators to hold such property in trust for those who, although not yet born, are indicated by a testator as the objects of his bounty. (See 1 Hall, Cons. 98; Voet 28, 5.12 in fine.) Under the terms of the will now in question, the grandchildren acquire no right, transmissible to their heirs, until the youngest of the grandchildren, born or still to be born, shall attain his or her twenty-first year. I am clearly, therefore, of opinion that the defendants are right in their contention that the realisation of the immovable property and the distribution of the proceeds must be postponed until the youngest grandchild of the testator that may still be born shall have attained the requisite age. The costs of this action will be borne by the estate.

His Lordship added that Mr. Justice Hoplev, who also sat in the case, concurred in this judgment.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT V. MUNICIPALITY OF ALIWAL NORTH.

This was an action brought by the Colonial Government against the Municipality of Aliwal North. The case turned upon the question as to whether certain property of the Government at Aliwal North was ratable. One portion of the property was used as a gaol, and the second portion, which was enclosed by a wall, was used as a garden by the gaoler. The Colonial Government sued the Municipality to refund £2 ls. 4d. for rates, and it was agreed to bring the matter before the Supreme Court for a final decision as to whether the vegetable garden was a part of the gaol or not.

Mr. Evans was for the Government, and Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor) was for the Municipality.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

De Villiers, C.J., said the great question was whether the permanent works and improvements had been effected or not. In his opinion, permanent works and improvements had been effected. The walls would be a permanent improvement, the hedge would form part of the improvement, and the vegetable garden to some extent would be an improvement. It had been said that the vegetable garden was not an improvement, because the vegetables exhausted the ground, but he supposed that the ground would be well manured to make up for the exhaustion, and there the clause of the Act relied upon would not exempt the Government. The only question on which there might have been difficulty was whether or not the establishment was a gaol or a convict station. If the special case had been differently worded, a great deal more might have been said in favour of the plaintiff. The meaning of gaol had been clearly defined in the special case, and the tenth clause clinched that by setting out that the second portion might at any time be permanently or temporarily converted to any use for gaol purposes. Clearly there was an implied admission that the uses to which that portion was devoted was not for gaol purposes. He was of opinion that the special case should be recorded in favour of the defendant, and the Court would declare that the Government was liable to be rated for municipal purposes in respect of the second portion, the costs to abide the result.

Hopley, J., concurred.

Articled clerk—Admission.

An articled clerk, who had served over two years and nine months to an attorney of the Supreme Court, who was practising in S. Rhodesia, was allowed to complete his period of service with an attorney at Cape Town.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for an order authorising petitioner to complete articles of clerkship in this colony.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., appeared for the Incorporated Law Society to oppose.

The petition set out that applicant, who had resided at Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia, was on the 20th November, 1901, articled to serve Mr. Alfred Henry MacLeod, an attorney of this court, practising in Southern Rhodesia. He continued his service from the said date until about the 30th June, 1904. Petitioner, being desirous to submit himself as a candidate for the law certificate examination to be held in Cape Town, and in order that he might receive coaching, left Salisbury on the 1st July, 1904. He desired to complete his service under articles in Cape Town with an attorney of this Hon. Court. Mr. A. H. MacLeod was willing to cede the articles of service. Petitioner desired cession of his articles of service to one of the attorneys of this court, in order that he might complete three years' service as required by law.

His Lordship said that he saw a note attached to the papers stating that if the cession were allowed, the Government may be deprived of £10 stamp duty.

Sir H. Juta said that the stamp duty was a subsidiary point. The principal point was that the Law Society would like to have a definite ruling from the Court in view of the Rule of Court No. 149. The 149th Rule required, not only that a clerk must serve within the Colony, but the service must be for the whole period within the Colony. That rule had never been altered or varied, as far as he knew. Counsel called attention to cases where service in another country had been allowed to count. He was informed that there was no precedent for cession of articles. If the service were allowed to count, then fresh articles should be taken out and registered.

Mr. Jones said that the applicant came down here to improve his qualification, and he had already been articulated to an attorney of this Court, though practising in Rhodesia. Counsel relied upon the case of Crawford, where the Court allowed the last year's service to be completed in Rhodesia.

Sir H. Juta contended that there was a fundamental difference between the cases.

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea, Sept. 12th.

Hopkey, J., The petitioner was, on November 20, 1901, duly articulated at Salisbury, Southern Rhodesia, to Mr. Alfred Henry McLeod, an attorney of this Court, and also of the High Court of Southern Rhodesia, to serve him as a clerk in the profession of attorney-at-law and notary public, for a term of three years. The articles were duly registered, and filed in the office of the Registrar of the High Court of Southern Rhodesia, and the petitioner served under the said articles continuously until the 30th of June, 1904, when, being desirous of presenting himself for examination as a candidate for the Law Certificate of the University of the Cape of Good Hope, at the examination to be held in Cape Town in December, 1904, and being further desirous of obtaining in Cape Town tuition to fit him for the said examination, he, with the consent of Mr. Alfred McLeod, removed to Cape Town, where it is stated he has since been continuously serving as a clerk in the office of an attorney of this Court. He now applies that he should be allowed to have his articles ceded by Mr. McLeod, who is willing to do so, to an attorney of this Court in Cape Town, and that his service with Mr. McLeod in Rhodesia should be allowed to count as service in this Colony. The Incorporated Law Society appear to point out that according to the 149th Rule of Court, it is necessary that the articles should be to serve within this Colony, and that the applicant should, during the whole of three years, have continued to be actually employed in such service within this Colony. There is no doubt that the strict reading of the rule in question is against the applicant, but it should be borne in mind that the circumstances of this country have changed in very many and important particulars, since the year 1829, when the rule was promulgated. We are here concerned with a case involving our relations in such matters with Rhodesia, a great British Dependency which was not contemplated in 1829, and which is now governed by the same system of law as obtains in this Colony, the Supreme Court of which exercises appellate jurisdiction over the Courts of that country. Moreover, the practice of the Courts and all the duties of attorneys and notaries are, as far as I am aware, identical in Rhodesia and in this Colony, so that for all practical purposes it is immaterial whether a clerk receives his instruction in the knowledge and practice of the law in that country or in this Colony. The 149th Rule of Court, while it lays down that persons who have been articulated, and who have served as therein laid down, shall be eligible to be admitted and enrolled as attorneys of this Court, does not go further and state that no other mode of service will be approved of by the Court, and that no other persons save those dealt with in that and the immediately succeeding rules shall be eligible. The Court can exercise, and has more than once exercised, its discretion, and upon good cause shown has granted relief in cases where the service under articles has not been in compliance with the strictest interpretation of the original rule. The cases cited during the argument sufficiently show this, and indicate that, while the Court is careful that no person who has not had a proper training and proper legal instruction should be admitted, it exercises an equitable jurisdiction, and does not exclude persons who have in effect complied with all the reasonable requirements of the rule. In the present case, the applicant has served an attorney of this Court. That attorney, it is true, is not carrying on his business in the Colony, but he is practising his profession in exactly the same way, and is guided by the same laws and rules and etiquette as he would have observed in this colony. I am, of course, aware that there are some local laws in Rhodesia which deal with the circumstances of that country; they do not, however, affect the matter which I am considering; but, with regard to the whole system of law in vogue in that country, this Court has an appellate jurisdiction—and, as to any attorney of this Court, though he may be practising there, this Court would have power to strike him off its own rolls for any misconduct sufficiently grave to warrant such punishment, wherever such act of misconduct may have been committed. The petitioner has come from an office of an attorney of this Court, where he has received such instruction as above indicated, directly to an office of another attorney of this Court in Cape Town, where he seeks to be allowed to serve without suffering any loss of time by reason of his service in Rhodesia. His petition should, in a large measure, be acceded to, and it would be difficult to refuse it, after such cases as in re Crawford (15 S.C., 105) and in re Rothman (13 C.T.L.R., 276). He served Mr. McLeod until the 30th June, 1904, and the service in this colony should extend until the 30th June, 1905. The Law Society also brought to the notice of the Court the fact that by Act 27, 1883, section 14, the articles should be registered within three months with the Council of the society. It is, however, obvious that in cases such as the present it would be impossible, with any sense of fairness, to insist on such registration as a sine qua non. Due and proper registration of petitioner's articles was made with the Registrar of the High Court of Southern Rhodesia, which is all that was required of him in that country, and it seems to me that if he is allowed to transfer his articles or enter into new ones here under the special circumstances of his case, he should be allowed to register his articles forthwith upon payment of the necessary fee. It was also pointed out that there was no precedent for cession of articles as it is here prayed may be allowed, and my attention was drawn to the fact that upon original articles there is a stamp duty of £10, of which in this case the Government would on a mere cession be deprived. I think difficulties might arise from allowing a cession, and, on the whole, am of opinion that there should be fresh articles. The order of the Court therefore is that petitioner be allowed forthwith to enter into articles of apprenticeship with an attorney of this Court, to serve him until the 30th of June, 1905, that such articles be duly stamped and registered as required by the laws of this colony, and that his time of service with Mr. McLeod in Rhodesia be allowed to count as service in this colony. I may add that I think that the Law Society was perfectly right in appearing to point out the difficulties of the case, and I personally am of opinion that it would be wise to alter the Rules of Court dealing with such matters, so as to meet the requirements of the present time, and of the altered conditions of this colony and of the other States of South Africa.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Moore and Son.]

Ex parte CHANNER AND OTHERS.

Mr. Close moved for an order under the Companies Act of 1892, authorising the alteration of memorandum of association of a limited liability company of this name, known as the Swimming Bath Company, so as to give the company extended powers in regard to the buying and selling of land, and so forth. The company was registered with a capital of £700 in £1 shares, and the present application had the consent of the shareholders.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte SEALE.

Mr. Close moved on behalf of petitioner, as representing his minor son Manning Seale, for leave to execute a mortgage bond for £200 upon certain property that petitioner had built for him, on which he had borrowed £125. It would require £50 more to complete the property, and petitioner could not afford to pay this. The Master's report was unfavourable. He stated that he was not convinced that the undertaking was really in the interests of the minor. Counsel contended that the objections raised by the Master would, if regarded as sufficient, prevent fathers from helping their sons by advances.

Order granted, Hopley, J., in giving judgment, stating that the money raised should be distributed through the Master.

Ex parte BOTHMAN.

Mr. Russell moved for authority to the Registrar of Deeds to pass transfer of certain land at Victoria West, which petitioner had purchased at public auction in an estate of which he was executor dativo.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte STABLEFORD AND CO., LTD.

Mr. McGregor (in the absence of his leader, Mr. Schreiner, K.C.) stated that the report of the liquidators had been brought before the Court and ordered to lie for inspection. That order had been complied with, and counsel now moved for confirmation of the report, and the directions of Court thereunder. It was suggested by the liquidators that a Commission should be appointed to take the evidence of Wm. Stableford (director) and W. L. Kidney, and hold an inquiry into the whole of the company's transactions. Application was made in terms of sections 154, 173, and 177, of the Companies' Act of 1892.

Hopley, J., asked if the liquidators alleged that there had been fraud.

Mr. McGregor replied that he would not say that exactly, but the liquidators urged that there were certain matters which required investigation, and especially in relation to the cession of a certain bond.

The report was confirmed, and an order granted appointing Mr. Advocate W. P. Buchanan to be commissioner to take evidence under the Companies Act; with regard to any persons named, or matters raised, or dealt with in the report, with all the powers set out in section 177 of the said Act, the examination to be returned or reported on the 15th October, with leave to apply for an extension.

Ex parte FULLER.

Mr. Upington moved, on behalf of petitioner (who is the surviving spouse and executrix testamentary of the late John Fuller), for leave to sell two farm properties for £2,000, investing the proceeds on first mortgage of landed property. Two minors were interested in the properties, which produced £120 a year. The major heirs consented. The will left the property to the heirs, share and share alike. The Master, in his report, pointed out that the will provided for the non-alienation of the landed property. He declined to make a recommendation, but said that, in case the Court granted an order, it was desirable to see that the money was properly invested on behalf of the estate. Counsel said that he thought the Master was not quite accurate in his references to the will.

Hopley, J. (after reading over the will) said that he thought the Master was not justified in saying that the will contained an emphatic declaration against the alienation of the estate.

Ordered to stand over for further information as to proposed purchasers, whether rental of £120 is net or gross, and so forth.

Ex parte COLLISON, LIMITED.

Mr. P. Jones moved for leave to amend a certain bond granted by W. H. Courtney, of East London, in respect of a mortgage for £1,000, upon land at Cambridge. In the bond petitioners were described as H. C. Collison and Co., Ltd., instead of Henry C. Collison, Limited.

Order granted as prayed.

MZUBELO AND OTHERS V. NDABA AND OTHERS.

Mr. Upington said that he appeared for the plaintiffs to apply for leave to have the plaintiffs and their witnesses examined de bene esse, at Matatiele, East Griqualand. The defendants consented, subject to the extension of the commission to the defendants, and their witnesses. To this condition plaintiff consented.

Application granted, the R.M., or, failing him, the A.R.M., of Matatiele, to act as commissioner, costs to be costs in the cause.

BOTHA V. BOTHA.

Mr. Close, on behalf of the plaintiff, Mrs. Katherina Botha, applied, upon notice of motion, for an order requiring the respondent, Anthony Botha, a retired farmer, to pay the plaintiff £50 to enable her to institute an action for judicial separation by reason of his cruelty and ill-treatment, and also to pay her £15 a month by way of alimony pending such action. The petitioner stated that the defendant had frequently ill-treated her, and had threatened to shoot her. Some time ago she instituted proceedings in the Court of the R.M. of Worcester, and the defendant was then ordered to keep the peace for three months. She was married to the defendant in Cape Town in July, 1902, out of community of property. The defendant was the owner of property in several places. Deponent had two children by her former marriage.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for the respondent) read an affidavit, in which he (respondent) stated that the petitioner was a professional nurse, and was formerly the wife of a seafaring man. He denied the charges of ill-treatment, and said that his wife had threatened to shoot him. He questioned the legality of the proceedings before the Resident Magistrate of Worcester. The children were at liberty to come and live with him as before. He also alleged that the plaintiff had frequently been drunk, and that she had said that she had a better and a younger husband to go to. Her daughter had assaulted deponent, striking him with a whip on the head. Counsel added that the irritating cause seemed to be one Karl Bender. A further affidavit was read, in which it was stated that the applicant on one occasion went into the Alexander Hotel. She was drunk, and Karl Bender's arm was round her waist. Other deponents spoke to having seen the applicant in a state of drunkenness, one occasion being when she had fallen into the water furrow.

Mr. Close read the replying affidavit of the plaintiff, in which she denied the allegations of drunkenness. On various occasions the respondent violently ill-treated her in the presence of her daughter. The respondent was in the habit of giving her medicine which was drugged, the ingredients of which he obtained from a Malay. She denied that her daughter and herself assaulted the respondent.

Mrs. Bender deposed that, while she had seen the respondent drunk on several occasions, she had never seen the applicant under the influence of drink. Deponent cut him several times with a whip when the respondent tried to force an entrance to her house. A sergeant of police, on a complaint from the applicant, visited the respondent's house, and testified in an affidavit that he was under the influence of drink.

[Hopley, J.: Does the respondent want this woman as his wife?]

Sir H. Juta: The so-called offer is a mere sham, my lord.

[Hopley, J.: It is quite possible she would merely get her kitchen.]

Mr. Close urged that she should get such maintenance as would be suitable to her station of life.

[Hopley, J.: She may get nothing very great. Isn't it better these parties should come to some sort of arrangement?]

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Hopley, J., said it was quite clear the parties had got to such a stage of existence as to render married life unbearable, and in all probability the whole of their matrimonial relations would have to come before the Court. It had been urged that the applicant should get no relief, because she happened to be married by ante-nuptial contract, but he thought the policy of the Court was not so much whose money it was, as the fact that the marriage relations had to be inquired into. Under the circumstances of the present case, he thought the money should be paid by the one spouse who was able to do so, in order that the whole thing might be fairly inquired into. It had been said that this woman had not made out a prima facie case; but while he was not prepared to say now whether her case was a good one or not, it was perfectly clear the parties had reached a stage which made it impossible for them to live together. So far as she was concerned, there was the prima facie fact that she had left a comfortable home for some reason or other, and had taken her two daughters away, and was apparently living on charity. He thought £30 would be a fair sum to allow her to enable her to carry on this suit. On the question of alimony, he did not want to say that in no case would he be inclined to order some sort of money, but in the present case the date at which the whole matter would be settled was so near that there was no real necessity for it. The costs of the application would abide the result.

GLUCK V. NATHAN.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Ordered to stand over pending proof of service on the defendant.

Subsequently, an affidavit of service was put in, and an order was granted as prayed.

PEDERSEN V. MCKAY.

Bond—Interest—Pactum de non petendo.

Mr. Lewis moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,000, with interest, the bond having become due by reason of non-payment of interest.

Mr. Gardiner (for the defendant) read an affidavit, to the effect that a little before expiration of the notice it was agreed that the notice should be cancelled, and that he should give a promissory note for £300. The reason why the interest was not paid was that he intended to pay £700 balance on the bond, and had been trying to make arrangements to that end. No further demand was made before summons was issued.

Mr. Lewis read a replying affidavit by the plaintiff's attorney.

Mr. Gardiner submitted that his client was entitled to judgment, inasmuch as there had been no demand for interest before issue of summons.

[Hopley, J.: What is your excuse, Mr. Gardiner, for not paying interest for June? Were you trying to make arrangements?]

We forgot it, my lord.

Mr. Lewis submitted that the plaintiff was not required to give notice in regard to the interest. There was a specific sum due on a specific date, and there was no need to make demand. They had actually made demand on defendant for immediate payment of the bond and interest.

Hopley, J., said the plaintiff claimed judgment on a mortgage bond for £1,000, by reason of the non-payment of interest. It would appear that interest had not been paid since the 31st December last. On the 29th March there was a letter written to the defendant giving him three months' notice that he would be required to pay the bond, calling up the bond as he had, according to its terms, a perfect right to do if he chose. After that date, and some time in June of the same year, an arrangement was come to whereby the defendant gave £300 as part payment of the bond, and this notice given on the 29th March was considered to be entirely cancelled. In that state of affairs matters stood, and then the defendant said he forgot the matter of the interest, while he was trying, as he said, to raise the remaining £700 to pay off the whole of the bond. Then, all of a sudden, on the 5th September, the defendant got a letter, which the plaintiff now relies upon as being a letter of demand. In this letter he called upon the defendant for payment of the amount of the bond and interest, and stated that, unless such payment be made by ten o'clock on the Wednesday morning, summons would be issued. If that letter meant anything at all, it meant this, in spite of the arrangement in June the plaintiff was going to enforce the three months' notice, which was given on the 29th March. So matters stood, and the next thing the plaintiff did was to issue summons founded upon non-payment of interest on this bond. Well, the interest had not been paid, but certainly there had never been a demand made upon the defendant on that ground. He made next day a satisfactory tender, which plaintiff admitted to be a satisfactory tender, but he tendered no costs, and the whole matter was really reduced to this small issue, whether he ought or ought not to have tendered costs. He thought the defendant was right on the principle laid down in the cases which Van Zyl referred to. From the paragraph which he had read, it seemed to him that there ought to be in such circumstances a letter of demand by the creditor to the debtor laying before him what he wanted before he issued his summons. Provisional sentence would be granted for £700, but plaintiff must pay the costs.

NETHERLANDS BANK V. RUSSELL.

Mr. Roux moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £150, with interest and costs of suit.

Order granted.

BOESEN V. DAY.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan was for the plaintiff, and Mr. Gardiner for the defendant. Mr. Buchanan asked for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent. Postponements had been granted from 14th July until 11th August and 25th August, and then again until to-day, and nothing had yet been received by the plaintiff.

Mr. Gardiner said that the defendant had not yet obtained the money from the sale of her property. The delay was caused through the survey, and an affidavit to that effect was put in from Mr. Surveyor Maskew. It was anticipated that the plaintiff would get his money by the first day of next term.

The matter was ordered to stand over until October 15, on condition that the money paid by the purchasers pass through the hands of the attorneys, at all events, a sufficient portion of it, on the undertaking they will immediately pay it over to the plaintiff, the plaintiff on his side undertaking he will consent to the provisional order being withdrawn, so that transfer can be passed, costs to be arranged as in the previous order.

GOTZE V. BERGH.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan (for the plaintiff) moved for provisional judgment on two promissory notes for £150 and £100.

Mr. Gardiner appeared on behalf of the defendant, and said that pleadings had been filed in the principal case for a larger portion of the amounts of the original promissory note.

Hopley, J., said it seemed to him that the affidavits disclosed such a conflict of evidence between the parties, and there seemed to be so much complication in the business, which might be capable of simple explanation when the case came to trial, and so much renewing of documents, settling of scrip and so on, that he did not think the case came under the category of an ordinary liquid document. That view was strengthened by the fact that there was already a principal case, in which practically the same claims were made and the same defence set up. He thought the proper course would be to order the parties to go into the principal case, and the pleadings could be filed in time to allow of the consolidation of the two cases. An order would be made accordingly, costs to abide the result.

STEYN AND SERRURIER V. TAAHAR AND SOWKER.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for provisional sentence on a Magistrate's

C 2

Court judgment for £60 and costs, and for an order declaring certain property executable.

Granted.

RABOLINI V. NEWMAN.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence upon certain IOU's signed by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff for £53, with interest a tempore morae and costs of suit.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for defendant, and read an affidavit made by defendant, who stated that the plaintiff was in his employ, and allowed certain persons to wrongfully seize some machines belonging to him. He complained that he had sustained damages by reason of the wrongful acts of the plaintiff, and stated that he was about to institute proceedings to recover damages.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan read an affidavit made by plaintiff's attorneys, to which was attached a letter from the defendant to plaintiff, in which he appealed for time to pay.

Mr. Gardiner asked that there should be a stay of execution pending action to be brought by defendant.

Provisional sentence was granted as prayed, with costs.

FRIEDMAN BROTHERS V. MORRISON.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for a final order of sequestration, defendant, it being alleged, having committed an act of insolvency, in that he had clandestinely left the Colony with intent to defeat or delay his creditors. A provisional order was granted on August 11.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for the defendant.

Affidavits were read on behalf of the applicants, stating that defendant had sold property in Cape Town, and had gone to Natal with the object, applicants believed, of defeating or delaying creditors.

Mr. Gardiner said the defendant had only gone away temporarily, and was expected back at the end of the month. He suggested that there should be a postponement until defendant's evidence could be taken.

Mr. Buchanan consented, and the case was ordered to stand over until October 1.

STEPHAN BROS. V. MYERS.

Mr. Roux moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £200, with interest and costs.

Granted.

ESTATE MARAIS V. BAUERMEESTER.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £318 on a promissory note.

Granted.

Estate Goldschmidt v. Petronella

ESTATE GOLDSCHMIDT V. DAY.

Mr. Rainsford appeared for the plaintiff.

Mr. Gardiner (for the defendant) pointed out that a provisional order of sequestration had been granted against the defendant before date of summons.

Provisional sentence was refused, with costs, His Lordship stating that the manner of proceeding had been entirely misconceived.

WARD V. HONIKMAN.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £500, with interest from the due date and costs.

Granted.

KANTEROWITZ V. STRANACK.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan applied for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £200, with interest and costs, and for hypothecated property to be declared executable.

Granted.

ESTATE FINCHAM V. CHRISTIE.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for provisional sentence for the sum of £1,100 on a certain promissory note, dated the 8th October, 1901, and due on the 8th October, 1902.

Mr. Rainsford appeared for the defendant.

Mr. Jones put in the promissory note, to which was attached a written statement by defendant that in case of his illness or such other event a certain draft in his favour, payable at the Standard Bank, should be paid to Magdalena Fincham, now deceased, on behalf of whose estate the present claim was made.

Mr. Rainsford read an affidavit made by the defendant, in which he stated that the money was given to him by the late Mrs. Fincham in consideration of services he had rendered on her behalf, and the promissory note was signed because Mrs. Fincham was desirous that her relatives should be kept in ignorance of the gift. The promissory note was only intended as a blind to her relatives. A corroborative affidavit was made by one Pierpont.

On behalf of the applicant, affidavits were read, to the effect that the deceased woman had stated to the deponents that the sum had been advanced as a loan, and the attorneys for the plaintiff stated that defendant had offered them to pay the debt, if time were allowed him.

After hearing Mr. Rainsford in argument, the Court granted provisional sentence.

Hopley, J., said the defence was not one which commended itself to him. It was more likely that the document represented the real state of affairs, and that this was a loan by a good-natured woman to a man whom she thought she was setting on his feet. Possibly defendant might, in the principal case, be able to establish his defence, but his task would be an uphill one. Provisional sentence would be granted, with costs, unless the defendant went into the principal case forthwith, in which case costs would abide the result.

SCHWALBE V. SMITH.

Mr. Roux moved for provisional sentence for £56 15s., on a mortgage bond, with interest and costs.

Provisional sentence was granted, the specially hypothecated property being declared executable.

COWLEY V. LEWIS AND GRIFFITHS.

Mr. Roux moved for judgment against the first defendant (Lewis) for £20, on a promissory note, with interest and costs.

Granted.

VON HOLDT V. MARTIN.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence on certain conditions of sale for £17.

Defendant said he owed the money, but was not able to pay it. His goods had been sold, and he was out of work.

Hopley, J., said defendant would have to see plaintiff and endeavour to make the best arrangement he could. Provisional sentence would be granted, with costs.

SMALBERGER V. KELLER. (1904. Sept. 12th.)

Provisional sentence—Renunciation of benefits by woman.

Where the Court was not satisfied that the legal effects of renunciation of benefits had been duly explained to a woman who had signed a promissory note as a co-principal debtor, provisional sentence was refused.

Mr. McGregor moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note made by one Muller, and signed by defendant as surety and co-principal debtor for £925, with interest and costs.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan, for the defendant, read an affidavit by defendant, in which she stated that she was induced by plaintiff to sign the note. She appended her signature, and the note was an accommodation to plaintiff and Muller, in order to enable them to raise money at the bank. Subsequently, she wrote to the bank repudiating her liability, but ere that the promissory note had been taken up by the plaintiff. She referred the Court to the ante-nuptial contract between herself and her husband, by which the marital power of the latter was not wholly excluded. She was married out of community.

Plaintiff deposed on affidavit that the promissory note was given in respect of the balance of the purchase price of certain property purchased from him by Muller. The terms of the promissory note were explained to the defendant, and she was told that she would be liable for the amount if the note was not redeemed by Muller.

Hopley, J., said it seemed to him the case should not be dealt with in provisional form. The application alleged that defendant was surety and joint principal debtor for a certain promissory note for £925. One Muller, who is the present defendant's son-in-law, made a promissory note in favour of one Smalberger for the sum of £925 for a debt, due by Muller to Smalberger. Apparently, these two relations of the old lady, in order to settle this matter to their own satisfaction, got her, in the absence of her husband, to sign the document. The matter seemed to have been carefully considered by these two, and they seemed to have got a lawyer to draw up a document, which was to bind Mrs. Keller. The lawyer explained the meaning of the renunciation of the exceptions to these two gentlemen, and left it to them to explain the meaning to Mrs. Keller. It was extremely improbable that these two people would have been able to explain Mrs. Keller's position to her, and the chances were that it was only generally explained. He felt that the proper course was to refuse the provisional sentence, costs to abide the result of the principal case.

GENERAL MOTION.

HARKSON V. HARKSON.

Mr. Russell moved, as a matter of urgency, for leave to sue the defendant by edictal citation for a decree of divorce, and for an order for the custody of certain children. The parties were married in Norway, in 1890, and there were two children of the marriage, a girl and a boy, aged 11 and 9 years respectively. Between April and August, 1904, the plaintiff had cause to remonstrate with his wife about her undue familiarity with a boarder in the house, named Fordham, and she proposed that she should go to England to reside for a term, and take the two children with her for the purpose of putting them to school. He had since learned that Fordham and his wife were living together at Hove, Brighton.

Hopley, J., said he did not see what use it would be making an order as to the custody of the children.

Mr. Russell: She might return to this colony.

Hopley, J.: Then you can move the Court again. There seems very little likelihood of her coming back. Leave will be granted to sue by edict, the process to be served personally, returnable November 3, with leave to serve intendent with notice of trial.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

ADMISSION.

{ 1904.
{ Sept. 13th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the admission of Nicolaas Lambrechts Schounberg, as an attorney, notary, conveyancer, and sworn translator.

Application granted, and oath administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

LINDENBERG AND DE VILLIERS V. WESNER.

Mr. Close moved for provisional sentence upon a promissory note for £36. Order granted.

DEMPERS AND VAN RYNEVELD V. STRYDOM.

Dr. Greer moved for provisional sentence upon a mortgage bond for £350, with interest and costs of suit, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest; counsel also asked for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

MCKAY V. MAHOMET.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., moved for provisional sentence on a lease for £160, rent due, for which lease the defendant signed as surety and co-principal debtor.

Mr. Burton (for the defendant) read an affidavit, in which the latter said that the plaintiff had failed to observe the conditions of the covenant. He had not given the lessee full, free, undisturbed use and occupation of the premises, and had not kept the said premises in good repair. The lessee had suffered damage to the amount of £500, for the recovery of which proceedings had been instituted by deponent in this court. The premises had been occupied by sub-tenants, and several of these had left on account of the want of repair of the premises. Deponent attached a report on an inspection of 172, 174, and 176, Long-street, prepared by Mr. Simkins, architect, who said that the present roof was beyond repair. The lessee had not had beneficial occupation of the premises.

Sir H. Juta read a replying affidavit by the plaintiff, who denied any neglect to repair the buildings, after notice had been given to him. He denied that he was liable in any damages for loss of tenants. He was not aware of any sub-tenant having left by reason of the condition of the premises.

Mr. Burton submitted that, in view of the circumstances, provisional sentence should not be granted at the present stage.

Buchanan, J.: One Osman was the lessee of certain premises under a deed of lease, and to this deed of lease the present defendant had joined himself as surety and co-principal debtor. The action has not been brought under this lease, judgment has been given against him, and a return of nulla bona has been issued. The surety now wishes to set up a claim of damages, not which he had, but which Osman had. There is no valid defence to this action. Judgment has been given for a liquidated demand, and the defence is an unliquidated claim for damages. Provisional sentence will be granted as prayed.

LATEGAN V. HOHN AND MAUSER.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment for £65, and costs.

The defendant Hohn appeared, and said that he was unable to pay at present. He was prepared to offer £1 a month. He was at present out of work.

Cross-examined: He had a lease with Mr. Lategan for ground for brick making. He could not use the clay.

Decree of civil imprisonment granted against both defendants, execution to be suspended as to Hohn on payment of £1 a month, first payment to be made on the 1st October, with leave to plaintiff to apply for an increased order.

FRIEDMAN V. SHAPIRO.

Mr. P. Jones moved for provisional sentence on a certain lease for £64, being two months rent for July and August, and also for costs.

Mr. Burton (for the defendant) said that it was desirable to hear this case in conjunction with a matter standing on the motion roll. The motion was for an order compelling Friedman to pay certain costs.

Mr. P. Jones said that he had not been retained in the other matter.

Buchanan, J., said that the matters would be heard together.

Mr. Burton read an affidavit by the defendant, who said that he had a good defence to the action. On the 4th July he paid the rent of 23 and 25, Primrose-street, to Michael Friedman, by setting off £30 due from plaintiff to himself as rent of certain property at the Paarl. He had given the plaintiff a cheque for £4 in settlement of the balance and a debt of £2. He had a set-off against the August rent claimed in the summons by way of taxed bill of costs, amounting to £16 14s. 10d., being costs of action and certain costs incurred by him in respect of a rule nisi obtained by the Churchwardens of St. Saviour's, Claremont. He verily believed that the costs would amount to more than the difference between £16 14s. 10d. and the balance of the August rent.

Mr. Jones read a replying affidavit by Michael Friedman, who denied that the defendant had any set-off, and said that the premises at the Paarl were let, not to himself, but to his reputed wife. He should oppose any action to compel him to pay costs of previous litigation. He added that he had given his power of attorney to Mr. Harry Handa, as representing the wardens of St. Saviour's Church who held a bond against Friedman.

Judgment for £64, less £16 14s. 10d., paid on account, with costs.

DEMPERS, MOORE AND CO. V. FRIEDGOOD.

Mr. Du Toit moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £800, with 6 per cent. interest, and that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable. The bond had become payable on the stipulated three months' notice.

Order granted, subject to the attorney producing an affidavit that notice had been duly served.

DE WET V. DUSSEAU.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence on a certain acknowledgment of debt for £100, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the 17th June, 1904.

Granted.

HOLDENSON AND NEILSON V. MCKENZIE AND CO.

Mr. McGregor moved for provisional judgment on a certain bill of exchange for £803 15s., with interest and costs.

Granted.

NANNELLY V. DARIA AND CO.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendants' estate as insolvent.

Granted.

SKEAD V. TWINE.

Mr. P. Jones moved for provisional sentence for an amount of interest, £71 10s., due on a bond, less £20 paid on account.

Granted.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

CORONATION FREEHOLD { 1904.
ESTATE CO. V. SABER. { Sept. 13th.

WEINTROB AND CO. V. PHILIP AND VOEBEE.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £18 7s. 6d., goods sold and delivered, with interest and costs.
Granted.

DART V. WEINTROB AND CO.

Mr. Russell moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £949 18s., goods sold, including clearance charges.

Louis Salawichi, one of the partners, said that he only received the summons last Saturday, and, if his Lordship would grant a postponement, he could produce a good defence. He understood from Dart that he would not proceed with the case.

The case was ordered to stand over until to-morrow morning, when the defendants will have an opportunity of entering an appearance.

REHABILITATION.

Mr. Russell moved for the rehabilitation of Rowland Ellis Collins. The estate was sequestrated on March, 1898. The assets amounted to £2,861 13s. 3d., and the liabilities £3,660, leaving a deficiency of £798. The claims proved were £3,817 and the assets £1,818, leaving a deficiency of £2,999. There was nothing unfavourable in the trustee's report.
Granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

DARTER V. DARTER. { 1904.
 { Sept. 13th.

Mr. Close moved for leave to sue the respondent by edictal citation for moneys advanced on bonds. The parties were married out of community of property, and the defendant was last heard of in London. He had deserted his wife.

Leave granted, personal service, failing which, substituted service, as before, with leave to serve the notice of trial and intendit at the same time.

STEER V. CHETTY.

Mr. Russell moved for an extension of the return day and for substituted service. The plaintiff had been informed that personal service could not be effected.

Return day extended until 15th October, and service to be substituted by a publication once in "Star" and the "Gazette."

Ex parte POUCHER.

Mr. Burton moved for leave to sell certain property belonging to certain minors. The matter had previously been ordered to stand over for notice to the parties interested. The Master's report was favourable and all the major heirs agreed to the application. Granted.

LOTTER V. BOTHA.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for an award of arbitrators to be made a rule of Court.

Respondent was not represented, but he sent a letter, in which he raised certain objections, the principal one being that his arbitrator was absent from the arbitration proceedings.

Mr. Van Zyl said that during part of the time the respondent's arbitrator was absent through illness, and the award was made by the other arbitrator and the umpire appointed by the two arbitrators.

Buchanan, J., said the award seemed to have been made by one arbitrator.

Mr. Van Zyl submitted that this was a proper proceeding under the Act, the defendant's arbitrator having had due notice of the arbitration proceedings.

Buchanan, J., said counsel had better produce authorities in support of the contention that the award was a good one in law. The matter would be ordered to stand over.

Ex parte TROSKIE AND TROSKIE.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for leave to sell certain property in which minors were interested. All the major heirs consented, and the Master recommended that the application be granted. The petitioners were the executors in the estate.

Granted.

Ex parte VENTER AND OTHERS.

Mr. Burton moved for an order directing the transfer of certain property. The application was made by executors on behalf of three minors, to whom a bequest of the property was made by the late H. C. H. Venter. It appeared that previous to the bequest the testator had made a declaration of sale of property to five minors. Subsequently the testator instituted a successful action for divorce against his wife, who admitted that she had been guilty of adultery, and that two children of the five were children of the person with whom she had been guilty of misconduct. Thereupon the testator revoked the sale or donation, and executed a will, in which he bequeathed the property to the three minors on behalf of whom application was made to have the property transferred to them, in accordance with the directions of the will. The Registrar withheld authority to pass transfer, pending the decision of the Court on the matter. The question at issue was whether the sale could be revoked.

Buchanan, J., suggested that the better course would be to institute proceedings to set aside the sale, and to have the rights of the parties declared under the will.

Mr. Burton said he agreed that that would be the better course. Of course, the two children interested in the sale or donation were not now represented.

Buchanan, J., said the executors had better move in the matter by way of an action to have the sale declared invalid. The Court would direct the executors to bring a declaratory action joining all parties interested, and especially the two children disinherited, assisted by their mother as natural guardian and curator ad litem.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

Ex parte DE KLERK. { 1904.
Sept. 13th.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for an order as to a certain cession of articles of clerkship. Counsel stated that the original deed of cession had been lost. It was asked that leave be given for a copy to be filed as the original.

The application was granted.

GREEN V. THERON.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for an award of arbitrators to be made a rule of Court.

There was no appearance on behalf of the respondent, and the application was granted.

Ex parte VAN DIJK.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the Master to accept certain documents. The circumstances were that one Christoffel Johannes van Dijk, jun., disappeared, and was believed to have been drowned. It was stated on affidavit that C. J. van Dijk, jun., left his father's house on the 10th May, 1894. He was tracked by his spoor for a distance of twelve miles to the coast, his footprints ending near some rocks. Nothing had been heard or seen of him since, and it was believed that he was dead. It was asked that the Registrar be authorised to assume his death, and to call a meeting to appoint an executor dative in the estate.

Hopley, J.: It seems a curious thing that a farmer should walk twelve miles in circumstances like these. It may have been a case of suicide.

Mr. Buchanan: Yes, my lord, that may be so.

An order was granted, authorising the Master to assume the death of C. J. van Dijk, jun., as on the 10th May, 1894.

Ex parte AGENBERG AND OTHERS.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved, on behalf of the petitioners, the executors in the estate of Petrus Johannes Agenberg, for leave to transfer certain property in the estate to petitioners. The property had been purchased by applicants at an auction sale for £15, which was stated to be a fair value.

Granted.

Ex parte GESWINT.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for leave to effect an exchange of certain properties. Petitioner applied in his capacity as guardian of a minor, and it was stated that the exchange would be advantageous to his ward. The Master's report was favourable.

An order was granted as prayed.

Ex parte ANNEAR.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for leave to sell certain property. The petitioner was curator to the minor heirs of the late Pieter Kruger, of Somerset East, to whom the property in question belonged. The Master's report was favourable.

The order was granted.

NANGLE V. CROUS.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order compelling respondent to sign certain documents in connection with a life insurance policy given to plaintiff (Dr. Nangle, of East London), as security for repayment of a sum of £50 advanced on a promissory note, for which sum judgment had been obtained against Crous. Respondent now declined to sign the necessary documents to procure the surrender value of the policy.

A rule nisi was granted, returnable on October 15.

Ex parte HODGSON.

Mr. Close moved for leave to raise certain money on mortgage.

Granted.

Ex parte VAN SCHALKWYK.

Dr. Greer moved for a release from civil imprisonment.

Granted.

INGRAM V. INGRAM.

Mr. Rowson moved for leave to serve the intendit and notice of trial in this case by edictal citation.

Granted.

Ex parte BERDIEN.

Mr. Roux moved for an order confirming the sale of certain property in which minors were interested. The Master's report was favourable.

Granted.

Ex parte DEVENISH AND ANOTHER.

Mr. P. Jones moved for the cancellation of a certain mortgage bond.

Order granted, calling on all persons concerned to show cause by the first day next term why the Registrar of Deeds should not be authorised to cancel the said mortgage bond.

Ex parte PATERSON AND ANOTHER.

Mr. D. Buchanan, on behalf of petitioners, asked for leave to raise £1,625 by mortgage bond on property in the estate of the late Henry Paterson, builder and contractor, Cape Town. Certain minor heirs were interested in the estate. The Master's report was favourable.

Granted.

Ex parte VAN DER WALT.

Mr. W. P. Schreiner moved for leave to sell a certain farm in the Middelburg district on the estate of her late husband. Certain minors' interests were involved and the Master's report was not adverse.

The order was granted.

REVIEW CASE.

Ex parte BOWERS.

Debtor—Civil imprisonment.

Hopley, J.: stated that a matter, which appeared to be of some urgency, had come before Mr. Justice Buchanan in chambers. A petition had been presented from the Paarl prison from a man named Bowers, who was imprisoned there as a civil debtor. It appeared that, subsequent to his being imprisoned, his estate was surrendered and accepted as insolvent. He was still in prison, and made this petition for an order giving him discharge from prison. The matter was of some urgency, as a meeting in his insolvent estate was to be held to-morrow, and it was desirable that he should be present. The Court would make an order for his release, and the Registrar would see that it was telegraphed down to the Paarl.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

ILLIQUID ROLL.

MURRAY AND STEWART V. J 1904.
RAMAGE. 1 Sept. 14th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for judgment in terms of the declaration. The matter had been standing over for production of proof of service of the declaration, and counsel now stated that an affidavit had been filed.

Order granted.

DART V. WEINTROB AND CO.

Mr. Russell said that this was an application under Rule 329d, and was standing over for information as to whether the defendants had entered appearance.

Buchanan, J., said he was informed that the defendants had entered appearance. Plaintiff would be allowed costs of the application on account of the defendants' delay in entering appearance, but there would be no judgment.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

BHODES V. RHODES AND ANOTHER.

Mr. P. Jones moved, as a matter of urgency, for leave to sue by edictal citation for divorce. The petitioner was James Joseph George Rhodes, and he claimed a divorce from his wife, Amy Rhodes, by reason of her alleged adultery with one Henry James Bowen. It was alleged that the defendants were living as man and wife at Hobart, Tasmania, whence they had gone from this colony as Mr. and Mrs. H. J. Bowen. Petitioner was married to his wife in Graham's Town under an antenuptial contract.

Leave to sue by edictal citation granted, citation to be served personally, and to be returnable on the 15th December, with leave to serve intendent and notice of trial at the same time.

CARR AND CO. V. LEENDERS AND CO.

Mr. Gardiner moved for the appointment of a commission to take certain evidence in London, England.

Application granted.

Ex parte POOLOS.

This was an application for the release of certain shop premises in Sir Lowry-road, Cape Town, and Lower Main-road, Salt River, from an order of attachment. Mr. Burton was for the petitioner; Sir H. Juta, K.C., was for the respondent.

From the affidavits read by counsel, it appeared that one Atha Caralis had carried on business as a fruiterer at 219, Sir Lowry-road, Cape Town, and 47, Lower Main-road, Salt River. On the petition of certain creditors, his estate had been sequestered and the insolvent had disappeared. One of the grounds of the petition in insolvency was that the debtor had sold certain of the assets in the estate with a view of defeating his creditors. Mr. A. N. Foot, who was the curator bonis in the estate, had caused the two shops to be placed under attachment by the Messenger of the Supreme Court, and certain of the stock was being removed in consequence of one of the shops having been broken into. The petitioner Poolos said that he bought the stock from Caralis, and had been carrying on business at both shops at his own risk and profit. He denied that there had been any collusive arrangement between himself and Caralis, and said that he made the purchase in the ordinary way of trade. One of the creditors, representing Sturk and Co., declared that an injustice would be done to the creditors if the application were granted. The object of the petitioner was to have the shops released from attachment pending an action to be brought.

After hearing Mr. Burton, on the facts,

Buchanan, J., said that in this matter there was a distinct allegation of fraud, and the circumstances were such upon which the allegation was based as to induce the Court to act with the greatest caution. In justice to all parties, he thought he should give an order setting aside the order of attachment, upon the applicant giving security to the approval of the Master in £150 on the stock and £50 for costs of action, to be brought by the trustee in the insolvent estate of Cralis, costs to be costs in the cause.

PEACOCKE AND OTHERS V. { 1904.
BAILEY ; FRIEDMAN V. { Sept. 14th.
ODENDAAL.

Jury—Act 23 of 1891—Removal of trial.

Where a trial by jury in a civil case has been demanded by either party, it is not competent for the Supreme Court to remove the case to trial on Circuit, and thus deprive litigants of their rights under Act 23 of 1891.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the applicants), said that it would probably be a convenience if both matters, which involved identical points, were heard together. The question was as to removal of trial. Sir H. Juta, K.C., was for the respondent in the first matter, the Hon. Thos. Bailey, of Queen's Town; Mr. McGregor was for the respondent in the second matter. The applications, it was stated, were brought under the Jury Act (No. 29 of 1891).

In the first matter, the petitioner sought to have the trial removed to the Circuit Court, to be held at Queen's Town shortly, the ground of the application being that all the parties resided at Queen's Town, and that it would be a convenience to all concerned if the trial were removed there. The action related to certain defamatory words alleged to have been uttered by the defendant reflecting on the integrity of the plaintiff firm.

For the respondent, an affidavit, sworn by his town attorneys, was read, objecting to the removal of the trial on the ground that he would be prejudiced in his defence if the case were heard before a jury summoned in Queen's Town. He did not admit that the plaintiffs had any right to have the case heard before a jury in the Circuit Court.

In the second matter, the petitioner swore an affidavit to the effect that it would be more convenient for the case to be heard before the Circuit Court of Swellendam.

An answering affidavit was put in for the respondent.

Mr. Schreiner (for the defendant) contended that, as all the parties resided in the district of Swellendam, it would be very inconvenient to remove the trial from that place to Cape Town.

Sir Henry Juta argued that the Act gave them the legal right to claim a trial by jury, and the Court could not upset the trial, unless by written consent of the parties. How could the plaintiff deprive them of that right by putting in a claim for the removal of the trial? If the plaintiff wanted to avoid a jury, he should not have set the case down for hearing before a jury.

Mr. McGregor said he was inclined to adopt the argument advanced by Sir Henry Juta.

Buchanan, J., said these two actions had been instituted in the Supreme Court. The pleadings had been filed and issue had been joined. In the first case, the defendant had claimed a jury, and in the second, the plaintiff had claimed trial by jury. The plaintiffs in the first case and the defendants in the second wished to have the cases removed to circuit. No doubt the character of justice and the Rules of Court allowed cases to be removed to another court for trial. He thought from the facts placed on the affidavits that both the cases could be more conveniently heard in the Circuit Court, if it was only a question as to the place of trial, but the question was as to whether, a jury being demanded, it was competent for the Court to remove the trial of the case to a court where there could be no trial by jury. If there was an application to remove the case to a court where there could be a trial by jury, there would be no objection on the part of the Court. The Jury Act (23 of 1891) conferred a certain right on parties which could not be taken away from them. He thought it would be taking away the right of the parties if the place of trial was removed. This was a new point, and he would have liked to have referred it to the full Court, but he thought that he might lay down that, in his opinion, the Court could not remove the place of trial when issue had been joined and a jury demanded, to a court where it could not be tried by a jury. If the case could have been tried by jury at the Circuit Court, the Court would have considered the convenience of the Bar, but in the present case the application would be refused.

Sir H. Juta asked for costs.
Buchanan, J., said the costs would be costs in cause, because the question was a fair one to raise.

MAYISELA V. R.M. OF } 1904.
SOMERSET E. } Sept. 14th.

Law agent—Qualifications.

M., an ex-constable and a native, had applied to the R.M. of S. for enrolment under Act 20 of 1856 as a law agent. The applicant produced the necessary certificates as to character, but the Magistrate refused the application on the ground, inter alia, that the applicant's educational qualifications were insufficient.

Held, that a Magistrate has no power to insist on any educational or professional qualifications in any person applying to be enrolled as a law agent in his court.

Mr. Close applied on behalf of the applicant, Samuel Mayisela, for an order compelling respondent to admit applicant as an agent at law.

The plaintiff's affidavit stated he made application to the respondent to be admitted as an agent at law in his court, but his application was refused. He enclosed certificates as to his capabilities to act in such a position. A protest was lodged against the applicant being admitted by the agents at law practising in the district, in which it was stated that it would not be in keeping with the dignity of the Court to have the applicant practising in the court, and, secondly, they held that he was not competent to perform legal work.

The Magistrate's reasons for refusing the application stated that he did not consider it fair or just to overlook the protest of the legal practitioners, they being men of good sterling character, having practised for many years in his court. Secondly, he did not consider him sufficiently well educated to conduct any cases in the court, and, thirdly, he considered there were enough efficient practitioners in the district.

[Buchanan, J.: The only point the Court will have to consider is whether the applicant was competent to fill the position or not.]

Mr. Close: The fact that there was a sufficient number of agents practising in the Magistrate's Court was no reason for refusing to admit the applicant. As to his professional qualifications, he was not examined by the Court and therefore the Court was not in a position to judge. The statute law on the subject is contained in section 36 of Act 20 of 1856 and section 8 of Act 43 of 1885. As to reported cases, see Fan Wyk v. R.M. of Willowmore (13 Juta, 216), De Kock v. R.M. of Caledon (6 C.T.R., 417). Act 21 of 1886 merely deals with the case of agents removing from one district to another. As to character the applicant has excellent testimonials and not Act makes any mention of educational qualifications. The agents who protested against applicant's admission had absolutely no locus standi and that is nothing to show that he was not in every respect qualified.

[Buchanan, J.: The only question is whether education can be taken into account at all?]

I submit not. All that is required is that the applicant should be of full age and of good character.

Mr. H. Jones: The Magistrate has discretion as to the educational qualifications of men he admits to practise in his Court. "Good fame and character" imply a certain amount of education and business capacity. A law agent often has very important duties to perform. The applicant was only a native constable. He is probably well known to the Magistrate and the only educational qualification he can show is that he has passed the School Elementary examination in the third class. I wish to call attention to the fact that costs have been asked against the Magistrate but I submit that he should certainly not be ordered to pay costs de bonis propriis.

Mr. Close was not called upon in reply.

Buchanan, J., said that this was an application on behalf of Samuel Mayisela to be admitted as an enrolled agent of the Magistrate's Court. The only qualification required by a law agent in the Magistrate's Court was that he be a man of good fame and character. He was not required to pass any examination at all. The applicant in this case had been a native constable, and had received a good discharge. The Assistant Resident Magistrate under whom he served certified that he discharged his duties in a good and proper manner. He applied to the Resident Magistrate at Somerset East to be admitted to his Court as an agent at law. The various practitioners there objected to his admission. The Magistrate heard the application, and decided that he would not enrol the applicant, because he could not overlook the protest of the other practitioners, because he did not consider he was sufficiently competent to fill the position, and because there were enough practitioners in the district. The only point the Court had to decide was whether the Magistrate's objection to the applicant on the grounds that he was not sufficiently educated was a good one.

He had no doubt but that there was a general wish to raise the status of enrolled agents. In the absence of attorneys in the district, the old law still prevailed, which allowed agents to be enrolled in the Magistrate's Court. The only qualification necessary was that the applicant shall be of good fame and character. Now, in this case the Magistrate had not had any grounds for deciding that the applicant was not a man of good name and reputation. The fact that he was not sufficiently educated could not be considered in the case. There was no legal ground stated as to why the applicant should not be placed on the roll, and, under the circumstances, he would have to order the Magistrate to enrol the applicant. He had repeatedly pointed out that, where officers act in a public capacity, and their action is questioned in a higher Court, that they should not be called upon to pay the costs of the case. In the present case, despite all the cautions, the Magistrate was called on to show cause why he should not pay the costs. The applicant would have to pay any costs incurred by the Resident Magistrate. Of course, if Mr. Jones appeared on behalf of the Attorney-General, he would not get his costs, but the applicant would have to pay all other costs incurred by the Magistrate.

LANG V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT.

Mr. McGregor applied on behalf of the applicant James Lang, for an order compelling respondents to disclose certain documents. The motion was based on the following notice: "Take notice that application will be made on behalf of James Lang to show cause why an order should not issue from the Supreme Court compelling defendants to give to applicant the amount of water pumped by the defendants' servants from the Imvani River, which flows through the applicant's land at Lausanne, adjoining the Imvani Railway station, in the Queen's Town district, and which was consumed for railway purposes and of which records the defendants refused or delayed to make discovery.

Mr. McGregor read an affidavit made by George M. Walker, of the firm of Walker and Jacobsohn, the attorneys for the plaintiff, in which he stated that the pleadings in this case were closed on the 2nd of June, and an order was obtained directing the defendant to make discovery of all documents, papers and writings relative to matters at issue in the suit. In reply an affidavit of discovery was made by Mr. T. S. McEwen, stating that all documents had been discovered. Among the documents specified in the schedule annexed to the affidavit no mention was made of the water records. His firm had repeatedly called upon the defendants through its attorneys to make discovery of the records, but without success.

Caleb Arthur Collins made an affidavit, in which he stated that in or about the month of August Mr. Whitaker, an engineer, and Mr. Waters, a water superintendent of the Railway Department, went to the plaintiff's farm, and on plaintiff asking how he would know the quantity of water the department took away from his farm he was told either by Whitaker or Waters that he could at all reasonable times obtain the quantity of water from records which would be kept by the department. As the department in Cape Town was disputing the correctness of the amount claimed by plaintiff, deponent obtained from the stationmaster at Queen's Town a memorandum of the water taken by the department, and was shown that 1,633,200 gallons had been taken. The plaintiff's declaration stated that he entered into an agreement with the defendant, whereby he allowed them to pump water for consumption on the C.G.R. from a stream flowing through his land at the rate of 4s. per 1,000 gallons. The Government had pumped from the stream 1,633,200 gallons, and were indebted to plaintiff in the sum of £326 12s.

George R. Whitaker's affidavit denied that he told the plaintiff that certain records of the quantity of water consumed on the railway were kept. He told him he might be able to get the desired information at East London.

Buchanan, J., said that this was an application by the plaintiff in a suit which had been instituted against the Government for an order compelling the Government to produce the records of the amount of water pumped by them from a certain river. An order had already been obtained compelling the defendants to make discovery of all documents in their possession. An affidavit of discovery had been made, but there was no mention of these figures, and the defendants denied all knowledge of them. The plaintiff stated that they must have them because a messenger of his got the figures from a servant of the Government. The Government then made searching inquiries, but could not get them. If the Court had a suspicion that any document was being suppressed it would give an order for its discovery. The Court could not presume that there was such a document in the possession of the defendant, and, therefore, it could not give an order to compel them to discover documents which they had not got. The application would be dismissed, with costs.

RIGE V. DE JAEGER'

Mr. Russell applied, on behalf of the plaintiff, to have the trial of this case removed to the Circuit Court at Swellendam. The defendant did not raise any objection.

The application was granted.

Ex parte THE MOUNTAIN VIEW STONE QUARRY COMPANY.

Mr. McGregor applied for an order authorising the amendment of the articles of association of this company.

The order was granted.

CARR AND CO. V. LENDERS AND CO.

In this case, which was heard yesterday, and which was an application for the appointment of a commission de bene esse, Mr. Oliver was appointed commissioner.

SHAW V. SHAW.

Mr. Close applied to have a day set down for the return of affidavits in this action, which was a claim for alimony.

The application was granted, the return day being fixed for the 1st October.

SUPREME COURT

(In Chambers.)

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

DE WITT V. SKIPPON. { 1901.
 { Sept. 27th.

This was an application arising out of an action brought by the present respondent against De Witt in respect of certain bills of quantites, in which action the plaintiff (Skippon) was awarded £8, but was ordered to pay the costs. The costs had not been paid. A writ of execution was issued, and it had come to the applicant's knowledge that a sum of £130 was owing to Skippon by one Francis Wyatt Williams, for the erection of whose house Skippon was the contractor. The present application, therefore, was to attach this money.

Mr. Van Zyl moved.

Mr. Close, who appeared to oppose the application on behalf of Messrs. Small and Morgan, read an affidavit by Mr. James Boyd, manager for Messrs. Small and Morgan, stating that Mr. John Morgan, who was at present absent from the Colony, had, under an agreement with Skippon, taken over Skippon's contracts, including the contract in question, and the sum of £130 was owing to the firm.

Buchanan, J., after referring to the original case, said it was quite clear that the money belonged to Messrs. Small and Morgan, and De Witt was not able to prevent them from receiving the benefit for the work which they had done. The application would be refused, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

CRIMINAL SESSIONS.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY and a Jury.]

REX V. CHARTERIS. { 1904.
Oct. 4th.

Indictment—Exceptions—Rules of Court 63 and 64.

Where exception was taken to an indictment on the ground that it charged a prisoner with crimes of distinct species;

Held, that the indictment (as it stood) was bad, and the Crown was put to election as to which class of charges it would prosecute.

Exception having been further taken that certain persons from whom the accused was said to have received bribes were not specified;

Held, that these counts might be amended by the insertion of the necessary particulars.

David Charteris, a sergeant of police, residing in Cape Town, was arraigned on a charge of accepting bribes in a public office, contravening sections 11 and 30, of Act No. 12, of 1882, entitled the Police Regulations Act, 1882, and contravening section 4, of Act 36, of 1902, entitled the Betting Houses, Gaming Houses, and Brothel Suppression Act, 1902.

The indictment (which it is necessary to set out fully, in order that the argument on the exceptions may be clearly understood) reads as follows:

That David Charteris, a sergeant of police, at all times material to this indictment, residing at Cape Town, in the District of the Cape, is guilty of the crimes of Accepting Bribes in a public office, contravening sections 11 and 30 of Act No. 12 of 1882, entitled the "Police Regulation Act, 1882," and contravening section 4 of Act No. 36 of 1902, entitled the Betting Houses, Gaming Houses and Brothels Suppression Act, 1902, or of one or more of the said crimes: 1st—In that in or about the month of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and two, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from the keeper or owner of a certain brothel situate at 15 Van de Leur-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, money amounting to the sum of ten pounds sterling, the said money being offered by the said keeper or owner and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under Part IV. of Act 36 of 1902, of the said keeper or owner of the said brothel and the landlord thereof; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Secondly.—As also, in that between the first day of June and the first day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and two, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from one Max Harris, lately a restaurant-keeper, of 40, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, accept for and on behalf of the keepers or owners of certain three brothels, situate in Primrose-street, in Cape Town aforesaid divers sums of money in monthly instalments amounting to the sum of one hundred pounds sterling, or thereabouts, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris, and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act No 36 of 1902, of the keepers or owners of the said brothels and the landlord thereof; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Thirdly.—As also, in that between the said first day of December, in the said year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and two, and the first day of March, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully, and corruptly accept and receive from one Max Harris, lately a restaurant-keeper, of 40, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, acting for and on behalf of the keepers or owners of certain two brothels, situate at 20 and 21, Longmarket-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, divers sums of money in monthly instalments amounting to the sum of eighteen pounds sterling, or thereabouts, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward, to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty, therein taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act No 36 of 1902, of the keepers or owners of the said brothels and landlords thereof; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Fourthly.—As also, in that between the said first day of December in the said year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and two, and the said first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from one Max Harris, lately a restaurant-keeper, of 40, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, acting for and on behalf of the keeper or owner of a certain brothel, situate at 23, Van de Leur-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, divers sums of money in monthly instalments amounting to the sum of eighteen pounds sterling, or thereabouts, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris, and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under Part IV. of Act No. 36 of 1902, of the keeper or owner of the said brothel and the landlord thereof; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Fifthly.—As, also, in that between the said first day of December in the said year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and two, and the said first day of December in the said year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from one Max Harris, lately a restaurant-keeper, of 40, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, acting for and on behalf of the keeper or owner of a certain brothel, situate at 7, Sidney-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, divers sums of money in monthly instalments amounting to the sum of eighteen pounds sterling, or thereabouts, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act No. 36 of 1902, of the keeper or owner of the said brothel and the landlord thereof; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Sixthly.—As, also, in that, between the first day of April and the first day of October, in the said year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from one Max Harris, lately a restaurant-keeper, of 40, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, acting for and on behalf of the keepers and owners of certain three brothels situate at 50, 60 and 62 Primrose-street, aforesaid, divers sums of money in monthly instalments amounting to the sum of ninety pounds sterling, or thereabouts, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris, and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act No. 36 of 1902, of keepers or owners of the said brothels and of the landlords thereof; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Seventhly.—As also, in that between the said first day of April and the said first day of October in the said year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a ser-gent in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully, and corruptly accept and receive from one Max Harris, lately a restaurant-keeper, of 40, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, acting for and on behalf of the keepers and owners of certain two brothels, situate at 16 and 18, Canon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, divers sums of money in monthly instalments amounting to the sum of thirty pounds sterling, or thereabouts, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act 36 of 1902, of the keepers or owners of the said brothels and the landlords thereof; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Eightily.—As also, in that, in or about the months of August and September, in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from one Max Harris, lately a restaurant-keeper, of 40, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, acting for and on behalf of the keepers and owners of certain brothel, situate at 27, Canterbury-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, divers sums of money in monthly instalments amounting to the sum of twenty pounds sterling, or thereabouts, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act No. 36 of 1902, of the keeper or owner of the said brothel; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Ninthly.—As, also, in that, in or about the said month of October in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from one Solomon Goldstein, residing at Cape Town aforesaid, money amounting to the sum of ten pounds sterling, the said money being offered by the said Solomon Goldstein and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act No. 36 of 1902, of the owner or keeper of a certain brothel, situate at 27, Canterbury-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Tenthly.—As also, in that, in or about the month of January, in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and two, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from one Max Harris, lately a restaurant-keeper, of 40, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, acting for and on behalf of the keeper or owner of a certain brothel situate at 24, Selkirk-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, money amounting to the sum of ten pounds sterling, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act No. 36 of 1902, of the keeper or owner of the said brothel and of the landlord thereof; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Eleventhly.—As also, in that, in or about the month of May, in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from the owner of a certain brothel, situate at 24, Selkirk-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, through the said Max Harris, money amounting to the sum of fifteen pounds sterling, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris for and on behalf of the said owner, and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act No. 36 of 1902, of the keeper or owner of the said brothel, and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Twelfthly.—As also, in that, in or about the said month of January, in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from one Max Harris, lately a restaurant-keeper, of 40, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, acting for and on behalf of the keeper or owner of a certain brothel, situate at 15, Longmarket-street aforesaid, divers sums of money in monthly instalments, amounting to the sum of twenty-five pounds sterling, or thereabouts, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act No. 36 of 1902, of the keeper or owner of the said brothel, and of the landlord thereof; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Thirteenthly.—As also, in that, in or about the month of April, in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and four, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from the keepers or owners of certain four brothels, situate at 28, Longmarket-street, 10, Parkin-street, 3, Tyne-street and 12 Muir-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, money amounting to the sum of eighty pounds sterling or thereabouts, the said money being offered by the said keepers or owners and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to law, under part IV. of Act No. 36 of 1902, of the said keepers or owners of the said brothels and of the landlords thereof; and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Fourteenthly.—As also, in that, in or about the months of August, September, and October, in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a sergeant in the Cape police, and as such occupying a public office, did wrongfully, unlawfully and corruptly accept and receive from the said Max Harris divers sums of money, the precise amount of which is to the prosecutor unknown, the said money being offered by the said Max Harris and accepted and received by the said David Charteris as a fee, gift or reward to influence his behaviour in the said office by inclining him to forego his duty therein of taking or causing to be taken steps for the due prosecution, according to the law of Fanny Rosenbloem, Fanny Fishbien, and others whose names are to the prosecutor unknown, residing at Cape Town aforesaid, for contravening sub-section 29 of section 5 of Act No. 27 of 1882, entitled the "Police Offences Act, 1882," and thus did commit the crime of accepting bribes in a public office.

Fifteenthly.—As also, in that, between the nineteenth day of January and the twenty-first day of April in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and four, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris being a member of the Cape police force, enrolled at Cape Town aforesaid, on the twenty-seventh day of December, in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred, under the provisions of the Act No. 12 of 1882, did wrongfully, unlawfully and wilfully neglect to execute a certain warrant dated the said nineteenth day of January, signed by Joachim Wilhelm Heyneman Russouw, Esquire, a Justice of the Peace for the district of the Cape aforesaid, for the arrest of one David Rogers or Davis charged with the crime of contravening section 133 of the said Act No. 36 of 1902, and said warrant being directed to be by him, the said David Charteris, executed as in section 12 of the said Act No. 12 of 1882 provided, and thus did contravene section 30 of the said Act No. 12 of 1882.

Sixteenthly.—As also, in that, between the twenty-fifth day of the said month of January, and the eighteenth day of the said month of April, in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and four, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris being a member of the said Cape police force, enrolled as aforesaid, did wrongfully, unlawfully and wilfully neglect his duty by not serving a certain brothel notice on one George Hyman, the landlord of a certain brothel, situate at 12, Muir-street in Cape Town aforesaid, and thus did contravene section 11 of the said Act No. 12 of 1882.

Seventeenthly.—As also, in that, between the eighteenth day of February and the seventeenth day of April, in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and four, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris being a member of the said Cape police force, enrolled as aforesaid, did wrongfully, unlawfully and wilfully neglect his duty by not serving a certain brothel notice on one Joe Lis alias Joe Silver, the landlord of certain brothels situate at 9 Sydney-street and 28 Longmarket-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, and thus did contravene section 11 of the said Act No. 12 of 1882.

Eighteenthly.—As also, in that, between the said eighteenth day of February and the said seventeenth day of April, in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and four, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a member of the said Cape police force, enrolled as aforesaid, was guilty of an act of misconduct against the discipline of the said force, by wrongfully and unlawfully becoming a partner and acquiring a financial interest in the profits of a certain gaming house situated at 7, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, conducted by the said Max Harris and others, in contravention of the provisions of the said Act No. 36 of 1902, and thus did contravene section 30 of the said Act No. 12 of 1882.

Nineteenthly.—As also, in that, between the said eighteenth day of February and the said seventeenth day of April, in the year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and four, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris did wrongfully and unlawfully keep and own a certain gaming house situated at 7, Caledon-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, and thus did commit the crime of contravening section 4 of the said Act No. 36 of 1902.

Twentiethly.—As also, in that, between the first day of May and the first day of August, in the said year of Our Lord one thousand nine hundred and three, and at Cape Town aforesaid, the said David Charteris, being a member of the said Cape police force, enrolled as aforesaid, was guilty of an act of misconduct against the discipline of the said force, by wrongfully and unlawfully acquiring a financial interest in the profits of the illicit sale of liquor at 100, Hout-street, in Cape Town aforesaid, by one David Rogers alias Davis, in contravention of section 75 of Act No. 28 of 1883, and thus did contravene section 30 of the said Act No. 12 of 1882.

Mr. Nightingale conducted the prosecution, and Mr. Van Zyl appeared for the accused.

Before the prisoner was called upon to plead, Mr. Van Zyl excepted to the indictment, on the ground that contrary to Rule of Court 63 it contained counts of more than one crime of a different species, and arising out of separate and unconnected facts. The first fourteen counts were based on charges of bribery, and the others of contravening the Police Regulations and the Brothels Act. In all fairness to prisoner, it would not be right to hear all the charges together. The offence of bribery with which he is charged in the first fourteen counts is a crime of an absolutely different nature from the offences against the Police Regulations and against gambling with which he is charged in the remaining counts. Nor is there any such connected series of Acts as required by Rule of Court 64. In support hereof was cited R. v. Klaus Bele (2 E.D., p. 401).

Mr. Nightingale, replying on Rule of Court 64, contended that it was correct to try the prisoner on all counts in one indictment, because they were all the result of the system he had adopted as a public official of making money out of his position.

Hopley, J., said he thought it would have been advisable for the Crown to have brought in three different indictments.

Mr. Nightingale said if that had been done, it would have wasted the time of the Court, as it would have necessitated calling the same witnesses over and over again.

Hopley, J., said the Court had had a case before it during the present session in which a number of men were charged on different indictments with the same crime.

Mr. Nightingale said that in the case referred to by his Lordship, there were a number of men and only a few facts. In the present case there was only one man and a number of facts.

If the Court put him to his election he would, in order to prove the bribery counts, have to call in corroboration the very evidence that would support most of the charges of infringing the Police Regulations Act 12, of 1882.

Hopley, J., said that on looking through the indictment it was seen that crimes of different species were charged in this indictment, and it must be admitted that the crimes arose out of separate and unconnected facts. This must be admitted, because Mr. Nightingale had not been able to give any definite answer as to whether the evidence he was going to lead showed how the first 14 counts were connected with the others. The first 14 counts were under common law, and charged the prisoner with bribery. Under the 64th Rule of Court it was competent to indict a man on the same indictment for two or more offences arising out of the same cases, or connected by acts committed by him. But because a man had committed half a dozen crimes they could not charge him with all the crimes on the same indictment. He did not think any of the arguments advanced by the Crown in answer to Mr. Van Zyl were sound. He did not see anything in the rules of the Court which made it possible for the Crown to take the same indictment for all charges, simply because one man had been carrying out, as it was alleged, a system of crimes. It seemed to him in the present case that the Crown should make its election, and he asked Mr. Nightingale which of the various counts he was ready to proceed on.

Mr. Nightingale said he was ready to proceed with the first 14 bribery counts, and also with count 16.

Mr. Van Zyl then took exception to counts 1 to 8 and 10, 11, 12, and 13, on the grounds that the prisoner was charged with wrongfully and unlawfully receiving from the keepers or owners of certain brothels certain sums of money without the names of such owners or keepers being given. He contended that the indictment was too vague, and did not give the accused a fair opportunity of properly preparing his defence. He quoted the case of R. v. Salting and others (4, Searle 79), tried on appeal in the Civil Court. The case he referred to was dismissed because the amount of money and the name of the owner were not specified.

Hopley, J., said he could not understand what the High Court was doing if they dismissed a case on those grounds. He wished to know if he formed one of the bench.

Mr. Van Zyl: Yes, your lordship was one of the bench.

Hopley, J., said he recollected that case. There was a good deal in it. The accused was charged with stealing a certain sum of money from some person unknown. It was known that a certain sum of money was stolen from the district where the accused lived. The prisoners were found there under suspicious circumstances in possession of a considerable quantity of money, yet the indictment was considered by the Court to be too vague.

Mr. Nightingale said the Crown was unfortunately in the position of not being able to give the names, as many of the people concerned had left the country.

Mr. Van Zyl contended that, without knowing the names of the persons who owned the brothels the accused found it exceedingly difficult to arrange his defence.

Mr. Nightingale said that, with the permission of the Court, he would have the numbers of the street in which the brothels were situated inserted in the counts of the indictment in which the numbers had been omitted.

Hopley, J.: As to the bribes taken by Harris on behalf of accused, cannot you get the names of the persons who paid them from Harris?

Mr. Nightingale said that did not affect the case, as the indictment charged that the accused actually took the bribes from Harris, who was the agent for the brothel keepers, and not that the accused received money from the brothel keepers direct.

Hopley, J., said exception had been taken to certain of the first fourteen counts in the indictment. He certainly thought there was a certain amount of vagueness about it. In the cases in which it was possible to find out the names of the owners or keepers of the house concerned, the numbers had been given. There was one count in which accused was charged with receiving money from three brothels in Primrose-street, the numbers of which were not given, but he understood the Crown was prepared to fill them in. If so, he thought that the indictment should be allowed to stand, and the case go to the jury. He did not feel at that stage of the case inclined to throw the case out of court. If there was any uncertainty about the case, it would go to a Higher Court.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

FRIEDMAN BROS. V. MORRISON.

Sequestration—Provisional order—Discharge.

This was an application for the compulsory sequestration of the respondent's estate.

The affidavit of the applicants stated that the respondent, who owed them £326, had left the Colony without acquainting them, and in doing so, had committed an act of insolvency. Mr. Justice Hopley had already granted an order for provisional sequestration.

The answering affidavit of the respondent admitted leaving the Colony, but it was only on a visit to Natal to bring back his wife, who had preceded him there on a visit. He was prepared to pay the applicants the amount due to them when they rendered him a correct and detailed account.

Other affidavits as to the respondent's solvency were read by counsel.

The replying affidavit on behalf of the plaintiffs stated that the respondent had never, prior to leaving Cape Colony, questioned the accuracy of the account. They believed that Morrison had left the Colony with the intention of not returning, because he had sold his property and movables in the district, and that his going away had been of a secret nature, going overland, when the easiest mode would have been by sea. When they called on him the day prior to his departure, he said he was indisposed, and could not see them. The next day he left for Natal under an assumed name, accompanied by his daughter, whom he left at Mossel Bay. They considered he had not received the full value for some land he sold his son-in-law, the amount received being only £900, whereas a few weeks before he told plaintiffs he had been offered £1,240 for it.

Mr. Gardiner, for defendant, said there was no evidence before the Court that the defendant was unable to pay his debts, and consequently the plaintiff's action was a high-handed one.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the defendant's reply to the allegation that he left the Colony under an assumed name?]

That is only hearsay.

[Buchanan, J.: But the circuitous route he took is somewhat suspicious.]

He went to see a daughter on the way to Natal. A most important point is the fact that the defendant has returned to Heidelberg.

Mr. Buchanan (for plaintiff): The respondent never disputed our claim, but promised to pay. We originally claimed £377, which has been reduced by £100. We offered to accept £200, and agreed that costs should be costs in the cause. Defendant objected to the costs, and that is the whole question.

Mr. Gardiner: The applicants are unreasonable in asking for costs. The allegation as to the respondent going to Mossel Bay under an assumed name rests on hearsay evidence. The creditors had no right to attempt to sequester respondent's estate. As to his going to Natal overland instead of by boat, he wished to see his daughter at Oudtshoorn. He left his promissory note with Du Preez, and has returned to meet it. That is quite sufficient to show that he was not running away from his creditors.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But he has sold all his property.]

He denies that he has not assets sufficient to meet the claims against him.

De Villiers, C.J., said the Court would order that the order of sequestration should be discharged, if within ten days from date the sum of £277 was lodged with the Registrar of the Court. The question of costs would be allowed to stand over.

STEER V. ROELKE.

Mr. P. Jones applied for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £3,000, with interest and costs.

The application was granted.

CREAGHE V. ZINKENDORF.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan applied for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £500. Also that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

The application was granted.

CLOETE V. EDWARDS AND SCHOEBUSH.

Mr. Close, who appeared for the defendants, asked to have his case adjourned, pending the decision of the Court in an application to have the estate of the defendants sequestrated.

Mr. McGregor opposed the application, and said that the case before the Court did not concern the partnership at all. He was applying for judgment on three promissory notes, in respect of which Edwards was principal and Schoebusch was surety. These notes did not concern the partnership at all. The case came before the Court on a removal order from the Magistrate's Court at Lady Grey. The application was for provisional sentence on three promissory notes, the first of which was for £177 7s., less £124 12s. 6d. paid on account, leaving £52 14s. 6d., with interest at 25 per cent. and costs of suit; also on two promissory notes for £200 each, with interest.

The Court granted the application.

LOMNITZ V. STEENSMA.

Mr. Le Roux applied for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £4,500, with interest at 6 per cent. from the 1st January, and also that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

The application was granted.

GORDON MITCHELL AND CO. AND OTHERS V. BAKST.

Mr. Gutsche moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

WARNER AND CO. V. BANSO.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

TREDIDGA V. MELLMAN AND SEGAL.

Mr. Gutsche moved for provisional sentence for £1,750 on a mortgage bond, with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest; also for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

VAN DEUSEN AND ANOTHER V. BOOYSEN.

Mr. De Waal moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

LAWRENCE AND CO. AND OTHERS V. LURIE.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

SCHULTZ V. ROSSOUW.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £3,200 on a mortgage bond, with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest.

Order granted.

S.A. BREWERIES LTD. V. HARDING.

Mr. Gardiner moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent. He also applied for an amendment of the defendant's name in the summons to "Wm. Robert Harding."

Ordered to stand over pending further information in regard to suggested amendment of summons.

HIGHMAN AND OTHERS V. FRASEWISKY AND VAN WYK.

Mr. Upington moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

SMITH AND CO. V. TUPNACH.

Mr. Roux moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

WESSNER V. POGGENTPOEL.

Mr. Sutton moved for provisional sentence for £40 on certain conditions of sale, with interest.

Order granted.

CAPE TOWN GAS CO. AND OTHERS V. NYMAN.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

COLONIAL ORPHAN CHAMBER V. WAHL.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for provisional sentence for £1,850, balance of a mortgage bond, with interest, and also for £8 16s., insurance, and for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

BAILEY V. McDONALD.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for provisional sentence for £3,000 on a mortgage bond, together with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of the interest. Counsel also asked for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

SWEMMER V. CALITZ.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

TRUSTEES REINER V. BOYCE.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £4,000, with interest, and for £6 insurance premiums, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest. Counsel also asked for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

NOACH V. RAUBENHEIMER.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence for £73 on a promissory note, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

HENDRICK V. DE BEER AND MAIDMENT.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £33, with interest and costs.

Order granted.

DUBIS V. HYMAN (alias DACHEAIX).

Mr. Burton moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

MCLEOD V. BARNARD.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence for £120 on a mortgage bond on land in the division of Willowmore, the bond having become due by reason of notice having been given. Counsel also asked for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

SHEPPARD V. MCINTOSH AND STEER.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence for two sums of £1,800 and £509 on two mortgage bonds, with interest, the bonds having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest. Counsel also asked for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

LEVE V. KOENIG.

Mr. Struben moved for provisional sentence on a lease for arrears of rent, and also asked that the provisional order granted on the 21st September be made final.

Order granted as prayed.

MCLEOD V. MAKE.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence for £75 on a mortgage bond, together with interest, the bond having become due by reason of notice having been given. Counsel also asked that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Order granted.

MCLEOD V. WELCOME.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence for £50 on a mortgage bond, the bond having become due by reason of notice having been given. Counsel also asked for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

MCLEOD V. STRYDOM.

Mr. M. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence for £75 on a mortgage bond, together with interest, the bond having become due by reason of notice; and for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Order granted.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE SAVINGS BANK V. HARRISON.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence for £1,000 on a mortgage bond, with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest. Counsel also asked for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Defendant opposed the application, and said that he had been unable to sell the property.

Mr. De Waal, replying to the Court, said that the plaintiff could not consent to a stay of execution.

De Villiers, C.J., said that there were special circumstances in the case, and that the execution would be stayed for three months, with leave to the plaintiff to apply in the mean time for an order for an interdict.

WICHT V. HOMEWOOD.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence for £1,100 on a mortgage bond, together with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest. Counsel also asked for the property hypothecated to be declared executable.

Application granted.

LYONS V. GREENLAND.

Mr. Close applied for a decree of civil imprisonment against the defendant, in default of his paying a judgment debt of £68 15s.

The defendant appeared, and said he was unable to pay the amount due. He had to support his wife and mother out of a salary of £15 a month. The plaintiff, he alleged, had ruined him. He could not pay more than 10s. a month.

Mr. Close: You see you owe about £100, and if you can only pay 10s. a month, it will take about 200 years to pay it off.

The Court refused to grant any order.

VON HOLDT V. BUHR.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers applied for judgment on certain conditions of sale. The application was granted.

TERNAN V. TUCKER.

Mr. Sutton applied for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £100, with interest from the 1st January.

The application was granted.

BENNETT AND BAKER V. BARRY.

Mr. Alexander applied for a decree of civil imprisonment against the defendant on an unsatisfied judgment of the Court for £127 10s. 9d.

The defendant appeared, and opposed the application, on the grounds that she was unable to pay the debt. She kept a boarding-house at Rondebosch, the furniture of which was hired. She had to pay £40 a month rent. Her income was £96 a month, and after she had paid her debts, she had nothing left. She would be able to pay £1 a month at present.

An order for civil imprisonment was granted, to be suspended pending the payment of £1 a month. Plaintiffs would be entitled at a later date to make application for increased payments.

VERSFELD V. ALLIE.

Mr. Benjamin applied for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £53. The application was granted.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

FRIEDMAN V. BELMAN. { 1904.
Oct. 17th.

Civil imprisonment—Application for release.

This was a motion for an order discharging applicant from prison. Applicant's affidavit stated that he had, by an order of the Court, been committed to gaol in April last because he was unable to satisfy a judgment of the Court against him for £550. An order was then made that he should pay £7 10s. per month, which he had been unable to do. Since being committed to prison, he had been unable to do anything to pay the debt off.

The answering affidavit of Charles Kramer, articulated clerk to Messrs. Syfret, Godlonton and Low, stated that he had applied to the respondent for the instalment due, but that he had not got it. He believed the business alleged to be the property of the respondent's wife was really the respondent's, and that he was able to pay the amount of the claim against him.

The replying affidavit of the respondent's wife, stated that she owned the property in question, and that the respondent was her traveller, who received sufficient salary to live upon and travelling expenses.

Mr. Alexander, for applicant; Mr. W. P. Buchanan for respondent.

[De Villiers, C.J., enquired if the offer to pay £7 10s. per month was made by the applicant.

Mr. Alexander said he understood he had made no offer. The case of Hall and Co. v. Esterhuysen (2 C.T.R., 133), shows that the Court will not grant civil imprisonment to coerce any relatives: not even a wife. Here if the defendant had means he would not remain in prison.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court has made an order that the present applicant be imprisoned, but that the decree be suspended pending the payment by him of £7 10s. per month. The Court, when making that order, must have been aware of all the circumstances. Now the applicant applies to be liberated. He brings forward no new facts to satisfy the Court that he should be released. In the absence of such evidence the Court would not be justified in departing from its previous order, and therefore the application must be refused.

PARKIN V. SPIES. { 1904.
Oct. 17th.

Bond—Capital and interest—Payment of interest.

A mortgage bond passed by the defendant in favour of the plaintiff contained a proviso that the capital should not be called up for five years, provided that the interest be duly paid as it falls due. After the passing of the bond, an arrangement was entered into between the parties that the interest should be paid at the office of H., who was the legal adviser of both. The first instalments of interest were duly paid at such office and received by the plaintiff, but on a further instalment falling due, the defendant failed to pay the actual sum at the office, but he had made an arrangement with the attorney for the payment of the amount on his behalf on demand by the plaintiff. The plaintiff, however, did not apply at the office of H. for payment, and sued the defendant for capital and interest, on the ground of failure to pay interest when due.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to claim payment of the capital.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a certain mortgage bond for £1,000. The bond was executed on March 10, 1903, and had become due and payable by reason of non-payment of interest. It was also prayed that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for defendant): Our defence is that the interest on the bond was payable at the office of Schweitzer and Burger. The interest was paid there, and yet the plaintiff called up the bond. Subsequently the interest was tendered, and was refused.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Mr. Schreiner, some very important questions seem to be raised in this case; can they be determined on affidavit?]

Mr. Schreiner (for plaintiff): I think so. It is said that payment was to be made, not by the attorney, but at the office of the attorney. The interest was due on June 13, but no interest was tendered to the plaintiff till July. Plaintiff showed every consideration for defendant, and took a second bond when defendant would not meet the first. It was agreed that defendant should insure his property, but he has failed to do so, and yet it is most important to a second bond holder that the property should be kept up.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The bond does not bind the defendant to insure. Should he not do so the mortgagee can insure.]

We are not calling up the bond on the ground of failure to insure. I cite the fact of the non-insurance merely as an illustration of the spirit in which the defendant has acted, and in order to account for the line we are taking in standing on our legal rights. Even assuming that the office of the attorneys was the place where the interest was to be paid, it is quite clear that no interest was paid there by June 13.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the plaintiff had called on the defendant on the 13th he would have received his money.]

That is not at all clear. There was no payment up to July 5. Had the plaintiff died before that date we could not have sued the attorneys for the money.

If the defendant made an arrangement that payment of the interest should be made by the attorneys that was no payment by them. No matter what defendant may have deposited with them, there was no money ear-marked for us, and there was no security that the attorneys would pay.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is not an arrangement made for payment the same thing as payment?]

No. Even if such arrangement were made the defendant would be still responsible if his attorney did not carry it out. It is clear that no money was paid up to July 8th. The plaintiff is not bound by any arrangement made by defendant with his attorney. The bond is in our favour, and the most important allegations made by the defendant are made in replying affidavits which we are not allowed to answer. Even if the attorney did promise the defendant to provide the money that was not a solutio, and the plaintiff could not be bound by any such arrangement if he did not accept it.

Sir H. Juta was not called upon in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this action the plaintiff sues for principal and interest under a mortgage bond. In regard to the principal, there is a proviso that the principal cannot be called up for a period of five years, provided the interest was paid. After the expiration of five years, the capital was to become payable. The plaintiff now seeks to recover the principal and interest on the ground that on the date it was due the defendant did not pay the instalment. The evidence given is to the effect that a certain arrangement was arrived at between the parties that the interest, for the convenience of all parties, should be paid at the office of a certain attorney, who was legal adviser to both plaintiff and defendant. Now, this allegation receives confirmation by the fact that all the payments made since the bond was passed were made at this attorney's office. The defendant stated that he made arrangements with the attorney to pay the instalment due to the 30th June. Therefore, had plaintiff applied at the office on the 30th June, he would have got the instalment; but he did not do so. It did not suit his plan, for he seemed exceedingly anxious to secure the forfeiture of the bond. It would certainly be a great hardship on the defendant if he had been prepared to pay his instalment that he should have to pay in the amount of the bond. The Court will give provisional sentence for the amount of interest due only.

The plaintiff was ordered to go into the principal case on the capital sum.

[Plaintiff's Attorneys: Van der Byl and De Villiers; Defendant's Attorneys: Fairbridge, Arderne and Lawton.]

ESTATE LOCHNER V. PIENAAR.

This was an application for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £447 10s., less £283 paid on account.

The affidavit of the defendant denied the liability. He stated that the note was purely an accommodation note. He was charged by applicant to sell mules on commission for him, and he was charged with the price of them, when, in reality, the sales took place between the plaintiff and the third party through respondent. He tendered applicant £29, the amount due.

The applicant's answering affidavit stated that the defendant owed him £447 10s., less £283. He denied that the respondent sold mules on commission for him, but said that he purchased them at £17 10s. each. He also supplied him with six mules at £40 each, for which he said he had a purchaser; but as he could not sell them, applicant took them back and credited him with their full value. The promissory note was not an accommodation note; it was a note given for full value received.

Mr. Close, for the defendant, in argument, said it seemed very peculiar, if Pienaar had purchased the mules outright, that he should write and ask applicant's permission to sell the mules at a lower price than he was allotted to have purchased them at. He asked his lordship to refuse the order, as the circumstances were all in favour of the respondent.

Mr. P. Jones, for the plaintiff, said the whole question was as to whether the note was an accommodation note or not. If they took the defendant's financial position at that time, they would see that he was only a poor struggling man.

Provisional sentence, with costs, in terms of the summons, was granted.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE SAVINGS BANK V.
GOW AND OTHERS.

Mr. De Waal applied for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £29 and costs.

The application was granted.

GARAGE CONFIDENTIAL CO. V. VAN RIET.

Mr. Struben applied for a decree of civil imprisonment against the defendant on an unsatisfied decree of the Court for £286 and £91 costs.

The defendant appeared, and said he had no money to pay the claim. He had no furniture of his own. He was married. He was a builder by trade, but had no contracts on hand now. Out of the last contract, he had no money left.

Mr. Struben said he understood defendant had erected a building at Elsie's River, for which £66 was due.

Defendant (in examination) said the amount realised from the buildings had been mortgaged for bricks. He used to drive a motor-car called the Comfortable, which Messrs. I. and J. Herman lent him to visit his works.

Mr. Struben: That car was attached by us, and we have received part payment.

Defendant (continuing) said plaintiffs had purchased the car he was decreed for back for £250. A decree was given against him for £500. Witness was not in a position to pay any monthly instalment at present.

The Court refused the application, but reserved permission to the plaintiffs to apply again when they had proof of the defendant's ability to pay.

ORLANDINI V. COLLINS.

Mr. P. Jones applied for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £950 and interest, and also that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

The application was granted.

DORMEHL V. SCHOLTZ

Mr. Russell, who appeared for the plaintiff, said leave had been given to sue by edictal citation in this case, but since then the defendant had died, so he asked permission to amend the summons to sue the executors.

The application was granted.

BOESEN V. DAY.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan, who appeared for the applicant, said that this case had been before the Court a considerable number of times. It was an application for the final order for the sequestration of the defendant's estate. The case had originally come before the Court on the 14th July, and had been postponed on divers occasions, pending some arrangement being arrived at. He understood the defendant wanted a further postponement, and he was directed to oppose it.

Mr. Gardiner, for the respondent, said he was asking for something more than the postponement of the case. He was asking for the discharge of the order. Mrs. Day (the respondent) had sold certain property, and she averred that if the transfer was allowed to go through, she would be in a solvent position, and would be able to pay the claim made by the plaintiffs.

The case was allowed to stand over until Thursday next, pending arrangements between the parties being arrived at.

NIVEN AND YOUATT V. REDFERN AND BENSLEY.

Mr. Burton moved for postponement of trial until next term.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., appeared to oppose.

On behalf of the applicants (the defendants in the action), it was stated that they were absent in Europe, and wished the case postponed until their return.

Affidavits were read on behalf of the respondents to the effect that the action had already been postponed to suit defendants' convenience, and respondents now objected to the case being postponed until next term.

The case was ordered to be set down for trial on the 16th November.

FREEMANTLE V. MILLS.

Sir Henry Juta, K.C., moved, on behalf of the respondent, for removal of trial to the Eastern Districts Court at Graham's Town. The action was one upon petition by Mr. Freemantle, the unsuccessful candidate at the recent Uitenhage election, to have the election declared null and void. It was stated on affidavit that a number of witnesses whom the respondent wished to call would have to be present at the Criminal Court at Graham's Town on the 10th November, to give evidence in regard to certain charges of impersonation. Counsel said the trial had been provisionally set down for hearing at the Supreme Court on the 11th November, but as the hearing of the impersonation cases, involving the presence of many witnesses required to give evidence in this case, was fixed to take place at Graham's Town on the preceding day, it would be necessary either to remove the trial to Graham's Town or to alter the date fixed by the Supreme Court.

Mr. Burton, who (with Mr. Van Zyl) appeared for Mr. Freemantle, read an affidavit made by the latter, in which he expressed the desire that the petition should be tried before the Supreme Court, inasmuch as there would not be a full complement of judges at Graham's Town, and as there was no power of appeal to the Supreme Court against the decision of the Eastern Districts Court relative to election petitions.

De Villiers, C.J., said it was clear that the Court had no power to refer the trial to the Eastern Districts Court. Power was given to remove such trials to a Circuit Court, but there was great objection to this course, as it was desirable that election petitions should be decided by more than one judge, unless the parties elected otherwise. The date of trial would, however, be altered to the 21st November. As the Act was clear that it was not competent for the Court to order the removal to the Eastern Districts Court, the cost of the application for removal would have to be borne by the respondents. Costs of the application for postponement would stand over.

SKLAAR V. INSOLVENT ESTATE OF WEINTROB,

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order for the delivery of a certain bond to enable the applicant to pass transfer of property. Applicant stated that the bond was given to respondent as security to him for the performance of certain obligations, which applicant had duly performed. Application had been made to the trustee for the document, but the latter stated that it was in the insolvent's possession, and that he (the trustee) had no power to compel Weintrob to deliver it up.

Without hearing Mr. McGregor in argument, the Court refused the application, with costs.

De Villiers, C.J.: This application seems a most extraordinary one. The applicant asks for an order on the trustee to hand over to the applicant a certain mortgage bond. The trustee says he has no mortgage bond; that he has never had it; that if the insolvent has it, the applicant can sue him. The trustee goes further, and says: "I lay no claim to the document, if you wish to sue him, you may do so." And he goes still further, and says: "If you will guarantee costs, I will assist you to sue him." Clearly, the position taken up by the trustee is right. The trustee would have no right to squander money which he held on behalf of creditors for the benefit of the plaintiff. It is a matter for the plaintiff and the insolvent, who improperly withheld a document to which he had no right. The application will be refused, with costs.

Costs of an affidavit filed on behalf of the respondent were refused.

ELLIS V. KEMP.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for the appointment of a joint commission to take evidence at King William's Town.

Granted, the Resident Magistrate at King William's Town being appointed commissioner, costs to be costs in the cause.

JAMES V. FREDERICKSON.

Mr. Gardiner applied for an order interdicting the defendant, the administrator of the estate of the late Thomas Robinson James, from selling certain land in West Pondoland. In his affidavit, the petitioner said that the selling of the land would deprive him of his only home. Petitioner believed that in the present depression, property would realise very little.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan, for the respondent, read answering affidavits by the defendant, who said that if the property was not realised there would be no funds for the education of the minor children, and the sale was entirely for the benefit of the heirs.

Mr. Gardiner said they were prepared to pay all the liabilities of the estate.

De Villiers, C.J., said it seemed unreasonable to sell the property now, against the wishes of the heirs, who were prepared to pay the debts.

Mr. Buchanan pointed out that defendant was also guardian of the minor child.

De Villiers, C.J., said there seemed no necessity for charging defendant with ulterior motives, but he thought in the present circumstances that it would be better not to sell the property. The Court would direct respondent not to sell the land, provided that within twenty-one days petitioner placed sufficient money in the hands of the respondent to pay the debts of the estate and the cost of administration, the costs of this application to come out of the estate.

TRIAL CAUSES.

WELLS V. WHITE. { 1904.
Oct 18th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan (for the plaintiff) applied for judgment, in terms of consent paper, i.e., for prayer (b), an interdict restraining defendant from trespassing on the land of the plaintiff, and (d) costs of suit. The plaintiff had waived his claim for damages.

Judgment was entered accordingly.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and a Jury.]

SOOYE V. LAWRENCE AND CO. { 1904.
AND OTHERS. { Oct. 18th.
FOR V. LAWRENCE AND CO. { Nov. 15th.
AND OTHERS.

Fraudulent insolvency—Sale by insolvent—Bona fides—Consideration—Illegal seizure.

Y., a general dealer, sold his shop, fittings, good-will, &c., to one S. At the time of the sale Y. was insolvent. The creditors of Y. thereupon attached his premises and such goods as they found. Thereupon S. claimed possession of the shop, restoration of the goods and damages. A jury found that the sale was not bona fide, and returned a verdict for the defendants.

In the second case, on the plaintiff's default, the Court granted absolution from the instance with costs.

This was an action brought by one Hew Sooye, of Wynberg, against (1) B. Lawrence and Co. (2) Wiener and Co., and (3) A. L. Foot.

The action against the 3rd defendant was for the possession of a certain shop and certain goods therein attached. Against all defendants (the one paying, the others to be absolved), defendant claimed (a) £400 as and for damages, alternative relief and costs.

Plaintiff's declaration was as follows:—

1 The plaintiff (Hew Sooye) resides at Wynberg, Cape Division, where he carries on business as a general dealer.

The first two defendants (B. Lawrence and Co., Ltd., and Wiener and Co., Ltd.) are companies, registered with limited liability under Act 25 of 1892, and carry on business separately as merchants in Cape Town.

The third defendant (Alfred Newton Foot) is sued herein as the duly appointed trustee of the insolvent estate of Ah Young.

2. Previous to and in the month of March, 1904, the said Ah Young was carrying on business as a general dealer in a certain shop in Ottery-road, Wynberg, which he hired from one Carl Carles.

3. On or about the 21st March, 1904, by an agreement in writing, the plaintiff purchased, and the said Ah Young sold all his interests and goodwill in the tenancy of the said shop, and the stock-in-trade, goods, fittings, and effects in and upon the premises for the sum of £50, payable as to £14 in cash, as to £11 by a promissory note due on the 26th of March, and as to £25 by a promissory note due on the 21st May, 1904. It was also agreed that possession of the shop and delivery of the stock, fixtures, etc., should be given and taken forthwith. The said sale and purchase was a bona fide one for just and valuable consideration.

4. The plaintiff accordingly, on the same day, took possession of the premises and delivery of the stock, fixtures, etc., and he on that day also made an agreement with the owner of the premises by which he hired them from that date at a monthly rental of £5, and in further consideration of his paying half the water and the tenant's rates as the same fell due. Plaintiff duly paid the £14 cash, and signed the promissory notes as stipulated. He has furthermore duly paid the promissory note for £11 at maturity. He has not paid the promissory note for £25 by reason of the facts hereinafter set forth, but has at all times been willing, and has offered to pay, and is still willing to pay the said sum on the release of his shop and goods from the attachment hereinafter referred to.

5. Thereafter and until the 23rd day of April, 1904, the plaintiff carried on the business of a general dealer in the said shop, with the said goods so purchased, and with other goods to the value of about £100 purchased by him from other and independent dealers. On the 23rd of April there were goods to the value of about £95 ls. 8d. in the shop.

6. On or about the 15th of April, 1904, the two first-named defendants, acting in concert as creditors of the said Ah Young, petitioned this Honourable Court, and obtained a provisional order for the sequestration of the estate of the said Ah Young as insolvent. In their joint petition they wrongfully, unlawfully, maliciously, and recklessly stated that the sale hereinbefore referred to was made fraudulently and collusively with intent to defeat or delay them in obtaining payment of their debts.

7. On the 23rd of April, 1904, the Messenger of the Master of this Hon. Court proceeded to the shop aforesaid, for the purpose of entering and laying an attachment on the estate of the said Ah Young, in terms of sections 13 and 14 of Ordinance 6 of 1845, and was for that purpose, and in accordance with the said sections, accompanied by the duly authorised and empowered representatives of the first two defendants.

8. By and in consequence of the instigation, procurement, and direction of the said representatives, who were clothed with full powers thereto by their principals, the said Messenger in pretended or intended execution of his duty as aforesaid, wrongfully and unlawfully entered and laid attachment upon all the goods in the said shop belonging to plaintiff, and further wrongfully and unlawfully ejected the plaintiff from the shop and sealed and closed up the same notwithstanding that the plaintiff protested against their wrongful and unlawful conduct, and notified the Messenger and the said representatives of the facts alleged in paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 hereof.

9. Thereafter the plaintiff gave due notice to the Master and to the petitioning creditors of the facts hereinbefore set forth, protested to them against the aforesaid acts of their representatives, and claimed possession of his shop and the release of his goods, but notwithstanding this, the petitioning creditors and the Master, by their instigation and procurement, adopted and ratified what their several representatives had done, and wrongfully and unlawfully continued the said retention of the shop and goods.

10. Thereafter, on 25th of May, 1904, the petitioning creditors obtained the final adjudication of the estate of Ah Young as insolvent, and the third defendant was subsequently duly confirmed as trustee of the said estate. The above-stated facts were duly notified to him, and the abovementioned claim was then made to him, but, despite this, he has wrongfully and unlawfully, and by the instigation and procurement of the other defendants retained possession of the shop and goods, and refused to hand them over to plaintiff.

11. By reason of the premises, the plaintiff has been debarred from carrying on business in the shop, has suffered damage in his credit and reputation, has lost the use and profit of his goods, and has thereby and otherwise sustained damage in the sum of £400.

Wherefore plaintiff claims: (1) As against the third defendant: (a) The restoration of the possession of the shop from which he was illegally ejected; (b) the restoration of the goods attached in the shop, or the payment of £95 ls. 8d. their value. (2) As against all the defendants: (c) The sum of £400 as and for damages as aforesaid; (d) alternative relief; (e) costs of suit.

Defendants, in their plea, stated that the alleged sale or alienation by Ah Young was a fraud upon the creditors, and null and void, and was made at a time when his liabilities exceeded his assets. They admitted that the goods in the shop were attached, but denied that the plaintiff claimed or pointed out any particular goods as being goods purchased by him after the alleged sale. Defendants prayed that the plaintiff's claim be dismissed, with costs; that the said sale be declared null and void; alternative relief; and costs of suit.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan, with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers, was for the plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C., with him Mr. Rainsford, was for the defendants.

Mr. Buchanan said that this case and that of For v. Lawrence and Co. and Others were practically on the same lines, with certain exceptions. On Monday they found that the plaintiff, in one of the cases, Shene For, was at Port Elizabeth, and that he had not come to town. Counsel was informed that he had written a letter saying that he could not get a permit to come there, and also that his father was ill.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Which is the real reason?]

Mr. Buchanan: I am only telling your lordship what I have been told myself. Counsel added that he did not intend to proceed with that case at present, as he had not yet seen the plaintiff. He would suggest that the case should be postponed. He was at present only prepared to go on with the case of Hew Sooye.

De Villiers, C.J. said that he would consider the position of affairs in connection with the case of Shene For, when he had heard the other case.

Mr. Buchanan said that the question for the jury to determine was whether the sale was bona fide, and whether a just and reasonable value was given for the goods by the plaintiff.

Hew Sooye (the plaintiff) said that he came out to this country about ten years ago, and had been living and trading in Kimberley. He removed to the Cape in December last, bringing with him £120. He wanted a shop, and ultimately he entered into negotiations with Ah Young in March for the purchase of the shop. Young told him that he could not get goods from the merchants to carry on the business. Witness saw Mr. Brady, and then arranged with certain of his friends to go down and take stock. The items were written in a stock-book (produced). The amount of the stock was £50 1s. 4d. Witness offered to pay half down and the rest afterwards. Young agreed, and told him to pay Mr. Brady. He paid in March, and was to have paid another instalment in May, but the shop was closed by the creditors before this second note matured, and, as a consequence, he had not paid the balance of £25. Witness produced the agreement of lease of the shop and his trader's licence. He obtained, he said, further goods for the shop from Messrs. Lensvelt, Thornton, Fergusson, Watts, and Johnson. He produced a cash-book showing his sales up to the 23rd April, when his place was closed. He also produced a book showing his purchases of goods for the shop. Proceeding, he said that on the 23rd April, about 10 a.m., the Messenger of the Court and another gentleman he believed Mr. Woods called at the shop, and the former told him that he must go out. Witness asked them why, and said he had bought the shop. They told him that he could take out things for his own use. Witness went out, and the shop was locked up. He saw Mr. Brady, and correspondence followed. In consequence of the closing of the shop, he had sustained damage by reason of losing the profits of trading. He only got the goods for the shop on the 29th June. The premises had now been let to someone else. He could not say whether the stand was a particularly good one, because he had only been in the shop about a month before he was ejected. The value of the goods in the shop at that time was about £100. He did not know what the goods were worth at present; he believed that they had gone bad. He had not been able to obtain another shop. During the four weeks he was at the shop, his takings were £41. When he was at Kimberley, he could make £35 profit on £100 takings.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: When he was ordered out of the shop, he filled a box with clothing and books, including the sales' books. He did not mention in his affidavit that a stock-book was prepared, because he was not asked about it by Mr. Brady.

Sir H. Juta said that it was of great importance that this stock-book should have been produced before, because the point of the case was that it was alleged that goods of the value of over £100 had been sold to plaintiff for £50.

Witness (further cross-examined) said that he entered the sales in his book each day. After Ah Young sold the shop to him, Ah Young used to come and smoke opium with him. When he took the shop from Ah Young, he did not inquire what Ah Young's position was. He was not told that there were judgements against Ah Young. Ah Young did not tell him that he owed £425. When the Messenger came, he told him that Ah Young was not in the house. Ah Young was at the back of the premises, lying drunk with opium. Witness had not tried elsewhere to obtain a shop.

Arthur Edward Coomer said he remembered selling goods to Sooye on 13th April, to the value of nearly £6.

Lee Johnson, general dealer, of Claremont, stated that he had sold goods to plaintiff.

Carl Carlse stated that Young rented a shop from witness in Ottery-road, Wynberg, for five years. On March 21 of this year he let the shop to Sooye. Sooye promised to pay him the rent, but, owing to the shop being closed up, he was unable to pay.

Elizabeth Carlse stated that she had drawn up the agreement (produced) between her father, the previous witness, and Sooye, and had signed it as a witness.

John Fong, carrying on business at Wynberg as Ah Shene and Co., stated that he was present in Young's store when the sale took place to Sooye. Witness, with the help of others, took stock. They valued the goods at the price for which they could obtain them from the merchants. Witness had sold goods to Sooye to the extent of £4 7s. 9d.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He knew nothing about the judgment against Young.

Mr. Burfort, Messenger to the Master of the Supreme Court, said that Sooye was not allowed to take anything out of the shop. Witness closed and sealed the shop at Wood's request.

By the Court: The name of Ah Young was on a sign outside the door about a month afterwards.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He did not find any books on the premises. He found Ah Young at the back of the shop, lying down on a mattress. He was in a stupid condition.

Sing Ah, general dealer, of Sussex-road, Wynberg, said he had been a grocer for five years. On the 20th March he assisted in the stock-taking at Ah Young's shop, and made the entries in the book. Three other Chinamen put down the prices, entering the cost price in each case. The total was £50 1s. 4d.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: Witness had not been working since he came to the Cape from East London about a year ago. He had not been employed by Sooye.

The witness Burfort (recalled) said that Sing Ah was looking after the shop when he went there to close the place. Sing Ah told them that Ah Young had gone to Cape Town, and that the business did not belong to him.

Sing Ah was cross-examined at some length in reference to the entries in the stock-book, which were written in Chinese characters.

The witness Burfort (recalled by the Court) said that he did not tell Sooye that he could take his own things. He considered that all the goods in the shop belonged to Ah Young.

Louis Julien Ah Lien, grocer, Diep River, who said that he was a Creole from Mauritius, also gave evidence as to the stock-taking, when Sooye went into the shop. He said that the profits of a business of this kind fluctuated from 10 per cent. to 50 per cent.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He admitted that in an affidavit he used the expression that he had made "a careful inspection" of the stock. He did not say in the affidavit that he took part in the stock-taking, but he told Mr. Brady (the attorney) that he did. He took stock in a book similar to the sales' book.

Leopold Lobascher, auctioneer and valuer, Wynberg, said he went with the Messenger of the Court to value the goods in the shop on the 11th May last. He put down their worth at £95. At a forced sale he should think the goods would make their market value within 5 per cent. Groceries, as a rule, fetched at auction pretty well up to their market value. Witness was accompanied by Mr. Owens, grocer, Church-street, and they went over every line together.

Thomas Edwin Owens, grocer, late of Wynberg, gave corroborative evidence as to the stock-taking he made in company with Mr. Lobascher. The stock, valued at cost price, worked out at £95. At a forced sale, the goods would not make anything like so much—perhaps £50.

Mr. Buchanan closed his case.

Sir H. Juta, for the defendants, put in records of proceedings in the insolvency of Ah Young, and of judgments obtained against Ah Young. He said it was admitted that the defendants were creditors of Ah Young at the beginning of March to the amount of £425.

Alfred Newton Foot, trustee in the insolvent estate of Ah Young, stated the provisional order was granted on the 15th April. The insolvent handed over no property, but certain attachments were made by the Messenger of the Court. There were no books. The shop was alleged to be sold to Hew Sooye for £50. On the 30th June, he removed the goods, and handed the shops back to the respective landlords. Last week he inspected the books of Hew Sooye, and he thought the books had not been in use very long.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Before moving the goods, he ascertained what position would be taken up. His object in moving the goods was to save the creditors the rent. He would value the goods at about £100 on a forced sale. The insolvent said that his assistant had taken the books away.

William Wood stated that last December, and up to March, he was in the employ of Messrs. Lawrence and Co. In December last year he was their traveller, and he knew Ah Young's shops very well. In December he inspected Ah Young's stock, with a view to giving him further credit. The value of the stock in Hew Sooye's shop was about £250, and the value of the stock in the other shop about £400. About the 22nd March Hew Sooye told him he bought the shop from Ah Young. On that date the value of the stock was not less than £100. In consequence of what he saw, the proceedings in the insolvency action were taken. After seeing the stock in December, he gave credit to Ah Young.

When he went to the shop with the Messenger, Hew Sooye told him again that Ah Young was in town, but again they found him in the back room. When he visited the shop on that occasion, nothing had been removed.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He noticed a depletion of the stock in his visits to the shop—a depletion that was not gradual, but sudden. There was sufficient depletion to make him suspicious. The considerable depletion was about the end of February or the beginning of March. Previous to that, it was gradual. When he went with the Messenger of the Court to the premises, he estimated the value of the goods and fixtures at £100; there was about the same as on March 23. He allowed about £5 for fixtures.

Frederick K. Wiener, managing director of Wiener and Co., said that he went out to the shop, which purported to have been sold to Hew Sooye, who showed him a receipt for the purchase of the business for £50. He had a glance round at the shop, and, from his view, he should say that the stock was worth about £100. On leaving, he communicated with the other creditors. He had seen the shop about two months previously, and, upon comparison, he found that the stock was considerably less on the second occasion. After the shop had been closed, the stock was removed, in order to save the rent, to Wiener's store. The stock was considerably less at that time than it seemed to be when he saw it in the shop. Sooye seemed to him to be drunk, when witness called. He could not say whether the man had been smoking opium.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Certain goods were sent out to Ah Young in March, but, owing to a dispute, a certain proportion, valued at about £7, was returned.

Bruce Fleming (13), of Ottery-road, Wynberg, said that he knew the shops where Ah Young's name was. He saw the shop sealed by the Messenger of the Master. In the evening he saw a Chinaman coming out of the premises; he did not know his name.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He saw the door afterwards. The tape had been broken. The Chinaman came from the side, not from the shop entrance.

B. Jaffe, produce dealer, Wynberg, said that he had obtained a judgment against Ah Young about the 28th March. He saw a man in the shop, who told him to come on Friday morning, and who promised to pay him £2 a week. The amount was paid the first week, but not afterwards. He estimated the value of the stock, when he last saw it, at about £200; this would be about a week after he got his judgment. He was not told that the shop had been sold to Hew Sooye.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan:

The sum of £2 was paid to witness's lawyers. In April witness delivered goods to the shop; he gave receipts in Hew Sooye's name.

Louis Vickar, shopkeeper, and baker, Constantia, said that he used to supply Ah Young with bread for several months. Ah Young did not pay the money he owed him, and witness put the matter in the hands of an agent. Ah Young made an offer, but failed to carry it out, and witness afterwards saw Ah Young's attorney, Mr. Brady, who told him that Sooye had bought the shop for £50. He valued the stock at that time at about £200.

Geo. Arthur Jopp, a director of Lawrence and Co., produced a copy of the account of Ah Young with his firm, who were the second largest creditors. He had seen vouchers of purchases by Hew Sooye from other people. The value of the purchases from Jensen was about £54. In January, February, and March, Jensen bought from his firm goods to the value of £128 11s. 8d.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: They stopped delivering to Ah Young in December last. He did not remember whether he told the Messenger, that they wanted to make a test case of this matter. He did not take the trouble to satisfy himself as to the purchases by Hew Sooye from Lensvelt, Jensen, and others. He took up the broad position that the sale was a fraudulent one; he thought the information they had was quite sufficient.

Gus. Marlowe, an employee of Wiener and Co., produced the accounts of Jensen and Ah Young, with his firm.

Percy Stanley, an employee of Bennett and Baker, retail grocers, spoke to having made a valuation of the stock in the shop on the 9th May. The amount arrived at was £109 7s. 9d.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He should say that the goods at a forced sale would make £100. He had never been at a forced sale. Some of the goods would since have deteriorated, but not the tinned goods.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Mr. Buchanan submitted that it had been clearly shown that Hew Sooye had made purchases from independent sources between the 21st March, when he took over the place, and the 23rd April, when the business was attached. He submitted that it was perfectly clear that Sooye had bought goods from the merchants of the value of £90, and that these had been wrongfully attached. The plaintiff had been deprived of the use of the shop directly by the defendants until the end of June, when the shop was let to someone else. There could be no question of restoration of possession, but there was a question of damages. He contended that the sale by Ah Young to Hew Sooye of the business was bona fide, and for a just and valuable consideration. He com-nounced on the absence of motive on the part of Ah Young or Hew Sooye; he contended that if there had been any intention of conspiracy Ah Young and Sooye would not have called in five or six other Chinese to assist in the stock-taking; the whole theory of a conspiracy was, he urged, very improbable indeed. The Chinese witnesses, although they had all been ordered out of court, had given a perfectly consistent story, even despite the skill in cross-examination of his learned friend. In regard to the Chinese stock-book used when Hew Sooye took over the business, counsel contended that the fact that Mr. Foot did not get this in his possession under the notice of avail was not an element against the plaintiff. Mr. Foot did not take with him a Chinese interpreter when he went to see the books; hence he did not understand the importance of this stock-book. This book, counsel submitted, supported the sale as a bona fide transaction between Ah Young and Hew Sooye. Whatever Ah Young's position financially may have been, Hew Sooye knew nothing at all about it; Ah Young had not attempted to defraud his creditors but, as a matter of fact, had acted in the interests of his creditors in selling the business to Sooye for £50. Sooye had told a consistent story throughout, but the creditors refused to believe it and had said all along, "No, we will make a test case of this." The creditors seemed to have been determined to close their eyes to everything except this supposed fraudulent sale. He urged that the jury should award substantial damages, and thus mark their sense of the callous and heartless conduct of the defendants. After all, a Chinaman had his feelings, and he had a reputation to uphold as a trader.

[De Villiers, (C.J.): There is no allegation of fraud in the documents which have been put in.]

Mr. Buchanan explained that he had been under the impression that documents embodying such a charge had been put in. Proceeding, he said that if fraud was not alleged, it was alleged that Ah Young acted malu fide. There was no necessity, he contended, to eject Hew Sooye from the shop; he could have been left in the shop and allowed to sell his goods.

Sir H. Juta said the main question was as regarded the sale by Ah Young to Hew Sooye. On the 21st March Ah Young was hopelessly insolvent, and his liabilities were over £400. The jury were asked to believe that when the transaction took place on the Sunday, there was no mention of the two summonses against Ah Young. The next question was, what was the value of the goods in the shop of Hew Sooye at the time of the alleged sale, and that was the point that instigated the proceedings. If the sale had been a bona fide one for just and valuable consideration, the gentlemen who saw the stock would never have troubled about any proceedings; they would have been very glad to have had the £50 from Hew Sooye. It was highly improbable that Wiener's representative had said that £50 was a fair value for the stock, when he immediately went to see the other creditors. There had been a deal made of Hew Sooye's consistency in writing letters, but he did nothing else. Why did he not take immediate action for possession of the shop? Could they believe, if the Chinaman had brought the book containing the entries of the stock to the attorney, that he would not have mentioned it in the affidavits? It was not too much to say that it was a most extraordinary business, and there was something else which made it look funny. How did those books come here? It was unlikely that the Messenger and Mr. Wood would allow the bland Hew Sooye to take a big box out when they closed the shop. They could imagine a merchant who had suspicion about the dealings of a shop allowing Hew Sooye to take out the books. Supposing that the attorney had forgotten the main point of the case, it was his duty to come forward and state that he had overlooked it. With the exception of Hew Sooye, all the other Chinamen merely kept invoices of their purchases, but Hew Sooye had gone one better, and produced a couple of nice clean books. Looking at the sales, it was rather remarkable that in that neighbourhood the humble copper was unknown. No, they only dealt in shillings there. Out of ten days' sales, seven amounted to 20s., a couple 15s., and one 28s., while on Saturday it ran into pounds. They would notice that the humble copper, the humble tickety, the humble sixpence, and the humble ninepence did not count there, and they would also notice the different handwriting in the book. £50 or £60 was not much to firms like Wiener or Lawrence, and it was difficult to see why they should take action if they thought it was a bona fide sale. There was no evidence to show what portion of the goods belonged to the plaintiff at the time of the attachment.

Mr. Buchanan (in reply) pointed out that the Messenger of the Court had no right to attach Hew Sooye's books. It was quite a reasonable assumption that the coppers were left in the till, and nothing but the shillings taken out at the end of each day. The defendants did not know at the time what had become of the £50, otherwise there might have been no action taken in the first instance. It was quite clear, counsel urged, that in regard to £50 at least, there had been illegal attachment, and it was impossible for the defendants to get out of it.

De Villiers, C.J. put it to Sir H. Juta, whether, if the sale were declared null and void, the £25 paid by Sooye should not be paid back to him.

Sir H. Juta said that the defendants had not got the money. It was in the hands of Mr. Brady, the attorney. He should not object to the money being refunded to Sooye.

De Villiers, C.J.: As to the first part of the claim, the trustee cannot restore possession of the shop to Sooye. As to the next item, restoration of goods, or payment of value, £92, the decision of that question will mainly depend on the view the jury take of another question, viz., whether the sale was bona fide, and whether it was made at a time when Ah Young's liabilities exceeded his assets, and whether it was for just and valuable consideration. In regard to the goods, the jury will have to decide what was the value of the goods at the time when Sooye took over the shop. For the plaintiff, it is said that the goods were of the value of £50, and for the defendants, £100. That would be a sufficient difference to make the sale not be for just and valuable consideration. It is clear that Ah Young was hopelessly insolvent when the sale to Sooye was made; not only that, but there were judgments being taken out against him. There was a judgment to be issued on the day following the sale, and when the Messenger went to the shop, he was told that the business had been sold. Something has been said about the abuse of the plaintiff's attorney. It is a case in which I must express some surprise at the assistance given by the attorney to the parties under the special circumstances of the case, because, according to the record in the Magistrate's Office, the attorney who drew up the agreement of sale was the agent appearing for Ah Young in the Magistrate's Court. He, therefore, was fully cognizant of the fact that there were certain summonses to be heard in the Magistrate's Court against Ah Young, and, with that full knowledge, he drew up, apparently, the agreement of sale; or, at all events, if he did not draw it up, he appeared as one of the witnesses to that agreement. I wish to say one word more upon that point, that it is to be regretted that the attorney himself was not called as a witness, in order to elucidate a great many points which in my opinion required elucidation. I am satisfied that the attorney might, if he had been called, have thrown some light upon other somewhat obscure points, more especially in regard to the stock book. The witnesses for the plaintiff were Chinamen, and I need hardly tell the jury that, although Chinamen, they must speak the truth. I will give the jury this general warning—that they should not allow any prejudice that they might have against the plaintiff, owing to his race, to influence their minds in the present case. Hew Sooye was a Chinaman, no doubt; but he is entitled to as much justice at the hands of the jury as any other person who comes here. On the other hand, the plaintiff is not entitled to more than justice. If the jury find for the plaintiff on the alleged sale of goods to him by Jansen and others, and also on the sale by Ah Young, they will find for the plaintiff for at least £98. If they find for the plaintiff on the sales by Jansen only, then they will find for £48. In regard to the general claim for damages, that will be a matter for the jury to decide. If they come to the conclusion that the sale was a bona fide one from Ah Young to Hew Sooye, I confess that the plaintiff would be entitled to some damages. The question of assessing general damages will, I recognise, be complicated by the fact that the plaintiff's books have been entered up in a language which, to say the least, was unintelligible.

The jury retired at 3.15 p.m. to consider their verdict, and returned into Court at 4.17, having found that the sale was not a bona fide one, and with a verdict for the defendants on the claim in convention, and also on the claim in reconvention.

Judgment was entered accordingly, with costs.

In the other action, arising out of the insolvency of Ah Young, instituted by Shene For, Mr. Buchanan, for the plaintiff, applied for a postponement.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the defendants, objected, pointing out that the case was set down for the 12th September.

Mr. Buchanan said the postponement would give the plaintiff a chance of not incurring further expense.

De Villiers, C.J., ordered the case to stand over until the 15th November, provided that in the meantime the defendants' costs of that day to be paid by the plaintiff.

Postea (Nov. 15th).

The case of Sheen For v. Lawrence and Co. and others was heard by De Villiers, C.J., without a jury.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., appeared for the defendants. There was no appearance of the plaintiff. Counsel stated that his lordship would recollect that this case and another, brought by Ah Young, had been joined together for hearing, and on the day when the case was called, a postponement in this particular instance was applied for and granted until to-day. He could quite understand, in view of the result of the other case, that there was no appearance to-day. He moved for judgment for the defendants on the claim in convention, and for the defendants (now plaintiffs) in the claim in reconvention. He took it that this was a liquid claim for damages. The claim in reconvention was that an alleged sale may be declared an undue preference, in terms of section 64 of the Insolvency Ordinance, and also for forfeiture.

De Villiers, C. J., said he was by no means sure that this was a liquid claim, and it seemed to him that the Court should have some evidence of insolvency, and so forth. He knew that the Court had treated ejectment as a liquid demand, but undue preference seemed to him to be on a different footing.

Sir H. Juta having been heard further in support of the procedure under which he was moving the Court, De Villiers, C.J., said that he could not help feeling that the plaintiff might not have considered this matter of the claim in reconvention. He thought the matter had perhaps better stand over sine die.

Sir H. Juta said his clients were not prepared to incur further expense, and he would be prepared to consent to absolution from the instance.

De Villiers, C.J., said that there would be absolution from the instance on the claim in convention, and on the claim in reconvention, plaintiff to pay costs.

[Plaintiff's Attorney: C. Brady. Defendants' Attorneys: Moore and Son.]

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

STANSFIELD V. STANSFIELD. } 1904.
Oct. 18th.

In this action the plaintiff, Alfred Thos. Jones Stansfield, of Lower Main-road, Observatory, sought a decree of divorce against his wife Weselina Magdalene Stansfield, because of her desertion.

Mr. Rainsford appeared for the applicant.

Mr. Birch, of the Colonial Secretary's Office, proved the marriage.

Alfred Thos. Jones Stansfield stated he was plaintiff in the action, and resided at Lower Main-road, Observatory. He was married to respondent in 1899 at Griquatown. They lived on good terms for some time, after which some unpleasantness occurred, owing to her intimacy with some male friends. In November last, when he returned from business, he found the following letter awaiting him:

"I am going away never to return again. You, whom I trusted once, has driven me to all this. I will go before you disgrace me, as you told me yesterday. You must not think that I am a dog. I am not going to be insulted by you any longer. You call me names which you could never prove. You told me to take the child and go; so I will. You need not seek me, for I shall never come back. I hope you will keep your house clean, for I am too bad to do so. I tried you for a long time to see if you would not be kinder to me, but all in vain. You treated me worse than a dog. I hate you, and I hate all men. I will never trust a man again. Pay the grocer. That is all. I am going up-country. Good-bye for ever,

"WESSELINA.

"P.S.—I hope you will save a lot of money now. I do not want it."

To the Court: Witness called her no names. He quarrelled with her over money matters. He complained of her extravagance, and her being out late at night.

In examination-in-chief, witness (continuing) stated he had repeatedly asked his wife to return to him, but she refused. She was at present living in Roger-street, Cape Town. There were two children issue of the marriage, one of whom was dead. The other was living with witness.

To the Court: Witness was at present living in lodgings, and had the child there with him. The defendant had no parents living.

The Court ordered the defendant to return to plaintiff on or before November 1, failing which, a decree of divorce would be granted.

Postea (Nov. 14). Rule absolute. Plaintiff to have custody of child, defendant to forfeit all benefits.

LLOYD V. LLOYD.

In this action, John Edward Lloyd, of Cape Town, claimed a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, and failing compliance therewith, divorce from his wife, on the grounds of malicious desertion.

Mr. Bisset appeared for plaintiff.

The plaintiff's declaration stated that he was married to the defendant on the 6th August, 1902, in community of property. On the 15th January last she deserted him.

Mr. Birch, of the Colonial Secretary's Office, proved the marriage.

The plaintiff stated he was married to the defendant on the 16th August, 1902. There was no issue of the marriage. They lived together until January, 1904, when some disagreement rose between them, and she left him. His wife was very fond of the stage, and wanted to go on it. He objected to this, so she left him and went to England. He had repeatedly asked her to return, but she refused to do so. He was willing to receive her back, if she consented.

To the Court: He knew she was going to England. She had £400 of her own. Witness gave it to her as presents from time to time. She first informed him in June, 1903, that she intended leaving him. She had previous to his marrying her been on the stage in Cape Town.

The defendant was ordered to return to plaintiff on or before the 15th January, failing which a decree of divorce would be granted.

VAN EADEN V. VAN EADEN.

In this action the plaintiff, Johanna van Eaden, sued the defendant, Benjamin Jacobus van Eaden, for judicial separation. There was a claim in reconvention by the husband for restitution of conjugal rights. The parties reside at Van Rhynsdorp.

Mr Gardiner appeared for the applicant, and Mr. Upington appeared for the defendant.

The plaintiff's declaration stated that they were married at Van Rhynsdorp, on the 30th December, 1902. At various times since, her husband had cruelly ill-treated her, and was habitually intemperate.

The defendant's plea denied these statements, and added that his wife had deserted him on the 4th December, 1903, and would not return to him.

In reply to an inquiry from the Court as to whether there was any chance of an amicable agreement being come to between the parties, counsel consulted with their clients.

Mr. Upington said his client was prepared to consent to an order being given for the judicial separation, and the division of the joint estate, if the Court ordered each party to pay their own costs. A point that would, however, require argument by counsel was the question of the costs of a motion for the payment of alimony made by the present plaintiff. He (Mr. Upington) submitted that although his client was unsuccessful in opposing the motion, yet he should not be asked to be out of pocket to that extent.

Mr. Gardiner contended that owing to the obstinacy of the defendants they were compelled to bring the case into court, so he thought they should not be asked to pay the costs now.

Buchanan, J., said he thought the parties had acted very wisely in consenting to an order, as it saved dragging private matters into court. An order would be made for the judicial separation of the parties, and the division of the joint estate. The joint estate was to be valued, and the defendant was to pay out one-half to the plaintiff. Each party to pay their own costs. The amount paid to plaintiff as alimony to be detained by the plaintiff.

HEHIR V. TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD Loss of goods—Liability of bailee.

In this action John Hehir, of Cape Town, sued the Table Bay Harbour Board for £155 damages, sustained by plaintiff, through the non-delivery of a case containing wearing apparel entrusted to their care for delivery.

The plaintiff's declaration stated that he was a butcher by trade, and the defendants were the Table Bay Harbour Board. By virtue of the powers conferred on them the defendants landed, cleared, and delivered goods from vessels to consignees. The defendants received from the S.S. Sophocles certain goods, the property of the plaintiff, and it became their duty to deliver them to plaintiff, which they had failed to do. The value of the goods contained in the case was £155 2s. Plaintiff had always been ready and willing to pay the charges for landing and delivery of goods when they were handed over to him.

The defendants' plea admitted the receipt of the goods, and also admitted that it was their duty to deliver the goods. The defendants delivered the case to the Imperial military authorities, at Cape Town, together with other military baggage. They contended that they were in no case liable for value exceeding £100, unless double rates had been paid. The defendants tendered plaintiff £30, which he refused to accept.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. W. P. Schreiner (with him Mr. McGregor) for the defendant.

The plaintiff stated he was at present working for the Cape Town City Council. In 1901 he came to South Africa with one of the Australian contingents. Prior to leaving, he placed the case in a store-room in Sydney. He made a list of the things he packed. He returned to Australia in April, 1902. He lost the original list of goods in the box, but before that he copied the original into a notebook. That was in December, 1902.

Mr. Schreiner objected to the list being put into court, as the box had been lost at that time.

Witness (continuing) said he would swear that the list put in was a correct list of what was in the box. On arriving in South Africa, he directed the agents at Sydney to forward his box, but he never received it. The baggage was not labelled "Military."

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The case came out in November, 1901, and it was not until November, 1903, that he heard it had been lost. He had communicated with Messrs. Hutton and Co. through his agents at Sydney, and had endeavoured to see them personally before sailing for Australia, but was unable to do so, as the ship sailed somewhat hurriedly. Witness packed three dress suits, for which he claimed £10 each. Witness reduced the amount of his claim by £47, from what it originally was. Witness did not know the case was lost when he copied the list of contents. His case measured 3 by 3 by 5. He denied that it was less.

Heming John Pinock stated he was a member of the firm of Messrs. Hutton and Co., shipping agents. He received a bill of lading for a certain case, but in moving their office it had become mislaid. In claiming against the Harbour Board for the case he claimed £20. He was not sure how that amount was arrived at. It might have been on the way bill, or might have been in accordance with an average, they struck for such cases. He had no authority from plaintiff to make the valuation. He marked it "pro forma." Witness received a list of the goods contained in the case, from plaintiff's attorneys, which he forwarded to the Harbour Board.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Witness was inclined to think that the valuation on the way bill was £15. Witness knew that the case contained wearing apparel. Witness would not make representations to the Customs unless they were verified by the way bill. Witness applied to the Customs to admit free of duty "used wearing apparel of no commercial value." The plaintiff's address was given to witness as "Trooper Hehir, 3 M.R." At the time the case arrived, the Docks were in a state of chaos, and witness had two clerks engaged searching out cases. A case that accompanied plaintiffs was found in the following August.

A clerk in the employment of the Customs stated that if a case such as that under dispute went past the gates on a military wagon, it would not be charged on. If a number of new suits were in the case, they would not be allowed in duty free.

Mr. Gardiner closed his case.

For the defence, Joseph Gray Day, manager for Messrs. H. W. Markham and Co., stated he had tried packing clothes for the present case. The trunk (produced) was 4.4 cubic feet. It would be impossible to get what the plaintiff said he had in his box with the box produced. It would require a trunk a little over double the size of the one produced to get all the goods in. Witness valued the goods claimed for by the plaintiff at £145. That was for new goods, and was a very high rate. The quality of the goods claimed for by the plaintiff must have been better than he had ever seen stocked. He had not seen collars at 30s. a dozen, nor shirts at £5 10s. per half dozen.

David McLeod stated he was foreman at the Docks, and in 1901 and 1902 he was stationed at the Loch Jetty Store. A tin trunk, addressed to "Trooper Hehir," arrived in November, 1901, and in the following February was handed over to the military. He remembered the case, and to the best of his belief, it was not larger than that produced. He entered it as a quarter-ton case, and would not have done so had it been a case 3 x 3 x 5.

Alexander Forsyth Girdwood, Chief Claims Clerk to the Harbour Board, stated he had the inquiry with regard to the case in question in hand. It was placed in the Loch Jetty Store, and remained there until August 11, when it was removed to the "Dump." The first inquiry about the case was in July, 1903. The military authorities claimed all the baggage addressed to them. The correspondence, with regard to this, had been put into Court. Mr. Pinock sent in a claim for £20. The claim for charges and dock dues was three-eighth per cent. of the ad valorem value, and 1s. 2d. was paid for the box. He had seen Mr. Day packing the articles into the case produced, and agreed with his evidence. If the case had been 3 x 3 x 5, it would have ranked as a ton and a quarter, whereas it was only tabulated as quarter of a ton.

Counsel then argued on the facts.

Buchanan, J.: The plaintiff in this case enrolled himself as a trooper in one of the Australian contingents, and left Australia for this Colony in 1901. Before leaving Sydney, plaintiff himself packed his wearing apparel in a case, which he locked, and delivered to Messrs. Heaton and Co., forwarding agents, for the purpose of being sent to Cape Town. The plaintiff came to South Africa, and as he was engaged in the field the whole time he did not need his clothes then. On his way home with his detachment while in Cape Town he endeavoured to see Messrs. Hutton and Co., to whom the goods had been consigned by Heaton and Co., but being under military orders, and being here only a few hours, he failed to discover their whereabouts. On returning to Australia, his agents wrote to Messrs. Hutton and Co., asking them to send back the box, but the plaintiff shortly afterwards countermanded that order. The plaintiff then left Sydney, and arrived in Natal. He was then for the first time informed by Hutton and Co. that his box was mislaid. Hutton and Co. said that, although they had paid the dock dues, and had searched for the box, they were unable to find it. The Harbour Board admitted the receipt of the box, and that it was their duty to hand it over to the plaintiff, but they state that they handed it over to the military authorities. They said this to show what had become of the goods, and did not to set it up as a defence. They offered the plaintiff £30 as compensation for his loss, which he estimated at £155, or thereabouts, though he has now reduced his valuation to a little over £130. The question the Court has to decide is the value of the goods. Mr. Day has given valuable evidence on this point. In the first place he has gone over the list, and states that if the goods were new and of the best quality, they would be worth £143. Hutton and Co., without authority from plaintiff, and not knowing the contents of the box, declared the value originally at £15. Looking at all the evidence in the case, and the want of authority from the plaintiff to Hutton and Co., I do not think that precluded plaintiff from claiming the full value of the goods. It is true Hutton and Co. paid dock dues on their valuation, but the under payment of dock charges does not affect the admitted duty on the defendants duly to deliver the box. The plaintiff says the size of the box in which he packed the goods was 3 x 3 x 5, and a box of that size would measure more than a ton, whereas the plaintiff's box is entered on the ship's papers as measuring 9 cubic feet. But here again Mr. Day's evidence is most useful. He says that he found that by actual experiment a box of less than 9 cubic feet would hold all the goods enumerated in plaintiff's list. From my experience of such cases I am not inclined to put too great faith in the value which a person estimates his possessions at when lost under such circumstances. But Mr. Day has said that the goods could be replaced new at £143, and I think that in awarding the plaintiff one-third of that sum, I will be giving a fair compensation for the loss of his second-hand clothing. I paid careful attention to the way in which plaintiff gave his evidence, and I see no reason to discredit the evidence given by him. There will be judgment for plaintiff for £50, and costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

Ex parte CREDITORS of J. 1904.
GORDON AND CO. 1 Oct. 19th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved as a matter of urgency for the appointment of a provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of A. Gordon and Co., Cape Town.

The petition of the creditors set out that the estate of the said insolvent principally consisted of: (1) general merchandise, and more particularly cycling requisites, portions of which were of a perishable nature, and must be disposed of or attended to at once; and (2) outstanding debts of a considerable amount, which it would be to the interest of creditors to collect at once. The petitioners prayed that Mr. Alfred Newton Foot be appointed provisional trustee, with power to carry on the business and collect outstandings.

Order granted as prayed.

PARRY V. WRIGHT.

This was an action for refund of payments made, Mr. W. P. Buchanan being for the plaintiff and Mr. Russell for the defendant.

Mr. Russell read an affidavit by the defendant's town attorneys, stating that they had been unable to bring the witnesses to town up to the present and that they were wholly unprepared to go on with the case under the circumstances. Counsel accordingly applied for a postponement.

Mr. Buchanan opposed the application, and submitted that the affidavit disclosed no sufficient ground for a postponement.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is no ground that I can see for a postponement. You had better go on with the case.]

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was a broker, carrying on business in Cape Town, and the defendant was a hotel proprietor, carrying on business at the Colesberg Hotel, Colesberg. In November, 1903, defendant engaged plaintiff to act for him in taking over the licence and goodwill of the hotel and financing purchase, so as to enable the defendant to become proprietor of the said hotel as a going concern. The defendant became proprietor through the negotiations and instrumentality of the plaintiff. Plaintiff had made sundry payments for and on behalf of the said defendant, and the financing of the hotel, and had received certain payments for and on behalf of the defendant. He annexed an account showing that the defendant was indebted to him in the sum of £271 17s. 11d., which amount he claimed.

The defendant, in his plea, said that the plaintiff entered into partnership with him in the taking over of the Colesberg Hotel, to the extent of £250. He disputed an item of £3, and made tender of the balance of £18 17s. 11d. in full settlement of the plaintiff's claim.

The plaintiff, in replication, denied that he was indebted to the defendant in £250, or any other sum.

Mr. Russell explained that he was only briefed for the application for postponement.

De Villiers, C.J., said he took it, then, that the case was going by default.

Mr. Russell then withdrew from the case.

Evidence was called by Mr. Buchanan.

Edwin Parry, broker, carrying on business in Cape Town, said that the defendant engaged him in November to take over the hotel and finance it for him. He made complete arrangements for the defendant to go into the hotel. He had sent the defendant an account for £271 18s. 11d. The defendant objected to an item of £3 which witness had had to pay by way of costs as surety for the defendant. Witness denied that he owed the defendant a penny. The vendor of the hotel owed witness £250; Mr. Wright was short of that amount. Instead of taking that sum from the vendor, he let Mr. Wright have it, as his share of the partnership. Lippett, the outgoing tenant, gave Wright a credit of £250 in witness's favour. Witness, in consideration, got a quarter-share in the hotel from the defendant. If the defendant had had sufficient money to go into the hotel, witness would have received cash, instead of allowing it to go in reduction of the purchase price. The purchase price of the hotel was £1,900; Lippett was paid £450, and the balance of £1,200 was paid to Liebermann, Belstead and Co., with whom Lippett had a bond. He was willing to waive his claim as to the disputed item of £3.

Frederick B. Andrews, attorney, Cape Town, gave evidence as to the sale of the hotel and the deed of partnership between plaintiff and defendant. Witness was Lippett's attorney in the transaction.

De Villiers, C.J., gave judgment for the plaintiff for £263 17s. 11d., with costs, on payment of which sum the defendant to be entitled to obtain possession of the certificate of 500 shares from J. D. Logan and Co., Ltd., with absolution from the instance on the defendant's claim in reconvention, the defendant to pay the costs.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

KROON V. KROON. { 1904
{ Oct. 19th.

Mr. Bisset applied on behalf of Johanna Christina Kroon for a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, and failing compliance divorce against her husband, on the ground of malicious desertion.

The plaintiff stated she was married to the defendant at Graaff-Reinet, on the 6th August, 1894. They lived together until January, 1901, when defendant left her. He was at present residing at Graaff-Reinet. They had not lived happily together since 1898, because defendant was of intemperate habits. In January, 1901, he joined the D.M.T. She had seen him since, but had not lived with him. He had refused to return to her. When they separated they were living at Graaff-Reinet, and he left her on the pretence of looking for work. There was one child issue of the marriage. Witness was married by ante-nuptial contract. The only property she had was the furniture. Witness at present resided at the Paarl.

Buchanan, J., granted a decree of restitution. Defendant to return on or before January 1, failing which a rule nisi would be issued, calling on defendant to show cause why a decree of divorce should not be granted.

H LILIE V. HILLIER.

In this action the plaintiff, Amelia Sarah Jane Hillier, sought a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, and failing compliance divorce against her husband, William H. J. Hillier, an ex-seaman, on the grounds of wilful desertion.

Mr. Van Zyl appeared for the applicant.

Mr. Birch produced the marriage register.

The plaintiff stated that she was married to defendant at Simon's Town, on the 29th April, 1903. Defendant was a sailor, and returned to his ship the same evening. His ship remained in Simon's Bay until May 9. He then went on a cruise, and returned in March, 1904. In the meantime, he wrote to her. She replied, but did not hear from him again. She wrote to him when he returned to Simon's Town, and asked him to meet her. They met, and he told her he was not going to return to her again, and that she might return to England and marry whom she pleased. She had not seen him since, but she knew he went to Pretoria. There were no children of the marriage. Defendant told her he had a large house in England, but she did not want any share of that. All she wanted was the costs of the case.

To the Court: When witness married, the defendant was on board ship, and witness was in service. They remained so. Defendant had left the Navy, and was a prison warder in Johannesburg now.

A decree of restitution was granted, the defendant to return to plaintiff on or before January 1.

Postea, February 16, 1905.

The decree was made absolute.

SCHREIBER V. SCHREIBER.

In this action, Hermina Gertrude Schreiber, of Claremont, sought a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, and in default of compliance of divorce against her husband, Fritz R. Schreiber, on the grounds of malicious desertion.

Mr. Russell, who appeared for plaintiff, said the defendant was sued by edictal citation.

Mr. Birch produced the marriage register, and proved the marriage.

The plaintiff stated she was married to defendant on the 21st September, 1901, in the German Lutheran Church. Witness was born in the Colony, and the defendant came out from Germany in 1899. He was a brewer at Ohlsson's Brewery. He declared his intention of settling down, and purchased some property with that intention. About nine months after they were married defendant suddenly left her. He wrote to her on the 28th July, 1903, complaining that he had not received a reply to previous letters. She had not received any before that. He told her in the letter to sell certain property, and follow him to St. Louis, U.S.A. She did not do so. In May, 1904, he wrote informing her that he had received a divorce in America from her, and enclosed a cutting from a newspaper containing the report. She received no notification of the proceedings.

Mr. Russell: The witness says she received no notice of these proceedings. It seems an easy thing to get a divorce in St. Louis.

Witness (continuing), said there was about £200 worth of property on the Flats belonging to defendant. Witness's father had paid the balance of the amount due, and he would pay the transfer fees if she could get her share of it. Witness was willing to go back to her husband if he would receive her.

To the Court: Witness disagreed with defendant from the start. He was very funny sometimes. He had a violent temper.

A decree of restitution was granted, the defendant to return to plaintiff on or before March 1.

HEYDENRYCH V. DUNMAN.

This was an action to recover the amount of £270, due on a promissory note.

Mr. W. P. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Van Zyl), appeared for plaintiff, and Mr. M. de Villiers for defendant.

Mr. De Villiers said that prior to proceeding with the case, he wished to mention a matter that would materially affect his case. A very important witness for the defence, Mr. Stephan, could not be found. A summons had been issued on the 30th September, but had not yet been served. He would suggest that the Court proceed to hear all the other witnesses in the case, and if it was deemed necessary to take Mr. Stephan's evidence, that the case should be adjourned until it was possible to procure him. Mr. Stephan would have to undergo his trial at the next Criminal Sessions, and therefore in all probability they would be able to find him.

Mr. Schreiner said the action was one in which the plaintiff was suing provisionally, on a promissory note, the defendant, who resided at Muizenberg. The note was for £270, payable in a month, and was dated December 13, 1902. The defence that was raised to the action when the case was last before the Court was two-fold. The first was that the money had been paid at the office of Mr. Stephan, who was plaintiff's agent, and the other, which was not very consistent, was that the money had been paid to Stephan, and that the plaintiff had agreed to loan it to him. Under those circumstances, one would have anticipated that both those defences would be raised on the plea in the present action; but the sole defence raised was that the money was paid to the agent of Heydenrych—Mr. Stephan. That defence would certainly require the evidence of Stephan to support it. The making of the note was admitted, and the onus, as was usual in such cases, rested on the defendant to prove that the money had been paid. Therefore, if the defendant liked to go on with the case in the absence of Stephan, she might do so; but if she failed in her defence, and wanted the case heard piecemeal, he would have to oppose the application for an adjournment at that stage.

Buchanan, J. inquired when Mr. Stephan was likely to be forthcoming.

Mr. De Villiers said he could not answer that question. They had done their best to find him, but had failed.

Buchanan, J., said he thought it would be as well to postpone the case to enable Stephan to be present.

Mr. Schreiner said it seemed remarkably strange that Stephan, who at the last hearing of the case was in hospital, undergoing an operation which deprived him of one leg, should now have so mysteriously disappeared that it was impossible to find him.

Buchanan, J. suggested that the trial be set down for November 8, which was a few days before the Criminal Sessions at which it would be necessary for Stephan to be present.

Mr. Schreiner asked for the costs of the day.

Buchanan, J. said that if the defence was a good one, and won the case, then the plaintiffs should pay the costs; and if it was not, plaintiff would receive an order for all costs.

Mr. Schreiner said that point had been raised again and again, and quoted instances to prove that costs had always been awarded to parties in actions who had opposed the adjournment.

Buchanan, J. granted the costs, and set the case down for hearing on the 8th November.

NORTON V. BOSMAN, POWIS AND CO.

Mr. Schreiner said he had only just been engaged with Sir Henry Juta to appear in this case, which was an action for the declaration of rights, and as he had not had time to peruse his brief, he would like to have the case adjourned until November 9, to enable him to do so.

Mr. Roux, who appeared on the other side with Mr. Burton, consented, but asked for costs.

Buchanan, J., said it was not usual to grant costs when a case was adjourned for the convenience of counsel.

The case was accordingly set down for November 9.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

BORSEN V. DAY. { 1901,
Oct. 20th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan said that the parties had not yet come to an arrangement. The matter had been standing over pending certain transfer going through. A provisional order against the defendant had now been standing over for three and a half months. The whole matter could be simplified if the company who had purchased the property from the defendant would pay a sufficient sum to Silberbauer, Wahl and Fuller to cover defendant's indebtedness to the plaintiff.

Mr. Gardiner (who had previously appeared for the plaintiff) said that he had not been briefed to appear that day. He suggested that the matter should stand over until two o'clock.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Very well, that is the last adjournment. The defendant's attorneys ought to have been ready, because this is the fifth time the case has been before the Court.]

The matter was again mentioned after the adjournment, when it appeared that the defendant had no proposal to make.

The provisional order was, therefore, made final.

At a still later stage.

Mr. Gardiner said that he was now prepared to produce affidavits containing an offer by the defendant, and explaining why no appearance was entered at 2 o'clock.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I think this is really trifling with the Court.]

Mr. Gardiner said that he had affidavits which would explain the position of affairs.

De Villiers, C.J., consented to hear the affidavit in explanation of the defendant's non-appearance at 2 o'clock.

Mr. Gardiner read an affidavit made by defendant's attorney, in which he stated that no time had been lost in bringing the case before the Court during the morning, but he arrived three minutes too late to brief the case.

Mr. Buchanan said he had instructions not to consent to the reopening of the case.

De Villiers, C.J., said every consideration had been shown to the defendant, and she had not availed herself thereof. During the morning, when the case came before the Court, there appeared nobody for the defendant. After a time, defendant's attorney rushed into court and said a few words to counsel, and it was decided to hear the case at 2 o'clock. But at that time there was no appearance. An order had been made by the Court for final sequestration, and if Mr. Buchanan raised objections to the present application, he did not see how they could admit it. The order would stand.

VAN DER BYL AND OTHERS V. ABEL.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the final adjudication of the defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted.

VANNER V. BRIDGES.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence, on certain conditions of sale, for £228, with interest, less £74 10s., paid on account.

Order granted.

LIPSCHITZ V. FOURIE, SEN. AND JUN. AND OTHERS.

Mr. Close moved for provisional sentence for £391 2s. 6d., upon a promissory note.

Order granted.

WEGE V. LATEGAN

Mr. Percy Jones moved for provisional sentence for £60 on a promissory note, together with interest and costs.

Order granted.

ROOS V. SAACHS AND HOFFMANN.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence for £500 on a mortgage bond, less £20 paid on account, with interest and costs of suit.
Order granted.

S.A. BREWERIES LTD V. HARDING.

Mr. Gardiner said that in this matter he had previously asked that the summons should be amended, but the matter was ordered to stand over pending an affidavit being sworn to the effect that the defendant's correct name was William Robert Harding and not Robert William Harding, as stated in the summons. He now presented an affidavit and moved for the final adjudication of the estate of William Robert Harding.
Order granted accordingly.

PEDERSEN V. HEMPEL.

Mr. Lewis moved for provisional sentence for £1,200 on a mortgage bond, together with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest; also for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.
Order granted.

SILBERBAUER AND WILKIE V. JONES.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for provisional sentence for £3,000 on a mortgage bond, with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest; also for the property specially hypothecated to the declared executable.
Order granted.

PHILPOTT V. BRIDGES.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £700, together with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest; also for the property specially hypothecated to be declared executable.
Order granted.

FRIEDMAN BROS. V. MORRISON.

Mr. Gardiner said that this matter was standing over. The defendant had now deposited the sum of £277 with the Registrar, and he asked for discharge of provisional order of sequestration. He also asked for costs.
Mr. W. P. Buchanan opposed the application for costs.
Provisional order was discharged, question of costs to stand over,

Counsel having been heard further on the question of costs.

De Villiers, C.J., said the plaintiff was entitled to costs.

ILLIQUID ROLL.GINSBURG V. HOFFMAN AND (1904.
SAACKS. (Oct. 29th.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £100, being amount paid for and on behalf of defendants, with interest a tempore morae and costs.
Order granted.

PURCELL AND CO. V. HARCK.

Mr. Percy Jones moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £85 16s. 5d., goods sold and delivered, and work and labour done.
Order granted.

MOTRODEN V. HASSEIM.

Mr. Roux moved for judgment for £31 cash lent, and £11 cash paid.
Order granted.

HOLTENHOFF V. GINSBERG AND HOFFMANN.

Dr. Greer moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £115 19s. 6d., balance of purchase price of certain ground, with interest a tempore morae and costs.
Order granted.

GENERAL MOTIONS.COHOON V. COHOON. { 1904.
{ Oct. 29th.

Judicial separation—Divorce—
Postponement—Practice.

Plaintiff had instituted an action for judicial separation, and now asked that the case should be postponed, in order to enable her to apply for divorce.

Held, that plaintiff must either apply for an amendment of the original rule nisi, calling upon defendant to show cause or else commence a new action ab initio.

Mr. McGregor (for the plaintiff) applied for an adjournment of this case for a fortnight. He stated that a rule nisi had been granted, calling upon George Cohoon to return to his wife, failing which to show cause why a judicial separation should not be granted, and he be ordered to pay £5 a month towards his wife's support. Since the trial for desertion the plaintiff wished that instead of a judicial separation there should be a decree of divorce, and Mr. McGregor asked the indulgence of the Court to postpone the case for a fortnight in order to communicate with Mrs. Cohoon, who resides in East London.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would you not have to proceed afresh?]

Mr. McGregor said that in a fortnight's time they would be in a position to ask the Court for an order calling upon the defendant to show cause why a decree of divorce should not be granted.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why not apply now for an amendment of the rule at once?]

We would rather that the matter stand over for a fortnight.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Very well, then you will have to start afresh.]

Well, my lord, perhaps we had better have an amendment of the order now.

The Court then granted an amendment of the order calling upon the defendant to show cause why a decree of divorce should not be granted, rule to be published in the same manner as previously.

Ex parte THE CONSISTORY OF THE DORDRECHT DUTCH REFORMED CHURCH.

Notices in English and Dutch papers.

Where the Court orders a notice to be published in an English and a Dutch newspaper, it must in each case be published in the respective languages of those papers.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute. He said he found that publication had been given in two bilingual newspapers, but in each instance the order had appeared in the English language. The order of the Court was that the rule should be published in an English and Dutch newspaper, and the question was whether the publication which had been given was a sufficient compliance with the directions of the Court.

De Villiers, C.J., said he understood that when publication was ordered in a Dutch newspaper, the notice would be printed in Dutch.

Mr. De Villiers said his attorney informed him that it was usual for notices to appear in the English language, and that there was not the necessary machinery for the publication of the notices in Dutch.

[D Villiers, C.J.: Do you mean that the press cannot print in Dutch?]

There is no machinery for the authentic translation of the notice when it leaves the Registrar.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Oh, I see; that machinery. I should think that the interpreter of the Supreme Court could be utilised for that purpose.]

Mr. De Villiers said that he was told by the Registrar, and the Assistant Registrar, that very frequently orders of the Court were published in "Ons Land," and other Dutch newspapers in the English language.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That may be, but the point is, are they never published in Dutch?]

In some cases, where the attorney makes his own translation.

De Villiers, C.J., said that in a small place like Dordrecht it was probable that the notice, though in English, would have come to the knowledge of all concerned, and the application would in this instance be granted. It should be understood for the future, however, that if a notice were ordered to be published in a Dutch newspaper it was to appear in the language of the paper.

McKILLOP V. McKILLOP.

Mr. Van Zyl moved, as a matter of urgency, for an order declaring the respondent (James Henry McKillop, of Wynberg), a prodigal, placing him under curatorship, and appointing Arthur Kilwardine Wolff as curator of his person. Mrs. McKillop, in her petition, said that she was married to the respondent in community of property in Cape Town, in 1893. There had been one child of the marriage, and petitioner also had children by her former marriage. She brought certain property to the marriage, which had been transferred to the respondent's name. For about four years they lived happily together, but afterwards respondent gave way to intemperate habits, and he had now reached such a stage that he was continually in a state of intoxication, going to public-houses, and being invariably carried home late at night hopelessly drunk. The property had been mortgaged, respondent spent the rents upon drink, and his mind was becoming deranged. It was extremely difficult for petitioner to make ends meet. She had reason to believe that he intended to sell the property unless restrained by the Court.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the Court would not grant an order at present, but a rule would be issued calling upon the respondent to show cause on Thursday next why an order should not be made as prayed, and why Mr. Wolff should not be appointed curator, the rule to operate as an interdict in the meantime restraining the respondent from alienating any portion of the joint property.

Postea. February 11.

Buchanan, J. (in chambers) ordered notice to be given to the curator.

Ex parte THE ZUID AFRIKAANSCH WEESHUIS.

Mr. Burton moved for a rule nisi, under the Derelict Lands Act, to be made absolute.

Order granted.

Ex parte DURAND.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for an order authorising the transfer of certain land in the district of Elliot, sold by public auction, to the petitioner, who was executor in the estate.

Order granted.

Ex parte FOURIE AND OTHERS.

Mr. Russell moved for an order authorising the transfer of certain property in the division of Victoria West.

Order granted.

HARTZ V. GARLICK.

Mr. Gardiner moved for an order compelling the plaintiff to give security for costs and charges that may be incurred by the defendant (John Garlick), in an action instituted against him by respondent, the ground of the application being that the respondent was no longer domiciled in this colony.

Mr. Close appeared for the respondent, who said that her domicile was in the division of Carnarvon, and that she and her husband only went to Johannesburg temporarily on account of the drought.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is quite clear that the respondent is not domiciled in this country. An order must be made requiring the plaintiff to give security to the satisfaction of the Registrar of the Supreme Court before being allowed to take any further steps in the action, the plaintiff to pay costs of this application.

Ex parte COTTERELL.

Mr. Gardiner moved for the appointment of a trustee in the insolvent estate of James and Martin Kennedy, of the district of Elliot. Petitioner was a creditor in the insolvent estate, and asked that Mr. Johannes Harling, an attorney of this Court, be appointed permanent trustee.

De Villiers, C.J., said he had no power to appoint a permanent trustee, but he could appoint a provisional trustee, with power to administer. The permanent trustee could only be elected by the creditors. An order would be granted, appointing Mr. Harling as provisional trustee, with power to administer and liquidate the estate, costs to come out of the estate.

SHAW V. SHAW.

Mr. Upington moved for an order calling upon W. B. Shaw, jun., to pay to the applicant, his wife, a sum of money to enable her to defend an action for divorce, which the plaintiff was bringing against her on the ground of adultery, at Somerset Strand, and also to pay her a certain sum as alimony. The parties were married at the Metropolitan Church, Cape Town, in 1897. Applicant said she denied the charge of adultery, and had a complete answer.

Mr. Rainsford read replying affidavits by the respondent and his father. The respondent said he was absolutely without funds.

Mr. Upington read an answering affidavit by the applicant, who said that the plaintiff had lost his situation as Town Clerk at Somerset Strand through his own fault. She denied that she had insisted on living at an hotel, when it would have been cheaper to live in a private house. She denied that her husband was without funds.

De Villiers, C.J., said that there would be no order on plaintiff undertaking to proceed to trial this term, with leave to the defendant, with the consent of the plaintiff, to defend the action in forma pauperis.

Ex parte FULLER.

Mr. Upington moved for an order authorising the sale of certain property. He said this matter had been before the Court on a previous occasion. It was an application to sell a certain farm. The matter had been allowed to stand over to ascertain the rents derived from the farms, and also as to whether the sons were willing to purchase them.

De Villiers, C.J., suggested that, as Mr. Justice Hopley had heard the former application, he should also hear this.

This course was agreed to.

DAVIDS V. ESTATE DAVIDS.

Mr. Roux applied for leave to sue in forma pauperis.

The application was granted, Mr. Roux consenting to act as counsel.

NANGLE V. CROUS.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order compelling respondent to sign certain documents. He said that at the previous hearing of this action an order was made that a rule nisi issue, calling upon the respondent and the Mutual Life Assurance Co., of New York, to show cause why the surrender value of a certain policy of assurance, issued by the company on the life of the respondent, should not be declared executable, in satisfaction of a certain judgment obtained by applicant against respondent in the court of Resident Magistrate for Komgha, on the 15th July last, and further, why the applicant, as holder and concessionary of the policy, should not be authorised to sign the necessary document for procuring the surrender value from the assurance company, and to account to respondent for any surplus after deducting the amount of the judgment, with interest and costs. The present application was to move that the rule nisi be made absolute.

The application was granted.

Ex parte CERTAIN SHAREHOLDERS IN THE BUFFALO SUPPLY CO.

Mr. Burton moved for the appointment of an official liquidator. He said the gentleman who had previously been appointed by the Court refused to act, as the remuneration was too small. Mr. John Powell was suggested as a suitable person. A Mr. Fleming, who was a large creditor, also wished to be appointed.

The application was granted.

Ex parte SAFIEDIEN.

Mr. Gutsche moved for leave to raise money on mortgage.

The order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte VAN DER MERWE.

Mr. Roux moved for an order confirming the sale of certain property. He said that when the case was previously before the Court, it was stated that the property concerned had not realised its full value. He now submitted affidavits stating that the amount given was the full value.

The application was granted.

ESTATE BLACK V. ALLIE AND OTHERS.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan (with him Mr. D. Buchanan) applied for an order authorising the execution of a certain judgment.

Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Roux) opposed the motion.

Mr. Buchanan read an affidavit made by the plaintiff's attorney, in which he stated that on the 1st September, judgment was obtained against defendant by plaintiff for the sum of £62 and costs. On the 14th September they gave notice of appeal, and they were required to provide security by the 15th September. On the 19th September deponent met defendant's attorney, who told him that the defendants were unable to find the security required.

An affidavit made by Sheik Allie, one of the respondents, stated they had property valued at £1,500, but on which they could not realise immediately, and if the rule was now granted, they would not be able to meet the claims of their other creditors.

The rule was made absolute.

WALLWORK V. ORANGE RIVER IRRIGATION CO.

Mr. Sutton applied for an order winding up the said company. The company was formed in Cape Town, and petitioner was secretary to it, but it had ceased work for some time now. The company was unable to pay its debts. He asked to have Mr. G. W. Steytler appointed liquidator, with full powers.

The application was granted.

Ex parte WILSON.

Mr. Sutton applied for leave to mortgage certain property. The application was to raise a certain sum of money on property in which a minor was interested. The Master reported favourably, but suggested that not more than £500 be raised.

The application was granted, in terms of the Master's report.

MZUBELO AND OTHERS V. NDABA AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Upington moved for the amendment of a certain record. He said this was an application for the substitution in pleadings of the name of Mzubelo, trustee to one of the heirs, in a forthcoming action.

The application was granted.

Ex parte ALBERTYN.

Mr. Upington moved for the amendment of a certain transfer.

The petitioner's affidavit stated that she was the executrix testamentary in the estate of her late husband, Hendrik

Albertyn. On the 4th February, 1873, one Andries Phillipus Joane transferred one-half undivided part or share of and in a certain piece of freehold, and a piece of perpetual quitrent land with the buildings thereon, called Beckers Kraal, since named La Bagatelle, and now named Loch Erin, situate in the Cape Division in the Downs to the eastward of the Sea Cow Valley, as also another piece of perpetual quitrent land situate as above, being part of the perpetual quitrent granted to William Dickson on the 1st September, 1834; measuring four morgen of freehold and 471 morgen 316 square roods of perpetual quitrent land in undivided shares to Christiaan Lodewyk, Hendrik Andries Geldenhuys, Willem John Murray Kirsten, and the late Albertyn, each obtaining one eighth undivided share in the farm. On the 4th February, 1873, the estate of the widow of the late George Higgs transferred the other half undivided part or share of, and in the property in undivided shares to Christiaan Lodewyk, Hendrik Andries Geldenhuys, Christian Andries Bruyns, and Hendrik Albertyn. On the 4th February, 1873, Christiaan Andries Bruyns transferred his one-eighth undivided in the property to Willem John Murray Kirsten. On the 14th April, 1874, Willem John Murray sold to Christiaan Lodewyk, Hendrik Geldenhuys, and the late Hendrik Albertyn, his one-fourth undivided part or share in the property. A deed of transfer was passed on the 27th February, 1875, by Willem John Murray Kirsten, whereby one one-eighth part or share was transferred. Christiaan Lodewyk, Hendrik A. Geldenhuys, and Hendrik Albertyn received one-twenty-fourth share in the farm, instead of one-twelfth. Owing to the error, Christiaan Lodewyk, Hendrik A. Geldenhuys, and Hendrik Albertyn each only obtained seven twenty-fourths share, thus leaving Willem John Murray Kirsten in possession of one-eighth share in the farm. On the 9th August, 1886, Christiaan Lodewyk, and Hendrik A. Geldenhuys each transferred one-third share to the late Hendrik Albertyn. The petitioner asked the Court to authorise the Registrar of Deeds to amend the deed of transfer of the 27th February, 1875, so as to read one-fourth part or share in the farm Loch.

The Court made an order, calling upon all concerned to show cause on this day fortnight why the transfer of two twenty-fourths share transferred by two transfers of the 9th August, shall not be declared invalid, and the estate of Kirsten to show cause why transfer of the one-eighth share still registered in the name of Kirsten shall not be passed to petitioner.

Postea (November 14th). The Rule was made absolute.

Ex parte VAN DER MERWE.

Mr. P. Jones moved for leave to raise money on mortgage. The application was before the Court on a previous occasion, when, owing to the Master's report not being favourable, the matter was postponed. The Master now reported favourably.

The application was granted.

Ex parte ENGELBRECHT.

Dr. Greer moved for an order calling a special meeting in a certain insolvent estate. The petitioner had been appointed executrix testamentary to the estate of her late husband. By an order of the Supreme Court on the 14th March, 1899, the surviving trustee of the insolvent estate of Jacques Jean Henri Smuts was ordered to pass transfer to petitioner, and to certain other persons of certain nine fifty-sixths part in the farms Paleisheuvel and Ratelrug, situate in Clanwilliam. Such transfer had not been passed. Emile Henri van Noorden, who, at the date of the order, was surviving trustee, had since died. Petitioner was desirous that a new trustee should be appointed for the purpose of effecting transfer in terms of the order of Court, wherefore she prayed that the Court order the Master to call a special meeting of creditors of Jacques Jean Henri Smuts for the purpose of electing a trustee to the estate.

The application was granted.

Ex parte LE ROUX.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for leave to mortgage certain property in the division of Robertson belonging to the joint estate of the deceased wife of applicant and himself. The petitioner had filed a liquidation account, but had failed to bring up debts of the joint estate amounting to £1,651. The total amount of the liability was stated to be £2,305. It appeared that the Master reported in favour of granting the application up to a certain amount (£972), but counsel said that this was insufficient, though he waived certain small items. It seemed that there was already a bond on the property to the amount of £450. The Master reported in favour of an order being given in terms of prayer (c), enabling the petitioner to mortgage one-half of the property, but limiting the amount to £972.

Order granted in terms of Master's report, adding, however, £250 for engine and pump, to be part of the farm fixtures.

Ex parte FALKNER.

Mr. Howel Jones moved for an order authorising the Master to pay certain money for the maintenance and education of a minor.

Order granted.

Ex parte MAKRAI.

Mr. Gutsche moved, on behalf of the petitioner, a Hungarian subject, for an amendment of certain transfer, altering his name from Theophilus Makrai to Teofil Makrai, and also for the amendment of the register in the Debt Registry.

Order granted as prayed, subject to production of consent papers of the executors of the Hon. C. T. Smith.

Ex parte VAN EEDEN.

Mr. Close moved for leave to sell certain property.

Order granted.

Ex parte BOYD AND WIFE.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for leave to execute an ante-nuptial contract which had not been reduced to writing previous to the marriage.

De Villiers, C.J., said that an order would be given similar to those in the Purchase case and Woodman case.

Ex parte DOUGLASS.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the registration of the grosse of a certain ante-nuptial contract.

Order granted.

LOTTER V. BOTHA.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for a certain award of the arbitrator to be made a rule of Court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was the arbitration under the Act of 1898?]

Yes, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I don't see that Act mentioned in the papers.]

I think it would fall as a matter of course under that Act. Mr. Van Zyl, in reply to his lordship, said that the only point was whether the appointment by the plaintiff of Mr. Hobson as sole arbitrator was valid, in default of the appearance of the arbitrator appointed by the respondent. He understood that that was the point taken by the respondent in the letter that he had sent to the Court.

Order granted.

Ex parte WRIGHT AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Van Zyl moved, on behalf of the executors testamentary in the estate of the late William Wright for an order authorising transfer of certain property.

Order granted.

VAN DRIEL V. VENTER AND NIEBERG.

This was an application for leave to sue in forma pauperis. There was no appearance by counsel for respondent.

De Villiers, C.J., asked Mr. Advocate D. Buchanan, who appeared for the applicant, whether he would be prepared to take the reference?

Mr. Advocate Buchanan acquiesced.

Order granted accordingly.

Ex parte SMITH AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Van Zyl moved, on behalf of petitioners, who are attorneys of this court, practising at Indwe, for the appointment of trustees in an insolvent estate in the division of Elliott. They suggested the appointment of themselves as trustees, or, in the alternative, the appointment of a provisional trustee.

Order granted, appointing Mr. Philipson as provisional trustee with power to administer and liquidate, costs to come out of the estate.

Ex parte GOLDSCHMIDT.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan moved, on behalf of the petitioner, who resides at Queen's Town, for the removal of one Nicholas Jegels from executorship of a certain estate. The whereabouts of Jegels were unknown, and it was necessary to pass transfer of the property.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte SCHOLTZ.

Mr. Sutton moved for an order appointing petitioner trustee in a certain insolvent estate.

De Villiers, C.J., said there seemed to be some likelihood of the creditors coming to an election. The proper course would be to order another meeting to be called for election of trustees.

Order granted, directing that a further meeting of creditors be called for the purpose of electing a trustee.

MAXEY V. MAXEY.

Payment by husband to enable wife to bring action for surgical expenses—Alimony.

Mr. Gardiner moved, on behalf of Henrietta Alexandra Maxey, for an order requiring the respondent to pay a certain sum of money, at the discretion of the Court, to enable applicant to bring an action for expenses of an operation and alimony. In her petition she said that in 1899 the respondent maliciously deserted her, and that she had had to undergo two surgical operations, and had had to go to England to consult a specialist. Defendant had not contributed to her maintenance. The defendant had also filed a certain document called defendant's plea, which contained many slanderous and false statements. The defendant was in the service of the Government. He had not provided for deponent during the last two years.

An affidavit by the respondent (who did not appear) was read denying that he had maliciously deserted the plaintiff. He had been to England for treatment, and did not return for some time. He swore that his salary was disbursed month by month as he received it. He was, therefore, incapable of contributing to the expenses incurred by the applicant.

An answering affidavit by the applicant denying the allegations of the defendant was read.

De Villiers, C.J., said it seemed to him to be a most unusual application seeing that this was not a matrimonial suit.

Mr. Gardiner contended that, all the same, such an action was maintainable without the plaintiff going to the more drastic remedy of a judicial separation or divorce.

De Villiers, C.J., said that there seemed to be merely a money question between the parties at present, and if the action were brought there would be small chance of the parties becoming reconciled.

Mr. Gardiner submitted that because the plaintiff elected to take the smaller remedy she should not be denied relief.

De Villiers, C.J., said he was not prepared to grant an order without proof that the replying affidavit of the applicant had been served upon the respondent. Leave would be given to the applicant to again move the Court.

Ex parte SNYMAN.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to sell certain property on behalf of a minor. The Master had reported favourably.

Order granted.

Ex parte THE MINORS DE VILLIERS.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for an order for the payment of certain money for the maintenance and education of the minors.

Order granted.

Ex parte STONE AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for leave to sell certain property in which minors were interested.

Order granted.

Ex parte PRETORIUS.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for an order releasing applicant from tutorship.

Order granted.

Ex parte CLIGHORN.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., moved for an order authorising the Master to accept a certain account.

Order granted.

Ex parte KERR.

Mr. Rainsford moved for an order authorising the High Sheriff to pass transfer of certain property. The property was mortgaged, but the mortgagees were willing to allow the mortgages to remain.

Order granted.

Ex parte PIETERSEN.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for leave to hypothecate certain property in which minors were interested.

Order granted.

Ex parte STANDER.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the registration of certain property.

De Villiers, C.J., said this matter should have been brought before a judge in Chambers. No order would be made.

WALSH AND WALSH V. SADLER.

Mr. Gardiner moved for an extension of the return day of a certain citation. He said leave had been granted by the Court to sue the respondent by edictal citation, but, although every effort possible had been made to find him, he had not yet been discovered.

The return day was extended to November 14.

GOETHUYS V. DEGRAAFF.

Mr. Roux moved to have a rule nisi made absolute.

Order granted.

In Re* THE APPLICATION FOR THE APPOINTMENT OF A COMMISSION IN THE MATTER BETWEEN GOTZE AND BERGL.

This was an application for an order to take evidence on commission.

Mr. Gardiner supported the application, and Mr. W. P. Buchanan opposed.

Mr. Gardiner said his client (the respondent) was at present in London, where he was engaged on business, and did not know when he would be able to return. If the case could not be postponed, he asked to have a commission appointed to take his evidence.

Mr. Buchanan read a replying affidavit, in which it was stated that the applicant, although he knew there were actions pending against him, had left for England.

His Lordship granted the appointment of a commission.

Ex parte* THE EXECUTORS IN THE ESTATE BLACK.

Mr. Gutsche moved for leave to mortgage property.

Order granted.

Ex parte* SHUTLER.

Mr. Uppington moved for leave to sue in forma pauperis.

Order granted.

Ex parte* THE EXECUTORS ESTATE CROSS.

Mr. D. Buchanan moved for leave to pass transfer of property sold to an executor.

Order granted.

Ex parte* THE ESTATE ABEL.

This was an application for the appointment of a provisional trustee to the above estate.

Mr. Gutsche moved and suggested Mr. J. de Villiers, Paarl.

Order granted.

LACAY V. JACOBS.

Mr. W. P. Buchanan, on behalf of the plaintiff, applied for an order against the defendant for contempt of Court, for not complying with an order of the Court directing her to hand over to plaintiff her illegitimate child.

The order sought was granted.

Ex parte* WIBES.

Mr. P. Jones moved to have transfer passed.

Order granted.

Ex parte* KLEYN

Sir H. Juta, K.C., moved for leave to sell certain property.

His Lordship said he would peruse the documents handed in, and then give judgment.

Postea (Oct. 21st).

De Villiers, C.J., mentioned this matter, which came before the Court on Thursday, the petitioner asking for leave to sell certain property. He said he found that the inheritance was to go to the children in case the father died before the mother. He would like to know, if the property was sold by Mrs. Kleyn, how the proceeds were to be secured so that the children would receive their rights under the will.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for the petitioner) said that he would communicate with the petitioner in regard to the point mentioned by his lordship.

Postea (October 28th).

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte* EDWARDS.

Mr. Pyemont moved for an order authorising the Master to file the will, etc., in the estate of Morgan Edwards. The deceased was one of the crew of the S.S. Penguin, which left Durban on a voyage of discovery, and was wrecked, the crew being drowned. The master was unwilling to accept the death notice without the order of the Court. The deceased's name appeared in the "Gazette," and also on the ship's log.

The order was granted.

Ex parte* WINKELMANN AND OTHERS.

This was an application for an order authorising the sale of certain property in which certain minors were interested. From applicant's petition it appeared that the property in question was not producing any rent, and that a good offer had been received for it. All the heirs (including certain minors) consented to the sale, and in view of the fact that it was proposed to invest the purchase price of the said property on first mortgage of landed property or other security, the Master saw no objection to the application being granted.

On the motion of Mr. W. P. Buchanan an order was granted as prayed.

Ex parte* KRUGER.

This was an application for an order authorising the sale of certain minors' shares in certain property.

The Master's report was as follows: "I have been credibly informed that the farm Allemansfontein (the property in question) is so overrun with prickly pear that it would cost a sum of money altogether beyond the means of the minors to eradicate it.

"The minors, I understand, are not properly cared for, and their education is sadly neglected, and it would, therefore, be in their interest that the properties be sold at the same time as the shares of the major heirs, so as to enable the Curator Nominatus to devote the interest of the proceeds towards their maintenance and education."

On the motion of Mr. Van Zyl an order was granted as prayed.

Ex parte TITKERTON.

This was an application for leave to sell certain property in which two minors were interested, on condition that the applicant should pay their respective shares of the proceeds into the Guardians' Fund.

The Master did not oppose.

On the motion of Mr. Close the Court granted an order as prayed.

Ex parte VAN ZYL AND OTHERS.

This was an application authorising the sale of certain property.

The facts sufficiently appear from the Master's report, which reads as follows:

"The property to which this petition relates is directed to be sold by public auction with other properties described in the will signed by petitioner and her late husband.

"It is a portion of the farm bequeathed to the two sons, and six major children have signified their consent to petitioner taking over the property, and she is willing to take it over at a sworn appraiser's valuation. I think the application may be granted."

On the motion of Mr. Pyemont the Court granted an order as prayed.

Ex parte APPEL.

This was an application for leave to execute a certain mortgage bond.

The property in question had been bequeathed to Conrad E. Appel, a minor, on condition that he should pay £600 to the testators' daughter within 12 months of the death of the survivor of the testators. In case he should be unable or unwilling to do so, the petitioner was to have the right to let half the ground bequeathed until the said sum of £600 should have been paid. The beneficiary had not paid the £600, and petitioner had consequently let the land for 5 years at £77 per annum, and had handed over the remaining half to the beneficiary. The petitioner had paid £214 10s. 11d. to the testator's daughters, leaving a balance of £385 9s. 1d. still due to them. He had been sued for Divisional Council rates in respect of the said property. These he had paid out of the rents of the said property, but there is still a deficiency. The estate of the aforesaid Conrad E. Appel had been compulsorily sequestrated, and there appeared little hope that he would within any reasonable time be in a position to pay the outstanding balance to testator's daughters. Wherefore petitioner asked for leave to raise £385 9s. 1d., £31 15s. 9d., together with necessary legal expenses, and also for leave to let the half share of the bequeathed property in order to pay off the loan and interest due on the bond aforesaid.

The Master recommended that the prayer of the petitioner be granted.

On the motion of Mr. Van Zyl the Court granted an order as prayed.

Ex parte BECKER.

This was an application on behalf of Harry Mortimer Stone and Harriet E. Becker, as executors and tutors testamentary in the estate of the late Henry E. Becker, for leave (1) To sell certain immovable property for a sum of not less than £5,500, for the benefit of the estate (2) To invest the balance of such money after paying off the mortgages on the said property.

Or in the alternative:—

(1) To raise a sum not exceeding £2,500, for the purpose of paying off the present mortgage on the said property, amounting to £900.

(2) Erecting certain buildings thereon at a cost not to exceed the balance of the £2,500.

The second petitioner was the usufructuary under the will, and there were seven children, heirs under the will of whom four were minors. The major heirs consented to the proposed arrangements.

The Master recommended that the first prayer of the petition should be granted if the property could be sold for £5,500, failing this that the alternate prayer be granted.

On the motion of Mr. Van Zyl the Court granted an order in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte JORDAAN AND WIFE.

This was an application for leave to register an ante-nuptial contract, which owing to a misapprehension had not been reduced to writing previous to the marriage.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.)]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte ELLIOTT. } 1904.
Oct. 21st.

Mr. Upington moved, as a matter of urgency, for authority, in the event of petitioner being appointed curator bonis of the late Charles George Elliott, to carry on the business of Innes and Elliott, attorneys, Port Elizabeth. Mr. C. G. Elliott, who, it was stated, was the sole partner in the firm, died at Wynberg on the 15th inst. The petitioner (deceased's brother) had for some time past managed his business. Under his will, Mr. Elliott bequeathed to petitioner the business, with books, furniture, etc., provided he took over the business liabilities. Petitioner accepted the legacy. The executor was at present in England, and it was desirable, in the meantime, that arrangements should be made for the continuance of the business.

De Villiers, C.J., said that an order would be granted giving petitioner, in the event of his being appointed curator bonis, the power applied for. He added an expression of opinion that the Master would be quite justified, under these circumstances, in appointing the petitioner as curator bonis.

SCOTT V. THIEME. } 1904.

Consideration — Offer — Acceptance—Revocation of offer—Option—Contract.

The declaration alleged that the defendant signed a document covenanting to give to the plaintiff the option to purchase certain property at a definite price within a limited time, and that within the time so limited the plaintiff notified to the defendant that he elected to avail himself of the option and was prepared to pay the price. The plea averred that there was no consideration for the giving of the option by the defendant.

Held, that, even assuming that there was no consideration and assuming that the so-called "covenant" should be regarded as a mere offer, the acceptance of such unrevoked offer within the specified time created the requisite consideration and gave rise to a binding contract between the parties.

This was an argument on exceptions taken by the plaintiff to the defendant's plea.

From the pleadings, it appeared that the plaintiff was a merchant tailor, residing at Kenilworth; the defendant was a farmer, residing at Claremont Flats. The defendant had held a licence for a certain Erf No. 8, Cape Flats, in the Field-cornetcy of Downs, under the provisions of the Agricultural Lands Act of 1882. On the 22nd May, 1897, the defendant's father, acting for and on behalf of the defendant, entered into a certain agreement with the plaintiff to let him have the option of purchase of the tenure of the said land on payment of £425, to be increased to £500 in case the licence was converted into a perpetual quitrent. Plaintiff said that on the 24th July, 1897, and within the limit of time, he notified the defendant to avail himself of his rights of purchase. Plaintiff had tendered the sum of £425 sterling, but the defendant had failed to give him transfer of the land.

The defendant, in his plea, said that it was provided by the Act that no interest in a licence could be assigned except under certain conditions and terms set out in the Act, which conditions and terms the defendant had not complied with. The licence expired and terminated on the 30th June, 1897. On the 28th December, 1898, a further licence in regard to the erf was granted to the defendant, and on the 31st March, 1904, the said licence was converted into a title of perpetual quitrent. He denied that he gave the plaintiff any rights over the licence of December, 1898. No consideration was given by the plaintiff. In reference to a certain letter sent by the defendant to the plaintiff, he said that it was written under a misapprehension, because he thought a legal contract was existing between the parties.

To this plea, the plaintiff excepted upon a number of grounds, and said that it was insufficient and bad in law.

Mr. M. de Villiers appeared for the plaintiff and excipient; Sir H. Juta, K.C., was for the defendant.

Mr. De Villiers said that, although he had prepared a number of exceptions, it was not because he was particularly enamoured of exceptions; but in so many respects the plea appeared to him to contain matters which, as far as they raised points of law, were simply futile, and of no materiality whatever; and he thought that these points ought first to be removed, before they entered into the matters really at issue between the parties. There were several points in reference to which these exceptions were raised. There was the point that, according to English law and our law, want of consideration could not be pleaded in a case like this. There was further the plea of impossibility, as to which he should contend that, what was impossible having become possible, both by our law and English law, the defendant was obliged to give transfer. There was the further point of mistake and misapprehension. That was of very great consequence, but he would maintain that the defendant had distinctly to set forth in what respects the mistake and misapprehension existed, and there was the further question as to the interpretation of the Act 37 of 1882, which seemed to him perfectly clear, and to have bearing on the present case. In regard to the plea of impossibility, there was an important principle that he would seek to establish—that was, that the effect of the agreement of the 22nd May, 1897, was to establish an immediate and irrevocable contractual relation between the parties of such a nature that, upon the plaintiff notifying his election to accept transfer on the terms agreed upon, the defendant was bound to give delivery. Counsel proceeded to quote from Hollandische Consultation, 20. 158, p. 322; Neostadius, Decis. Cur. Supr. Holl. 45, p. 192.

The contract in the case referred to in the last authority was exactly similar to the present. An option was given for the purchase of a certain piece of ground at eight pounds per "gemet," at which price some other ground also had been previously sold, and it was undisputed that the seller could not revoke. Counsel also cited in support of his view Moyle, Translation of Justinian's Institutes, 3-23-4, p. 148; Moyle on Sales in Civil Law, pp. 47, 77, 80 and 174. The present case was the stronger, as under the agreement the plaintiff acquired an immediate right to take steps to effect a re-sale. On the question of consideration, he submitted that the plea of want of consideration was bad, inasmuch as there was no allegation of revocation on the part of the defendant. Counsel quoted in support of this contention, "Lundell's Cases of Contracts" (vol. 2, p. 1,091). He urged that the prospect held out by the defendant to the plaintiff of selling the property for the sum agreed upon in a certain case was a sufficient cause of consideration. In support, he referred to the practice of Continental waiters, who entered into a contract of service without receiving a penny of wages, as forming an analogy, the only consideration in that case being the prospect held out that they had of receiving so many fees that they would be repaid. Mr. De Villiers quoted "Story on Sales" (par 127), and cited the cases of Tembu v. Webster, recently heard in this Court, Tradesmen's Benefit Society v. Du Preez (5, Supreme Court Reports, p. 278), Smith v. Lumberg (12, Supreme Court Reports, p. 302). On the point of notification of choice, he submitted that there was a contradiction in the plea, inasmuch as in the one paragraph it was said that the plaintiff had not availed himself of his option, and in the sixth paragraph notification was implied. Counsel next dealt with the point of the plea that section 14 of the Act 37 of 1882 provided that no interest in licences granted by the Government was assignable, except under certain terms and conditions there laid down, and that defendant had not complied with those terms and conditions. He contended that, though there may be extinction of a thing nevertheless the obligation of the debtor was continued. The rule of law was that if an ensuing impossibility of performance has been brought about by the act or default of the person who is bound to such performance, the other party may wait till the impossibility ceases or otherwise immediately claim damages. He was proceeding to quote Pothier on Obligations (par. 613, 614, 620, 624, 626, and 627 note a.); Digest 32 79 sections 2, 3; 46-3-98, section 8; 45-1-82, section 5; 19-1-55.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that the defence raised was not impossibility, but illegality.

Mr. De Villiers said, he was dealing with section 3 of the Defendant's plea, and that legal impossibility stood on exactly the same footing as physical impossibility. He pointed out that the defendant said that the contract ceased by the licence having expired, and that the agreement did not refer to the subsequent grant. The defendant alleged that through his own default he was unable to carry out the obligation embodied in the agreement. He said: "Such terms and conditions were not complied with by the licensee." He still submitted that the question of impossibility did materially arise in this case. He quoted Fry of Specific Performance, sections 994-997, Digest of English Law (vol. 6, p. 491), Parsons on Contracts (vol. 2, p. 647), and other authorities. With regard to the alleged mistake, he contended that it was incumbent upon the defendant to state whether he meant a mistake in law or in fact, and, if in fact, what the facts were as to which the mistake existed otherwise he was hampered in his defence.

Sir H. Juta said that the licence in this case was a licence under the Agricultural Act, and his lordship would see, from the provisions of the Act, that the intention of the Legislature was that the person who applied for a holding had to apply for himself, and the licence could not be taken in execution, it could not be mortgaged, and it could not be assigned, the object of the Legislature, of course, being that in regard to any of these holdings, it should be for the benefit of the person who applied, and should not be the subject of commercial barter. The licence was to last five years, and during its currency the interest in the land could not be assigned, except under conditions set out in the Act. The defendant had not complied with those conditions, and the question then arose whether this agreement in the first instance was valid and legal. The original licence came to an end on the 30th June, 1897; the new licence was granted in December, 1898. Now that second licence could not be obtained except upon an application made upon declaration that there was no agreement existing, and that if such agreement had been made thereupon the whole of that land was forfeit. Both parties were now in this delicious dilemma that, if his learned friend succeeded, the whole land was forfeit under the Act, because the declaration was false. If the plaintiff had any rights at all, under the agreement, according to his own showing, he did not notify his election until the 24th July, 1897, and, seeing that the licence had expired on the 30th June, the subject-matter was actually gone, and the agreement must have been at an end, even presuming that it was a legal offer. Again, the agreement was to buy the land if the licence were converted into a quit-rent title. Now, the licence was never converted into a quit-rent title. Counsel submitted (1) that the agreement was never concluded; (2) that if it were the subject-matter came to an end; and (3) that the eventual right which was to be sold never came into existence.

De Villiers, C.J., asked counsel whether the defendant did make a declaration when the new licence was granted.

Sir H. Juta replied that he was not aware. Proceeding, he said that the exception seemed to him to be that the points of the plea had no bearing on the case. He submitted that the points had very great bearing. The misapprehension or mistake could not affect the matter, because the letter sent by the defendant could not make a new contract.

Mr. De Villiers, in reply, said that under section 14 of the Act it was clear that, as soon as a person acquired a quit-rent interest in land, he had full power to transfer. There was no proof that at the end of June, 1897, the licence had fallen to the ground.

De Villiers, C.J., said that they were not now going into the facts for the purpose of the argument on exception; they must take it that all the allegations in the plea were true.

Mr. De Villiers (proceeding) said that the date of the contract was the 22nd May, 1897. He submitted that the plaintiff had notified his election within the limit of time. As to the point of false declaration, he maintained that no false declaration was made by the defendant. It was clear that the oaths referred to the land held under licence, and pending that licence.

Cur. Adr. Vult.

Postea, October 24th.

De Villiers, C.J.: The plea to the declaration raises several grounds of defence the first of them being that there was no consideration for the option alleged to have been given by the defendant to the plaintiff under the document of May 22, 1897. The question of consideration does not, however, arise if the declaration is correct in stating that within the limit of time fixed by the document the plaintiff accepted the offer intended by the defendant to be made when he gave the option. The document reads as follows: "I . . . covenant and agree to give to Mr. Scott the option to purchase from me my claim to the farm for the sum of £425, he, the said Scott, to pay the sum of £2 18s. quitrent annually thereon, as it becomes due. . . The said property being at present under Government licence only, it is further agreed that the said Scott shall have the pre-emptionary right of purchase . . . from this date and until such time as the Government may see fit to issue a deed of grant or title to the said land to me . . ., such pre-emptionary right to be extended for a fortnight from and after the date of such deed of grant or title, the said Scott to have the further right to forthwith take all such steps as he may deem necessary or desirable to resell the farm as a whole or by sub-division." If by "quitrent," the parties meant the yearly fees payable under Act 37 of 1882, there would seem to have been a substantial consideration for the defendant's promise, and the transaction of that date would constitute a binding agreement between the parties, but neither party reads the document as meaning that the plaintiff was to pay the yearly fees before completion of the purchase. Even if there were no consideration at the date when the document was signed, the plaintiff would still be entitled to succeed, if he notified to the defendant within the time fixed that he availed himself of the option. Upon his giving such notice, there would arise a "reasonable cause" for the defendant's promise, and the contract would be complete, provided, of course, the plaintiff had not, before accepting the offer, received any intimation that the defendant revoked the offer.

The plaintiff has excepted to the whole of the plea, including the allegations as to consideration, as being insufficient, and his counsel has cited several cases in the Dutch, as well as English Courts, in support of the exceptions. The point decided in the Dutch case of De Villers v. De Vos (Note to 2 Dutch Cons., 158) was that the right to exercise an option is extinguished by death, and it is not transmitted to the heirs. The decision proceeded upon the peculiar terms of the contract there in question, which satisfied counsel whose opinion was asked, and the Court of Appeal in Holland, which decided the case, that the right was intended to be personal to the promisee. I presume, however, that the case was cited by counsel in the present case on account of the inference which might be drawn from the decision that if the promisee had not died he would have been entitled to exercise the option. The inference is a fair one, but it does not further follow that the promise would have been held to be binding if there had been no reasonable cause for the promise. By the same contract under which De Vos gave the option to De Villers to purchase the land in question another piece of land was sold to De Villers, and the price to be paid in the exercise of the option was to be the same as that for which the other piece of land was sold. The transaction was a single one, and the "reasonable cause," or, as we should now term it, the "consideration" which supported the contract of sale of the one piece of land also supported the contract giving the purchaser the option of purchasing the other piece of land. It follows that, during the lifetime at all events of the purchaser, the vendor had no right to revoke the option.

The question whether under the circumstances disclosed in the present case there was any consideration for the defendant's so-called "covenant" does not arise, but assuming that there was no consideration the English case of Cooke v. Oxley (3 Term, Rep. 653) would be an authority for holding that, notwithstanding the notification of acceptance by the plaintiff within the stipulated time, the defendant is not bound by his promise. The decision in that case was not followed by Bacon, V.C., in the subsequent case of Dickinson v. Dodds (2 Chan. Div., 463), but his judgment was reversed on appeal. This was a suit for specific performance of a contract embodied in a document which read as follows: "I hereby agree to sell to Mr. George Dickinson the dwelling-house at Croft belonging to me for the sum of £800. This offer to be left over until Friday, 9 a.m., 12th June, 1874.—J. Dodds." In giving judgment on the appeal, James, L.J., said: "The document, though beginning 'I hereby agree to sell,' was nothing but an offer. . . . There was no consideration given for the undertaking or promise, to whatever extent it may be considered binding, to keep the property unsold until Friday morning. It is clear settled law that this promise was not binding, and that at any moment before a complete acceptance by Dickinson of the offer Dodds was as free as Dickinson himself. . . . Of course it may well be that the one man is bound in some way or other to let the other man know that his mind with regard to the offer has been changed; but in this case beyond all question the plaintiff knew that Dodds was no longer minded to sell the property as plainly and clearly as if Dodds had told him in so many words." Mellish, C.J., said: "I am clearly of opinion that . . . when once the person to whom the offer was made knows that the property has been sold to some one else, it is too late for him to accept the offer." In the present case it is not alleged that the defendant had either revoked his offer or sold the property to some one else before the plaintiff notified his acceptance, and it is therefore unnecessary to decide whether the decision of the Appeal Court in Dickinson v. Dodds is in accordance with the law of this colony. As to the case of Cooke v. Oxley, I am not aware that it has ever been followed by this Court, and I am certainly not prepared to accept it as a binding authority in the present case. Even if the writing signed by the defendant were regarded as an offer only, which might be revoked, it was a continuing offer during the time limited for acceptance, and as soon as it was accepted it became a contract binding upon both parties thereto. In the absence of any allegation that the defendant revoked his offer before it was accepted, that offer must be held to have remained open until the plaintiff accepted it. The defendant, however, further alleges in his plea that "the plaintiff did not notify the defendant within the time allowed by the said agreement that he availed himself of the said option." If this allegation is correct there clearly was no contract, for the defendant's offer was to remain open for a definite period only, and after the expiration of that period the plaintiff no longer had the right to exercise his option. It is just possible that the allegation may mean that the date at which the plaintiff alleged notice to have been given was not within the prescribed time, but that is not the reasonable meaning of the words which I have quoted from the plea. For the purpose of his exception the plaintiff must be taken to have admitted the correctness of every allegation contained in the plea. That plea contained several grounds of defence somewhat confusedly mixed together, but the exception is not that the plea is embarrassing, but that it is insufficient as a defence to the action. The allegation to which I have referred, if proved, would be a sufficient defence to the action, and the exception must, therefore, be disallowed. The costs of the exception must abide the result, for if, at the trial, it should be proved that due notice was given within the stipulated period, and that, in other respects, the plaintiff is entitled to succeed, it would not be just that he should bear any part of the costs.

As the exceptions have not been sustained, it is not necessary for me to say very much about another part of the plea, which raises the defence of the illegality of the contract relied upon by the plaintiff. The defence thus raised is that the licence under which the defendant occupied the land at the time of the contract soon afterwards expired, and that, as it would have been a falsehood on his part, entailing the forfeiture of his right to the land, to make the declaration required by the 8th section of Act 37 of 1882, on applying for a fresh licence, the contract was illegal, and cannot be enforced. The declaration on oath is to the effect that the application is made for the applicant's own exclusive use and benefit, and not directly or indirectly for the use of any other person, and that the applicant has not made any arrangement or agreement to enable or permit any other person to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, the allotment in respect of which the application is made. Under the 12th and 14th sections of the Act, however, the interest in land held on licence is assignable, provided that the Commissioner of Crown Lands approves of the transfer after due application made to him by the licensee. The policy of the Act obviously was not to allow any application for a licence to be made for the benefit of any other than the licensee, but at the same time to allow the licensee, after obtaining his licence, to assign his interest if, after due public notice, no good objection is shown to such a course. It is common cause that the option was given during the currency of the first licence. The defendant's interest in the land was, therefore, at that time assignable under the provisions of the Act, and there is no allegation in the plea of the plaintiff's knowledge that the licence would soon expire, and that if he did not, before such expiration, exercise his option, a fresh licence would be applied for. In the absence of such knowledge on his part the plaintiff might fairly have presumed that the defendant intended to make an application to the Commissioner, under the 12th section of the Act. The plea goes on to say that the terms and conditions under which a licence can be assigned were not complied with, but it was fairly argued that it was the fault of the defendant if, while keeping his offer open, he did not comply with the provisions of the 12th section of the Act.

These are matters upon which further light could be thrown by evidence, and which could not well be decided on exceptions.

[The exception was, therefore, disallowed, question of costs to abide the result of the action.]

Postea, Nov. 11, 1904. The action was tried and judgment given for plaintiff, as prayed, with costs, including the costs of the argument on exceptions.

MCKENZIE V. TABLE BAY } 1904.
HARBOUR BOARD. } Oct. 21st.

Arbitrator — Account — Plant —
Short delivery.

The plaintiff, a Dock agent, sued the defendants for certain sums said to be due in respect of plant sold by him to the defendants, and also in respect of goods short delivered and delivered in a damaged condition by the defendants. The defendants denied purchase of certain portions of the plant named in the declaration, and also that the plaintiff had incurred the liabilities referred to in his declaration by reason of any negligence or misfeasance on their part, beyond a certain sum already assessed by an arbitrator, which sum they now tendered. By agreement of parties the question of all claims in contention was referred to arbitration.

Defendants claimed certain sums in reconvention on their own account, and also certain other sums on behalf of certain clients.

Held, that all claims on their own behalf, and also all claims on behalf of clients from whom they held powers of attorney, and none other should also be submitted to arbitration.

This was an action brought by Andrew Ritchie McKenzie, of Cape Town, forwarding agent, against the Table Bay Harbour Board.

The plaintiff's declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff was, at the dates hereinafter mentioned carrying on the business of a dock agent and of landing, shipping and delivering cargo at the Alfred Docks, Cape Town. The defendant is the Table Bay Harbour Board.

2. Prior to and in the month of October, 1901, the defendant resolved to take over and perform all the duties of docks agents, and the landing, shipping and delivery of cargo at the Docks, Cape Town, and it was agreed between the parties that the defendant would buy and the plaintiff sell the whole of plaintiff's plant, including that which was already landed and in use in the Colony, that which was on indent and that which was in course of construction, and the parties agreed that the plant already landed and in use should be paid for at valuation, and that the plant on indent and in course of construction should be paid for on arrival here and on completion. An inventory of the plant landed and in use was drawn up and the defendant paid the plaintiff therefor.

3. There were at the same time two road locomotives on indent and five Colonial box trailers in course of construction. The said locomotives have been landed and delivered, the trailers have been constructed and delivered all to defendant. The price of the former is £1,831 4s. 5d., and of the latter £362 10s. 0d. or £2,193 14s. 5d. in all.

4. At the aforementioned date the plaintiff was engaged in the landing and delivery of certain cargoes, and the plaintiff proposed that he should be allowed to complete the said deliveries in order to facilitate the delivery and the adjustment of claims by consignees and others in respect thereto, but the defendant refused the said offer, and thereupon it was agreed between the parties that on and from the 14th of October, 1901, the plaintiff should cease to act as dock agent, and to land and deliver goods, and that the defendant should take over and perform the same, and that the defendant should become responsible for all liabilities in connection with cargo for which the plaintiff had been appointed dock agent, and in regard to which the plaintiff had already had the handling, whether the same had been partially delivered by the plaintiff and completed by the defendant or otherwise.

5. Liabilities to the extent of £4,628 16s. 4d. have been incurred and paid by the plaintiff in respect of the matters set forth in paragraph 4 hereof, and under and by virtue of the agreement in the said paragraph set forth the defendant is liable to the plaintiff for the amount thereof (copy of particulars thereof is hereunto annexed). Of this amount the defendant has admitted liability for £684 6s. 2d., but has not paid same.

6. All things have happened, all times have elapsed, and all conditions have been fulfilled entitling the plaintiff to the two sums of £,193 14s. 5d. and £4,628 16s. 4d.; but the defendant, though requested so to do, refuses to pay the same or any part thereof.

Wherefore, the plaintiff claims:

(a) Payment of the two sums of £2,193 14s. 5d. and £4,628 16s. 4d., with interest a tempore morae.

(b) Alternative relief.

(c) Costs of suit.

To the declaration the defendants pleaded as follows:

1. The defendant admits paragraph 1 of the declaration.

2. On the 13th October, 1901, the defendant took in hand the landing, shipping and delivery of cargo at the Docks, Cape Town, and with that object in view agreed with the plaintiff to purchase and take over, and did purchase and take over all the horses, mules, harness, wagons, carts, buggies, trailers, traction engines, donkey engines, tugs, lighters, machinery, tarpaulins, coal bags and all other plant and articles used by him in connection with his business as a dock agent, and a deed of submission to arbitration was executed between the parties to determine the price to be paid by the defendant.

3. The price was so determined and paid and included a sum of £362 10s. 0d. for certain Colonial box trailers, which include the box trailers referred to in paragraph 3 of the declaration.

4. As to the two road locomotives referred to in the said paragraph, they were never taken over or purchased by the Harbour Board, and the Board does not intend to purchase them. An offer was made in July, 1903, to purchase them, but the offer was not accepted, and is no longer open.

5. Save as aforesaid the defendant denies the allegations in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the declaration.

6. Up to and including the 12th October the plaintiff was engaged in the landing and delivering of cargoes, and the plaintiff proposed that he should be allowed to complete the said deliveries in order to facilitate the delivery and the adjustment of claims by consignees and others in respect thereto, but the defendant refused the said offer.

7. Save as aforesaid the defendant does not admit the allegations in paragraph 4, and says that no agreement was entered into in the terms therein alleged; and the defendant specially denies that any contract such as is contemplated by the Act No. 36 of 1896, section 30, sub-section (c) was entered into relative to the matters alleged in that paragraph so as legally to bind the Board which has no power to contract save in so far as it is authorised by the said Act.

8. The Board was willing after refusing the plaintiff's offer, referred to in paragraph 6, to accept responsibility and answer claims for any loss or damage to goods landed from certain ships, the discharge of which the plaintiff had commenced before the 15th October, 1901, and subsequently the Board completed on or after the 15th October, 1901, in so far as such loss or damage was found to be not caused during the time when the plaintiff was effecting discharge, and in so far as the amount of such loss or damage should be reported and recommended for payment to the Board by one J. E. P. Close, to whom the Board entrusted the enquiry as to the amount, if any, to be paid to the plaintiff in respect of such claims for loss or damage which he might be called upon to pay and might have paid.

9. The said Close instituted and held a full and comprehensive inquiry into various claims against the Board or the plaintiff made by sundry merchants, including all such claims as aforesaid, which were advanced or communicated by the plaintiff or on his behalf, and including all the claims amounting to £4,628 16s. 4d., now claimed in the declaration, and the said Close thereafter reported to the Board and recommended that the Board should accept liability to a certain extent in respect of certain of the said claims, and should pay to the plaintiff the sum of £684 6s. 2d., which amount the defendant tenders to pay together with taxed costs to this date. The plaintiff has had full particulars of the details comprising the sum of £684 6s. 2d.

10. The Board has never agreed to pay and refuses to pay to the plaintiff any greater sum than the said sum of £684 6s. 2d. with taxed costs aforesaid.

11. Save as aforesaid the defendant denies the allegations in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the Declaration, especially denying that the plaintiff has incurred or paid liabilities to the extent alleged, and specially denying that the Board agreed at any time to pay to the plaintiff such sums as he might pay to claimants, or any sum other than those for which the Board after inquiry as aforesaid accepted the responsibility.

Wherefore the defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim may be dismissed with costs.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. W. P. Buchanan) for plaintiff; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. P. S. T. Jones) for defendants.

Mr. Schreiner said it was a matter of agreement on the correspondence between the parties that after certain general principles had been determined upon by his lordship, the matter should be referred, if the Court thought fit, to an arbitrator. So far as the claim in convention was concerned, all the items were in dispute, except £9 15s. 11d. As to the claim in reconvention, the plaintiffs said that the Board was not liable for the amounts claimed by the defendant. They denied that the defendants were entitled to sue upon any claim in respect of goods belonging to third persons not parties to the suit, who might allege claims against the Board. That, said counsel, was one of the principal points in dispute. It was quite plain that McKenzie and Co. were putting forward claims for goods in large quantities, which the Board had either delivered or paid for, or in respect of claims which, after investigation by the Board, had been abandoned by the principals. McKenzie and Co. did not state in their declaration that they had power to represent these people, and they did not produce any power of attorney. The Board said they could not go to arbitration on X's claim, unless X were a party to the arbitration. If his lordship heard some evidence, he would see the reasonableness of the attitude the Board took up. Some £400, at least, was covered by goods actually delivered to the principals themselves by the Board or paid for, and there was another sum of £500 odd, or nearly £600, in relation to which after inquiry the principals, for whom McKenzie and Co. now put forward a claim, had abandoned the claim against them. Then, further, the Board could prove that, of the goods claimed for, between £400 and £500 was short-landed out of ships, and never came to the Board at all. The Board repudiated McKenzie's claim also, on account of their own goods, though there was £40 2s. 8d. that the Board were prepared to admit when the figures were gone into. He must call his lordship's attention especially to one large item by McKenzies for £647 12s. 11d., on the claim in reconvention. It was alleged that the Board were responsible to McKenzies in relation to goods which the Board received and "undertook for reward to deliver to the defendants, and which they had wholly failed to deliver, or, if they did not wholly fail to deliver, they had delivered in a damaged and improper condition." This item of £647 12s. 11d. (October 24, 1903) was "charges paid to Searight and Co. for lighters and demurrage of coal, due to failure of the Harbour Board to take delivery according to instructions and in accordance with the terms of the contract with them, and for which payment was made in advance." This was a claim that was absolutely repudiated by the Board. It would be for his lordship to decide, in relation to certain Clan Line steamers, out of which this claim arose, whether the Board were justified in not allowing coal ships to be discharged at the South Arm.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Have the parties considered the name of an arbitrator?]

Mr. Schreiner said that the attorneys had discussed names, and had arrived at a certain decision.

[De Villiers, C.J., said it seemed to him that the arbitrator should be an efficient accountant, with a good knowledge of shipping questions.]

Mr. Schreiner said that the name of Mr. Gibson had been mentioned.

[De Villiers, C.J., said that the parties might consider the position during the adjournment, and make some statement.]

After the adjournment.

Sir H. Juta said that the claim in convention might be referred. Then came the claim in reconviction, which were a certain number of other claims upon which they would like the ruling of the Court. These were claims where the ownership in the goods was consisted of various items. As to the item of £600 odd, they were agreeable that that should be referred. Then there remained other claims, some of which were for their own goods. There evidence could be brought as to the contract McKenzies made with their principals, and the bills of lading not really in McKenzie and Co., but being made over to them, etc

Evidence was called for the defendants.

Warren B. Sexton, director of the defendant firm, said that, as landing and shipping agents, they undertook the delivery of goods carried overseas from Table Bay to people who instructed them. They had bills of lading, which were endorsed over to them, or orders for the shipping company. A large part of the claim was made up of claims for non-delivery of goods, in accordance with the contract between McKenzie and Co. and the Harbour Board. They also claimed for goods delivered in a damaged condition; McKenzies had authority to claim from people to whom the goods were consigned. They had not written authority.

Counsel having been heard further in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: The question raises in an interesting legal one, but I do not think it necessary in the present case to go into that. In regard to the claim in convention, both parties are agreed that it should go to arbitration. With regard to the claim in reconviction, I am not prepared to refer those items to an arbitrator, unless the defendants are prepared to refer only such items as were claimed on their own behalf, or where they produced powers of attorney from third parties in respect of items claimed belonging to them. That is the position I take up, without deciding the legal point aised. Have the parties agreed to the appointment of the arbitrator.

Sir H. Juta said they had agreed to the appointment of Mr. Gibson.

[De Villiers, C.J., inquired if there was any application as to costs.]

Mr. Schreiner asked to have the question held over until the arbitrator's award had been obtained. This was agreed to.

Mr. Schreiner asked the Court to appoint a date for the discovery of records.

De Villiers, C.J., said there was no application of that kind before the Court. The only thing he could do was to express a strong opinion that it should be carried out as soon as possible. The order was made, and if it was not obeyed, an application for judgment for contempt of Court should be made.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

DREYER V. DREYER. } 1904.
 } Oct. 21st.

This was an action brought by Johannes Mostert Dreyer, of Wellington, against his wife, for a restitution of conjugal rights, failing which a decree of divorce, on the ground of her desertion. Mr. Van Zyl appeared for the applicant.

The defendant did not appear.

Mr. Birch proved the marriage of defendant, and plaintiff.

Johannes Mostert Dreyer, the plaintiff, stated he was married to defendant in June, 1902, and lived happily with her until July, 1904. She then left him, and went on a holiday, and stated she would decide whether she would live with him or not. They had no quarrels. She stopped with an aunt in the village, and witness repeatedly visited her, so often, in fact, that the aunt called him "moing verg." At the expiration of the month she went to Worcester. He wrote letters to her there, but received no reply. There was one child of the marriage, and witness asked to have access to it. They were married by ante-nuptial contract, and witness had made over his life policy on her.

To the Court: He was prepared to support the child, but if so he would like the custody of it. It was only nine months old.

[Buchanan, J.: You only ask for access to the child, and the Court cannot give you more.]

The Court granted a decree of restitution, defendant to return on or before the 30th November, failing which, a rule nisi, returnable on the 12th December, would be granted for divorce. The defendant to have custody of the child.

Postea (December 12).

The rule was made absolute.

DE VILLIERS, LARSSON AND CO. V.
DE KOCK.

In this action, Messrs. De Villiers, Larsson and Co., builders, of the Paarl, sought to recover from Mrs. Samuel de Kock the sum of £244, balance of account due for work done.

The plaintiffs' declaration stated that they were builders and contractors, residing at the Paarl. The defendant was married out of community of property to Samuel de Kock. On or about the 25th November, by agreement in writing, it was agreed by the defendant, with the knowledge of her husband, that the plaintiffs should build for her certain two semi-detached cottages, for which she should pay £983 on the execution of the work. Plaintiffs and defendant, with the knowledge of her husband, signed the agreement. Plaintiffs completed the whole of the work in terms of the agreement, and from time to time received payment for the work done from defendant, through her husband. It was subsequently agreed between the plaintiffs and defendant that plaintiff should do certain other extra work for the defendant, which amounted to £11, making the total amount of the contract £994. Plaintiffs had done their work, and the amount of £994, became payable. The payments on account amounted to £750. There was therefore £244 due. On or about the 3rd May, 1904, the plaintiffs received from defendant, through her husband, a promissory note, payable on the 3rd August, for £240 10s., and signed by her husband as her agent. On the note being presented at the bank it was not honoured.

The defendant's plea admitted the first paragraph of the plaintiffs' declaration. As to paragraph 3, which specifically dealt with the contract, she admitted that on the date alleged she entered into an agreement with the plaintiffs. She entered into the agreement jointly with her husband, and any obligations incurred thereunder were incurred jointly by them. The plea also admitted that the work was done and that the payments were made, but they were made with the husband jointly. Defendant admitted that the £750 was paid, but said that her husband owed the balance of the account due. She also admitted that a promissory note was given, but said that it was signed by the husband, whose estate was assigned, and that he acted for himself alone. She had a receipt in full for her indebtedness.

The plaintiffs' replication stated that the promissory note was received by them for the convenience of the defendant. They denied that they discharged defendant from her liability.

[Mr. Mc Gregor (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers), for plaintiffs. Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Van Zyl) for defendant.]

Mr. McGregor said the Court would see from the pleadings that there was no question as to work not being done. It was merely a question of liability for work done. The promissory note was given and taken in full satisfaction of the payments due.

Johannes Larsson stated that he was one of the plaintiffs in the present action. Mr. De Kock met him in the street, and asked him to build a house on behalf of his wife. He told him he would draw up a plan for a cottage. By agreement, he sent a plan, and estimated the cost at £983. Mrs. De Kock sent for him and asked him to do the work cheaper, but he replied that he could not. The contract (produced) was then signed. While the house was being built, Mrs. De Kock instructed him, and she pointed out the site. He was building the house for Mrs. De Kock, and she was to pay him.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: All the documents were drawn in witness's office, and taken to Mrs. De Kock to sign. Witness had a duplicate original agreement drawn up. It stated that the contract was between Samuel de Kock and his spouse and plaintiffs. The conditions were also drawn in witness's office. It stated that the cottages erected were to be to the satisfaction of Samuel de Kock, Esq., and his wife. In May, his firm was rather hard pressed for money. He could not say that the building was completed then.

Re-examined: Witness knew defendant was married in community of property.

John Louw de Villiers stated he was one of the partners in the plaintiff firm, and drew up the contract. He went to defendant's house, and saw Mrs. De Kock. He signed the original contract. Mr. De Kock signed the duplicate, but witness knew nothing about that. She also signed the plan. Witness asked Mrs. De Kock for a payment on account last January, and she said that owing to the absence of her husband, she was not able to pay.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Witness left the contract with Mrs. De Kock after she signed it. It was not for De Kock to sign it. He did not mean the contract to be made with De Kock. Witness heard about the promissory note, and was vexed because Mrs. De Kock had not signed it.

Re-examined: Witness put Mr. De Kock's name into the contract because he was the husband.

Marcus Jacobus de Villiers, also a partner in the plaintiff firm, stated he knew very little about the original contract. Witness received the payments from time to time. They were never made directly by Mrs. De Kock, but by Mr. Samuel de Kock. When the promissory note was given, the work was almost completed. It was signed by Samuel de Kock. Witness asked Mr. De Kock when the work was completed to accommodate him with the balance due. He replied that he could not just then, but that he would give him a bill. Witness took the bill, and discounted it, but the defendant did not meet it. He went to Mrs. De Kock and mentioned the matter, and she said that she would see that he got all the money. Mr. De Kock went insolvent shortly after. Witness, after that, asked Mrs. De Villiers to hold good her promise to see him paid, and she replied that she would see to it.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Witness did not ask for the promissory note. Samuel de Kock offered it to him. Witness endeavoured on several occasions to get Mrs. De Kock's signature to the note, but she would not sign, as her husband was away.

For the defence

Samuel de Kock, the husband of defendant, said his estate was insolvent; he surrendered it in July. He signed the contract with plaintiffs to build the houses. The plaintiffs brought the contract to the house, and said they wanted him to sign it. He did not sign plaintiffs' contract, as he was not there at the time. Plaintiffs gave a clean receipt for the balance, in return for the bill, and witness handed the receipt to his wife. The buildings were occupied, but not complete, when he gave the note.

[Buchanan, J.: His wife had not paid the £250 into the insolvent estate.]

Henry Phillip van Zyl, an attorney at Paarl, said he heard a conversation between Mr. De Kock and Mr. A. de Villiers. He heard Mr. De Kock say his wife wanted a clean receipt.

Susannah M. de Kock, the defendant in the action, corroborated her husband's evidence. She did not sign the note, because she had received a clean receipt from plaintiffs.

[Buchanan, J.: But they have built £240 worth of property on your ground, and you do not pay them a penny. Is that honest? It is cheating them out of £240.]

Witness said she thought plaintiffs would get the money from Mr. De Kock when the note was given. She did not know that the money raised on mortgage had been used.

Counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

Buchanan, J., said that in this case the plaintiffs were a firm of builders, carrying on business at Paarl, and the defendant was Mrs. De Kock, who was married out of community of property to her husband, Samuel de Kock, and in this action was assisted by him. By the written articles of agreement put in, a contract was entered into between the present defendant, called in the contract "employer," on the one part, and the present plaintiffs on the other part. This was clearly a contract between two persons, each having a different persona. It was not as between a husband and wife married in community of property. The contract was to build two cottages for £894. This was done, and payment was made to the extent of £750, leaving a balance of £244 due. According to the contract, the cottages were erected on the land belonging to Mrs. De Kock only. Recently, since the contract had been concluded, the other contractor, Mr. De Kock, had surrendered his estate and become insolvent. If the Court looked at the contract as between two persons, each would only be liable for his share of the work contracted for. In this case, however, it appeared that the cottages were erected on the land owned by Mrs. De Kock, and she had been sued for the balance of the amount due for the work and labour done. The defence set up was that after the work was done, Mr. De Kock signed a promissory note for the balance of the money due. The circumstances under which the note was given were as follows: The cottages were occupied, but a little outside work had to be finished, and a large balance of account was due. The plaintiffs being in need of money, applied to Mr. De Kock for the balance. He told them he was unable to give it to them then, but went with one of the plaintiffs to the bank, where it was agreed that De Kock should give a promissory note. This was done, but the note was dishonoured. Now the defence set up was that that action created a new contract, and that Mrs. De Kock was discharged from any further liability. The question therefore arose as to whether the giving of this note was a novation or not. Under all the circumstances, he did not think it was. The sixth paragraph of the plea helped the plaintiffs very materially. The defendant pleaded that payments to the extent of £750 were made to the plaintiffs by her husband, acting on behalf of herself and her husband jointly, but that when he gave this note, he acted solely on his own behalf. He made the payments on behalf of both in cash, and the question naturally arose: why should he act on his own behalf only when he gave the note? On the suggestion of the bank manager, the plaintiff asked Mrs. De Kock to sign the note. Supposing she had signed this note in conjunction with her husband, she would only be liable for half the amount. This action had been brought on a certain contract, and on that he was bound to hold that they were liable, not severally, but jointly, and that therefore only one-half the amount could be recovered from each party. The defendant must therefore be held liable for one-half the amount claimed, viz., £122. There might still be a chance of recovering the balance of the account due, but on the pleadings before the Court, it could not be done.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon Sir JOHN BUCHANAN, and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

APPEALS.

REX V. JOE LIS, ALIAS { 1904.
SILVER. { Oct. 24th.

Mr. Burton with the leave of the Court, applied, as a matter of urgency, for a reduction of bail in this case. The accused was a present in gaol. His petition set out that he was a barber, residing in Cape Town. On the 10th August he was charged in the Court of the Resident Magistrate with contravening section 33, sub-section (a), of the Act 36 of 1902, or otherwise, section 32 of the said Act, in that he had been living on the proceeds of prostitution or had been concerned in brothel-keeping. He was found guilty on the alternative charge, and sentenced to three months' imprisonment. Against this conviction he had lodged an appeal. Bail was fixed in a personal surety of £500, and two further sureties of £250 each. While this appeal was pending, accused was arrested on a charge of attempting to defeat the ends of justice, and had been committed to the Criminal Sessions, bail being fixed in a personal surety of £500 and a further surety of £500. This bail was excessive, and more than he could raise, and he applied for a reduction to enable him to prepare his defence. Counsel added that he understood accused would be able to offer half the amount.

Mr. Howel Jones, who appeared for the Crown, said that no objection would be raised to that.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court will grant an order reducing the bail by one-half. Of course, it is understood that this is done with the consent of the Crown, and that we have not gone into the merits at all. I don't want to say that the Magistrate was wrong.

LE ROUX V. MALHERBE.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., mentioned this matter, which was an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court of the Supreme Court. He said he should like some indication from the Bench as to when the case might be reached.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It will be taken on another day, perhaps next Monday. I think it is desirable that the judge who tried the case should not sit in the appeal.]

Mr. Schreiner pointed out that the Act for the Better Administration of Justice No. 35 of 1896, Sec. 20 said that one of the judges of appeal shall be the Chief Justice.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are you sure of that?]

Mr. Schreiner said he believed that that was laid down in the Act. The constitution of the Appeal Court was incomplete without the Chief Justice.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If it is, I am very sorry. His Lordship after looking into the Act, added: "Oh, yes, that is so; it had escaped me."]

REX V. WILLIAMS. { 1904.
 { Oct. 24th.

Criminal appeal—Admissibility of evidence—Admission of the defendant's evidence taken under compulsion.

The appellant, who was an insolvent, was examined at the third meeting of his creditors under the 7th section of Act 38 of 1884, and was subsequently charged before the Resident Magistrate with fraud and breach of trust. At the trial the proceedings in insolvency, including the evidence given by the appellant, was admitted as evidence and the appellant's depositions were read. The depositions had an important bearing in the case, for, without them, there was no reasonable certainty of conviction.

Held, that as substantial wrong was done by the admission of the evidence, the conviction should be set aside.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the High Court of Southern Rhodesia, confirming a conviction and sentence passed by the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Salisbury upon one Williams, formerly an auctioneer and commission agent, on charges of theft and culpable insolvency. Mr. McGregor was for the appellant; Mr. Pyemont was for the Attorney-General of Southern Rhodesia.

Mr. McGregor said that the case came in appeal before their lordships by special leave of the senior Judge of Southern Rhodesia. The appellant was tried on the 1st inst. before the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Salisbury. A preparatory examination was first taken, and the case was remitted by the Attorney-General, and thereupon the appellant was charged in the Magistrate's Court, with theft on four counts, from the Northern Insurance Company, Wilmoughby's Consolidated Estates Co., White's Consolidated Estates Company, and the Cape Orchard Company, and also with culpable insolvency upon two counts under section 71 of the Insolvent Ordinance. On each of the counts the defendant was found guilty, and it would appear from the newspaper report, which had been sent down, that he was sentenced to one month's imprisonment, with hard labour, upon each charge. Then an appeal was made to the senior Judge of the Court of Southern Rhodesia; and his lordship took time to consider his decision, and then confirmed the sentence, but granted special leave of appeal. Mr. McGregor went on to say that as part of the record against the prisoner a statement made by him under section 61 of the Insolvent Ordinance, had been put in. Now, as far as he was aware, there was no reported decision of the Courts of this colony as to whether or not a statement made under section 61 of the Ordinance could be put in by the Crown as part of the evidence for the Crown. He was informed, however, that one of their lordships sitting at Malmesbury in the case of Re r. Louie had a similar point before him, but he (counsel) had been unable to ascertain what the decision was.

Buchanan, J., said that the point had been raised before him both on circuit at Malmesbury and also in the Supreme Court. He ruled against the admission of the evidence in both cases. But the objection only applies to the evidence in the charges under the Insolvent Ordinance.

Mr. McGregor: That is so, but if the point is upheld, it will affect every one of the counts. Proceeding, counsel explained that the matter originally came before the Magistrate's Court in the form of charges against Williams and Money, auctioneers and commission agents, both Williams and Money being found guilty by the Magistrate. Both the accused appealed to the High Court, and Mr. Justice Vincent quashed the conviction of Money on all counts, but confirmed the conviction and sentence of Williams. Counsel (proceeding) called attention to the very meagre character of the evidence of theft of property belonging to the Orchard Company. He also observed that there was a strange neglect and failure to call any principal of the estate companies to show what the relations with the accused were. The contention of the appellant was that he was a debtor.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But take the Cape Orchard Company?]

There we have only the evidence—evidence—not at all conclusive—of an agent. Why were his principals not called to show what were their arrangements with the accused?

[De Villiers, C.J.: But here the accused had to collect rents, and he appropriated the money; surely that was theft?]

Not if he had to pay in only at the end of the month.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Even in that case he ought to have kept the money apart.]

That would have been the better course, but if once credit is given to an agent his liability ceases to be criminal, and becomes purely civil. That disposes of the case of the Orchard Company. Then as to the case of the Insurance Company, Mr. Coxwell can speak only from the books, and they are not evidence.

[Counsel here proceeded to review the rest of the evidence in the Court below, and continued:]

It is very significant that the annexure EE shows that the relations of the accused with "William's Consolidated" were the purely civil relations of debtor and creditor. There is no evidence of animus furandi. See Q. v. Golding (13 S.C.R., 214. That case shows that the relations of creditor and debtor may subsist between principal and agent. Here the Crown has not shown what the relation was. In the case of "White's Consolidated," all payments were made in round sums. In Q. v. Golding the Court laid stress on the fact that there was no subsisting relationship of master and servant. Here no such question can be raised as an auctioneer is clearly an independent contractor.

[Maasdorp, J.: Even if he had not to pay over the money at once he had not the ownership of the money. May not the arrangement have been made merely to save trouble?]

The collector was not a mere bailee of the money because he was authorised to collect his commission, and to operate on the Company's banking account. He sold goods on commission, accounted to the Orchard Company, and was responsible for moneys stolen or lost. The magistrate's reasons show that his standard of negligence is far too severe. As to the evidence taken in the proceedings in insolvency, but admitted at the criminal trial, the magistrate was clearly wrong Q. v. Walker (8 Cox, 1 and 27, L.T. 297) Stephen's Crim. Law (Art. 309.) Is the prisoner liable criminally as a bailee? No. Russell on Crimes (p. 134, 5th edit.), Stephen (Art. 285), Q. v. Hassell (3 Law Journal), Matthias De Criminh (1-1-2). I submit that if the relations between the parties were somewhat intricate the Court will be inclined to impute civil, rather than criminal liability. To impute the latter the Court must be satisfied as to the mens rea, the way in which the books were kept, the fact that accused had authority to operate on the banking accounts, and that he paid over large lump sums of money to his principals, all argue the relations of debtor and creditor.

As to the charges of culpable insolvency, to establish that there must have been a breach of trust on the part of the auctioneer, there was nothing of the kind in the transaction with Major Straker, where the money was not to be paid until the second day after the sale.

[Masendorp, J.: Had he to pay the money whether he had received it or not?]

Presumably so.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But what about the rents?]

My present argument would not apply to them. See R. v. Filjoen (7 C.T.R., 465).

Mr. Pyemont: I contend that in this case no substantial injustice has been done, and that the evidence taken in the proceedings in insolvency was properly admitted at the criminal trial. Our law holds a man guilty of theft whether he is a bailee or not if he wrongfully converts to his own use the money of another. As to the Willoughby Company and the White Company, the appellant was instructed to put all moneys collected into a certain bank, and this he did not do. The case as to the Orchard Company is not quite so clear, but an auctioneer has no right to keep money realised in his own hands. R. v. Simmons and Williams (13 C.T.R., 1159) and if he does so is guilty of culpable insolvency should he become insolvent. As to Major Straker's sale, the accused was to pay over in two days after the sale, probably because he would then receive the money. None of his sales were really credit sales, but commission sales. I contend that there is ample evidence of the charge of theft independently of the proceedings before the Master.

Mr. McGregor (in reply): The proceedings before the Master were clearly both pertinent and material in the Northern Insurance case, and the magistrate was clearly influenced thereby; that is by evidence which was inadmissible. This being so, I submit that the conviction cannot stand.

De Villiers, C.J.: At the trial of the accused an objection was taken by his legal adviser to certain evidence, which had been admitted at the preliminary examination, being again used for the trial. The evidence consisted of all the proceedings in insolvency, and included in those proceedings was the evidence given by the accused himself before the Master under the Insolvent Ordinance. The Magistrate, however, dismissed the objection, and he proceeded to try the case upon the merits. There, subsequently, was an appeal against the judgment of the Magistrate to the High Court of Southern Rhodesia. It is not clear whether that objection was taken before the judge. He says nothing about it in his reasons, but I consider that, notwithstanding that the objection was not taken before him, it is still competent to the appellant, whose agent did take the objection in the court below, to take the objection again in this court. Now, it appears to me that the evidence was wholly inadmissible. By the 7th section of the Act 38 of 1884 it is enacted: "It shall be lawful for any creditor, or the attorney or agent of any creditor, as well as for the Master of the Supreme Court, or Resident Magistrate, as the case may be, to examine any insolvent upon oath under the provisions of 61st section of the said Ordinance. And if at any such examination it shall appear to the said Master or Magistrate that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting that the said insolvent has been guilty of culpable or fraudulent insolvency, it shall be the duty of such Master or Magistrate to call for such further evidence and documents as he may deem necessary, and submit such evidence to the Attorney-General, or Solicitor-General or Crown Prosecutor, as the case may be, for the purpose of instituting criminal proceedings against such insolvent, and at any such examination no insolvent shall be entitled to refuse to answer any question on the ground that the answer, if given, might tend to incriminate him." Now, the appellant, who was the insolvent, was bound to answer any question put to him, and I consider that any evidence which was given by him in such circumstances ought not again to be used at any trial against him. Any evidence that is given at such trial should be quite independent of any evidence which the insolvent had given under compulsion. It does not, however, follow that the Court of Appeal would in every case necessarily quash the conviction if such evidence had been given. If it were unimportant evidence, and had really no bearing upon the trial the Court of Appeal would not set aside the conviction by reason merely of the inadmissibility of the evidence. In the present case, however, it is clear that the evidence was extremely important, and that by its admission a substantial wrong was done to the appellant. The case which has been cited of ber, 1901, and continued service until the 30th June, 1904, and he wished to pass an examination here and to complete his term of service. The point upon which the Law Society wished for a definite ruling from the Court of Appeal was whether, under the law as it now existed, any person could enter into articles elsewhere than in this colony, and, after serving those articles, could then come and claim to count the service that he had undergone in some other country as part of his service?

Sir H. Juta (for the Law Society): The point of this appeal is, whether a man may enter into Articles elsewhere and then come into this Colony and claim to have the period during which he has served outside of it counted?

The learned Judge (Hopley, J.) in granting this admission (see 14, C.T.R. 765) appears to have relied chiefly on ex parte Crawford (15 S.C.R., 105) and ex parte Rothman (13 C.T.R., 276). Crawford entered into Articles here and then went to Matebeleland. Rothman was articled in Matebeleland. Now, an attorney of England, Ireland or Scotland may be admitted here, and the time during which he has served Articles in any of those countries must count as good service. See Charter of Justice, Secs. 20 and 22 and Rule of Court, 149, which is based upon the provisions of the Charter. See also ex parte Hall (1 Searle, 22) and Rule 151. That rule allows service in the United Kingdom to count. When five years' service was required, one year, at least, had to be served in this Colony. When the period was reduced to three years, one year here was still required, and two years in the United Kingdom. Ex parte Lance (Buch. 1879, p. 78).

Then after the Charter of Justice came Act 12 of 1858, on which Lance's case was decided. Sec. 3 of this Act puts an articled clerk who had served 3 years on the same footing with those who had served 5 years under the provisions of the Charter.

Notaries, however, were bound to serve the whole of their time within this Colony. Then came Act 27 of 1883, Sec 14 of which requires that the clerk should pass a law examination, save in a few exceptional cases, and, moreover, provides that the Articles must be filed and registered within 3 months of execution.

[Buchanan, J.: What about those who have served part of their time in the United Kingdom?]

They fall under the exception. No doubt His Lordship (Hopley, J.) felt this to be a case of great hardship, and acted accordingly, but the Court has no discretion in the matter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Cannot Articles be entered into here for less than 3 years?]

I submit not. "Articles" mean for 3 years. Then Act 30 of 1892 deals with reciprocity, and allows certain attorneys to be admitted here, but says nothing about articled clerks. Sec. 6, however, makes special provision as to service in British Bechuanaland with a Cape Colony attorney; and that shows that the Legislature never contemplated the recognition of any other foreign service. Act 11 of 1903 arranges for admission of an advocate as an attorney on condition of his being first disbarred and then serving articles for 18 months in this Colony.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the order for admission has already been made; can we go behind that?]

The section of the Charter of Justice which requires service in this Colony is strictly imperative.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It does not say what length of service.]

No, it leaves the time to be fixed by the Rules of Court and the Legislature, and they have said, three years. No doubt was ever raised as to the necessity of service in the Colony till ex parte Harsant (Buch. 1873, p. 91). The law in this respect has never been changed.

[De Villiers, C.J.: As an attorney is an officer of the Court, surely the Court has some discretion as to the enforcement of its own rules. Here no right is infringed.]

I submit that the Court has no discretion.

[Maasdorp, J.: It is only a Rule of Court which orders two years' service in the Colony.]

Yes, and possibly your Lordships may have power to alter the rule, but not. I submit, to contravene it as long as it stands.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones (for respondent): The only case I have been able to find bearing on this appeal, in addition to those already cited, is ex parte Halderness (13 C.T.R., 254). In that case the Court admitted, though there is no rule under which an attorney of S. Rhodesia can be admitted here. In Rothman's case service in the Transvaal was allowed to count, though there was no rule to warrant such indulgence. If the contention of the Law Society be upheld that will amount to a reversal of the decisions in Rothman's case and in Halderness' case. In ex parte Crawford (3 C.T.R., 127) the attention of the Court was expressly drawn to Rule 149, and the Court deliberately refused to enforce it.

Sir H. Juta (in reply): The Court has sometimes gone back on its previous decisions. Thus two men, one Cox and another were admitted to the Bar on an ad nudum L.L.B. degree, but subsequently when a Mr. McIlwane applied under similar circumstances the Court refused the application (8 C.T.R., 265).

In no case has foreign service, save in the United Kingdom, been allowed to count.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The question now is: not whether the applicant has a claim to be admitted, but whether the Court has any discretion in the matter?]

I must submit it has not.

De Villiers, C.J.: On behalf of the Law Society reliance is mainly placed on the 20th section of the Charter of Justice, which enacts that the Supreme Court shall have the power to approve, admit and enrol as attorneys and solicitors such and so many persons as may be instructed within this colony in the knowledge and practice of the law; and it is contended that the Court has no power, to admit any person who has not, for the full period—whatever that may be—been instructed in the knowledge of the law within the Colony. The Charter of Justice, however, does not say that he shall be so instructed in the Colony during the whole of the period of his articles. If that had been the true meaning of the 20th section of the Charter of Justice, then it is quite clear that the 151st Rule of Court would be ultra vires, because by that Rule of Court a person who has been articled in this colony for only a year may be admitted if, for the rest of the period, he has served in England or Scotland. As far back then as 1829 the Court has exercised the power of admitting persons who had not been instructed for the full period in this Colony. I quite agree with Sir Henry Juta that there has been some degree of laxity of late years. This laxity has probably originated from the fact that there is much closer connection and inter-communication with the other British colonies in South Africa than before. The connection with Rhodesia, for instance, is now so close that this Court, sitting here now, is really a Court of Appeal from the High Court of Rhodesia, and, as a matter of fact, the great majority of attorneys practising in that colony, as well as in the neighbouring colonies of the Orange River Colony and the Transvaal, have originally been admitted as attorneys of this Court. There is good reason, therefore, for exercising every comity towards the other Colonies in the admission of persons who have there been instructed for a part of the required time. I quite agree that such comity should be exercised within the limits laid down by the law, but I am not prepared to admit that the Court has ever exceeded such limits. The object of the Court has always been to ensure the efficiency of persons admitted to practise in this colony, and every order has been made with a view to securing such efficiency, and although in some cases there has been a liberal interpretation of the Rules of Court, I am not prepared to say that there has been any departure from the law. To take the case of Rothman, that certainly seems to be one of the strongest cases. That was only decided last year.

Application was made by Sir Henry Juta on behalf of Rothman, and no objection was made by the Law Society. This Court naturally assumes that if there is any objection on the part of the Law Society, who know that the application is about to be made, such objection would be stated in the Court. Well, my candid opinion is that if the Law Society had opposed, and the matter had been fully gone into, the decision might have been different. The present case came before my learned Brother Hopley, who gave the fullest and most careful attention to the matter, and came to the conclusion that this was one of the cases in which indulgence ought to be granted. He made an order, therefore, that fresh articles were to be entered into, that there was to be another year's service in this colony, and that after such service, petitioner should be admitted. Well, I am not now prepared to reverse that decision; to say that it was wrong. It is quite possible that if the case had been argued before this Court in the first instance—fully argued—it may have been that a different decision would have been arrived at, but the fact is that the learned judge performed the functions of the Supreme Court, and decided that under the circumstances the indulgence asked for should be granted.

Buchanan, J. concurred. An applicant for admission must comply with certain requirements before he could claim admission as a right, but if he came to ask indulgence, he came as a petitioner. And in future applicants must not be surprised if that indulgence was not readily granted. Departures from the strict rule were injudicious, and it was advisable always in future to adhere more strictly to the rules, and he did not wish it to be considered that this ruling of the Court meant that anyone else in similar circumstances would be admitted to practise.

Mr. Justice Maasdorp concurred.

The Court made no order as to costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon Mr. Justice MAASDORP and a Jury.]

COCHRANE AND CHERRY V.	1904. Oct. 25th. " 26th. " 27th.
WOODSTOCK MUNICIPAL-ITY AND OTHERS.

Municipal contractor—Town engineer—Progress of work.

C. and C. had contracted to do certain work for the Municipality.

pality of W. The 11th clause of the contract provided that should the contractors, without reasonable or sufficient cause, fail to make such progress with the work as should, in the opinion of the engineers, be proportionate to the total time fixed for the execution of the contract, the engineers should, after having given the contractors 48 hours' notice, in writing, have the power of ejecting them and their employees from the works and taking possession of the works and plans and providing material and labour at the cost of the contractor. When half the time fixed for the completion of the contract had elapsed only one-seventh of the work had been completed. The defendants thereupon ejected plaintiffs from the works and took possession. Plaintiffs now sued for damages.

Held, that it was not within the discretion of the engineer to decide as to whether there had been reasonable and sufficient cause to retard the work, but that he had discretion to determine whether a proportionate amount of work, having regard to the time limit fixed by the contract, had been completed.

This was an action for a declaration of rights, the value of certain machinery and plant, the payment of certain retention money and damages, brought by Messrs. Cochrane and Cherry, of Cape Town, contractors, against the Municipal Councils of Woodstock, Claremont, Rondebosch and Mowbray, and the Committee of the Suburban Municipal Waterworks.

The plaintiffs' declaration was in the following terms:

1. The plaintiffs are Robert Cochrane and John Edwin Cherry, trading in partnership in Cape Town under the style and firm of Cochrane and Cherry.

2. The defendants are the Municipal Councils of Woodstock, Claremont, Rondebosch, and Mowbray, and the Committee of Management elected by the said Councils in accordance with the provisions of the Claremont and Woodstock Water Supply Act, 1898.

3. On September 27, 1901, an agreement was entered into between the plaintiffs and the Mayors of the aforesaid four Municipalities duly authorised by their respective Councils, whereunder the plaintiffs undertook to construct a reservoir on the side of Table Mountain at Newlands, for the purpose of carrying out certain works under the aforesaid Act, upon certain conditions and in accordance with certain specifications annexed to and forming part of the aforesaid contract: to which documents, when produced at the trial the plaintiffs crave leave to refer.

4. Under the said Act the Committee of Management aforesaid is entrusted with the management, regulation and control of all matters relating to the water supply of the said Municipalities, and from and after the date of the aforesaid agreement the said committee took charge of all matters connected with the construction of the said reservoir in accordance with the said agreement, appointed an engineer thereunder, and dealt with the plaintiffs in all matters relating thereto.

5. After the signing of the said contract some delay took place on the part of the said engineer in actually setting out the works, and the contractors were in consequence delayed in their work, and certain excavation work was done by them before the exact limits of excavation were pointed out to them.

6. From time to time during the progress of the work, from the commencement thereof great difficulty was experienced by the plaintiffs in procuring a sufficient supply of labour on account of the war then proceeding between the Imperial Government and the South African Republics, and also on account of the outbreak of plague in Cape Town and the suburbs, and on account of the restrictions imposed by the martial law regulations.

7. The engineer aforesaid also insisted on the work being carried on by methods which required more time than was necessary and reasonable being taken upon the said work, and the plaintiffs were compelled to carry away the ground excavated by them under the contract, a long and unnecessary distance by route pointed out by him; and in this manner the work was delayed, and the plaintiffs were prevented from pushing on with it at a time when they had a large number of employees available.

8. A further delay was caused owing to the plaintiffs not being able to get delivery from the Docks of trucks, rails and sleepers imported by them for use on the works, the vessels in which the said plant or material was being unable to discharge on account of the congestion in the harbour; the plaintiffs were unable to procure in Cape Town the said plant or material which was necessary for the construction of the said works.

9. The delay in the works due to the above causes was entirely beyond the control of the plaintiffs, and was not caused in any manner by their neglect or default.

10. On or about June 5, 1902, the said Engineer on behalf of the defendants gave written notice to the plaintiffs that he took possession of the works and plant, and ejected them and their employees therefrom.

11. The said notice purported to be given under clause 11 of the specifications annexed to the contract, which is as follows: "If at any time during the continuance of the contract the contractor shall, without reasonable or sufficient cause, fail to make such progress with the work as shall in the opinion of the engineers be proportionate to the total time fixed for the execution of the contract, the engineers shall, after having given the contractor forty-eight hours' notice in writing, have the power of ejecting him and his employees from the works, and to take possession of the work and plant; and to provide material and the necessary labour at the cost and charges of the contractor, and to pay such sum or sums or wages as they may think just or fair, and to deduct the amounts from any moneys that may be due and payable to the contractor; and should the total of such charges exceed in amount the contract sum, the balance may be recovered by the officer duly authorised by the committee of management to receive the same on the completion of the works, or the engineers shall have power to relet the contract."

12. The plaintiffs contend that they did not without reasonable and sufficient cause fail to make such progress with the work as should in the opinion of the engineer be proportionate to the total time fixed, and that the said question of reasonable and sufficient cause and the right of defendants to eject them and take possession of the works is a dispute between the parties which should be determined by this Honourable Court or by arbitration, and they crave leave specially to refer to clauses 17 and 18 of the said contract as follows: "Clause 17.—All matters of dispute, whether they refer to the manner of carrying on the work, to the quantity of material to be used, or to anything touching the meaning of the clause, matter, or thing in this contract, the specification or drawings shall in the first instance be referred to the decision of the engineers." "Clause 18: Should such decision, however, for whatever good reason not prove satisfactory, the matter or matters in dispute may be submitted to arbitration under the Lands and Arbitration Clauses Act 6 of 1882, the contractor to pay all expenses in connection with such arbitration."

13. On receipt of the said notice from the engineer the plaintiffs gave up possession of the works, and defendants have taken possession thereof and of all the machinery, plant, and tools thereon, the property of plaintiffs, and of a large quantity of cement which had been supplied to them, and the defendants are continuing the construction of the said reservoir, but not in accordance with the conditions of the original contract, which have in many instances been departed from since the defendants took possession of the works.

14. The plaintiffs claim that the defendants had no right to eject them from the said works, and in or about June, 1903, they requested the defendants to go to arbitration as to the right of the defendants so to act; and thereafter, on December the 24th, 1903, appointed an arbitrator after notice to the defendants, and the said arbitrator was about to proceed with the arbitration, but on or about March 1, 1904, the defendants applied to this Honourable Court and obtained an order restraining the plaintiffs (then respondents) from proceeding with the said arbitration.

15. The value of the machinery and plant taken possession of by the defendants is the sum of £2,800; the value of the cement is the sum of £1,693; and the amount of retention money due to the plaintiffs under the said contract in respect of work actually executed is the sum of £1,217 13s. 9d.; the defendants retain all the said money, materials, plant, and machinery in their possession, and they refuse to pay plaintiffs any of the said money or the value of the said materials, plant, and machinery.

16. The plaintiffs say that the defendants acted wrongfully and unlawfully in ejecting them from the works and taking possession thereof and of all the plaintiffs' plant and materials.

17. Since the date of the aforesaid wrongful ejectment of the plaintiffs by the defendants, and the taking over of the said works by the defendants, the defendants have so negligently proceeded with the execution thereof, that great and unreasonable delay has been caused, and in consequence the payment to plaintiffs of the sums owing to them under the contract has been unreasonably and wrongfully delayed and withheld.

18. By reason of the facts set forth in paragraphs 16 and 17 hereof the plaintiffs have suffered serious pecuniary loss and inconvenience, and have been injured in their business and deprived of moneys lawfully due to them, and have in all sustained damages amounting to the sum of £4,500.

The plaintiffs claim: (a) A declaration of their rights under the aforesaid contract; (b) a declaration that the defendants have wrongfully and unlawfully ejected the plaintiffs from the aforesaid works, and have thereby broken the said contract; (c) the sum of £2,800, the value of the machinery; (d) the sum of £1,683, the value of the cement; (e) the sum of £1,217 13s. 9d., retention money; (f) interest on the aforesaid three sums from June 5, 1902; (g) £4,500, damages; (h) alternative relief; (i) costs of suit.

For a plea to the plaintiffs' declaration, the defendants said:

1. They admit paragraphs 1, 2, 3, 4, and 10 of the plaintiffs' declaration.

2. As to paragraph 5 of the plaintiffs' declaration, save that they admit that some delay was caused by the destruction by fire of certain original survey pegs, and that certain excavation work was done before the exact limits of excavation were pointed out, they deny the allegations therein contained.

3. They admit that there was difficulty in procuring a sufficient supply of labour, as alleged in paragraph 6 of the plaintiffs' declaration, but the difficulty was not insuperable.

4. As to paragraph 7 of the plaintiffs' declaration, they say that certain requirements of the engineer, in accordance with the specifications, were objected to by the plaintiffs, but otherwise they deny that paragraph.

5. Certain plant and material imported by the plaintiffs for use on the works were delayed in delivery at the Docks, but the defendants deny that such delay in delivery did cause or should, by the plaintiffs, have been allowed to cause the delay in the due proclation; save as aforesaid, they deny other allegations in paragraph 8 of the plaintiffs' declaration.

6. In so far as the circumstances referred to in the foregoing paragraphs 2, 3, and 5 were beyond the control of the plaintiffs, and not due to neglect or default on their part, and in so far as they reasonably caused delay in the progress of the works under their contract, all such circumstances were duly weighed and considered by the engineer before forming the opinion upon which he decided, after previous admonitions and warnings, to give the final written notice to the plaintiffs which is referred to in paragraph 10 of the plaintiffs' declaration; save as aforesaid, they deny paragraph 9 of the plaintiffs' declaration.

7. They admit paragraph 11 of the plaintiffs' declaration, and say that in the opinion of the engineer and in fact the plaintiffs, without reasonable or sufficient cause, failed to make such progress with the work as would be proportionate to the total time fixed for the execution of the contract, but negligently and in breach of their contract delayed in carrying out the work, and that by reason of the premises the engineer was justified in his action, and they say specially that, according to the true intent and meaning of the contract, the decision of the engineer, under clause 11 of the contract, is final and conclusive, and binding on the plaintiffs.

8. They deny the plaintiffs' contentions set forth in paragraph 12 of the plaintiffs' declaration, specially denying that the clauses there quoted are applicable to the matters in issue in this court.

9. They admit the allegations in paragraph 13 of plaintiffs' declaration down to the word "reservoir." They deny that they are not carrying out the construction of the said reservoir in accordance with the conditions of the original contract, but they admit that certain alterations have been made in the original plans since the defendants took possession. They crave leave to refer to clause 14 of the said contract, which is as follows: "The engineer shall be at liberty to make any alteration in or omission from the plans or constructions of the said works, and such alteration shall not annul or invalidate the contract; but the difference in quantities or value (if any) arising therefrom shall be estimated or valued at the same rates as that upon which the contractor shall have formed his estimate for the contract." And they say that in the final adjustment the provisions of the contract will be adhered to.

10. As regards the taking possession of the machinery, plant, tools, and cement, they crave leave to refer to clause 11 aforesaid, and also to clause 8 of the said contract, which provides: All such materials and plant as aforesaid of the contractor, and all other materials and plant used by him, or brought on the premises for the purpose of use in and about the carrying out of the said contract, shall, for the purposes of the contract, be in the legal custody of the engineers, and shall so remain and be utilised by them or their order for the purposes of the contract, whether the contractors shall surrender their estate as insolvent, or assign it, or for whatever reason they shall become unable to carry out the terms of the contract. After the completion of the contract by him provided, the engineers shall return such materials and plant, or what is left thereof, to the contractor or his lawful representative."

11. As to paragraph 14 of the plaintiffs' declaration, they deny that they had no right to eject the plaintiffs. But they admit the other allegations in the said paragraph, save that they crave leave to refer to the deed of submission signed by the plaintiffs, when produced at the trial, for the terms of the said proposed arbitration, and to the said proceedings before this honourable Court in the said paragraph referred to.

12. As to paragraph 15, of the plaintiffs' declaration, they deny the values put on the machinery and plant, and the cement, in the said paragraph. They admit that they have retained in terms of the said contract, the sum of £1,217 13s. 9d., being 20 per cent. of the value of work certified by the engineer, but they say that during the month of May, 1902, they advanced to the plaintiffs for wages and materials, sums of money amounting to £297 12s. 3d., against the amounts so retained. They admit that they retain the said retention money, and the said materials, plant, and machinery, and that they refuse to pay the plaintiffs any of the said money, or the value of the said materials, plant, and machinery, until the completion of the said works.

They say that they are justified in terms of the contract in so retaining until the said completion, and say that until then they cannot ascertain what sum, if any, will be due to the plaintiffs in terms of the contract, especially clause 11 thereof.

13. They deny the allegations in paragraphs 16, 17, and 18 of the plaintiffs' declaration.

Wherefore, they pray that the plaintiffs' claim may be dismissed with costs.

Sir H. Juts, K.C. (with him Dr. Rainsford) for plaintiffs; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner), for defendant.

John Edwin Cherry, one of the plaintiffs, said that they could not get the plant they required in town. The railway plant arrived here by boat on the 7th October. There was also delay in pegging out the work on the mountain slopes. He said that the ground had been burnt after the first pegs had been fixed. They made a start on the excavation of the reservoir; they were not sure of the site, but they had men who were waiting to work. Mr. Wright told him he thought they were within the reservoir. He found that this was right. The first pegs were put down in the first week of October, 1901, the others some time afterwards. They had difficulty in getting the railway plant from the Docks; it did not reach the spot until the 13th or 14th November. Excavation work was the slowest, though from the money point of view it was the cheapest. He calculated that if they had been allowed to run out more "spurs," and more short sections of rails they would have been able to do a fifth more work in the same amount of time. That would have made about two months' saving in time. Their labour supply was seriously influenced by martial law regulations and the plague. They took steps to augment the supply. They got a batch of thirty natives from Mossel Bay. The boys had been inoculated, and, in consequence of a report getting about that some of the boys who had been inoculated had died, no more would come down. The location was full of boys who were principally employed at Table Bay Docks. They also asked for 200 boys from the Transkei; as a matter of fact, they only got 71. These boys began to leave the works almost immediately after arrival; only four or five remained till the end of the month. They also tried to get 300 more boys through Colonel Stanford, from East London, but were not successful. His firm took a quantity of cement, of the value of £1,653, to the works in January, 1902. No payment was made to them by the Board on account of this. The cement was several times tested, but the engineer would neither reject nor accept the material, though he did not appear to be satisfied. After witness's firm had been ejected from the works, the Board took over the identical casks. Plaintiffs were greatly incommoded by not receiving the money due on the cement from the defendants. In consequence they had to approach the Board for the fares of boys whom they desired forwarded from the Transkei. On the 10th May, this application was made; on the 12th, the Board replied that they would not pay the fares; and on the 16th May they received the first notice from the Board. They afterwards obtained a number of Italians, having about 80 on the works when the notice of the 16th May was received. In June, 1903, they began to take proceedings to go to arbitration, a year after the Municipality had taken over and had charge of the works. The Court, however, held that they could not proceed with the arbitration, hence this action. The works were still unfinished; he believed the reservoir would not be completed until July next. He understood that some departures in the work had since been made from the plans supplied to his firm. With regard to the plant taken by the defendants, the total cost was £2,263 3s. 6d., as shown by an extract taken out from their books. The amount of retention money due was £1,217 13s. 9d. This was admitted by the defendants. As to the payment made by the Board of £297 12s. 3d., that was for labour during May, 1902; and was paid after plaintiffs had been ejected from the works. They did not receive from the defendants a certificate of work done during May; they would be entitled to 80 per cent. of the value. Witness considered that they could have made a profit of 10 per cent. on the contract. They were fined for not being up to contract time with the work. After the witness's firm had been ejected from the works, the labour market improved a good deal. They had suffered damage from being deprived of their plant and material, since it was taken over by the defendants; they had been unable to do any work, because their plant and capital had gone. Considering the position of affairs in May, 1902, he calculated that they had made a profit of from 5 to 7½ per cent. on the contract. He thought they could have completed the work by April, 1903, and have made 5 to 7½ per cent. profit. That would be after allowing for four months' fine at £7 a day.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: This was the first large reservoir the firm had undertaken. Coochrane really was the practical man of the firm. Cochran was away at the time a good deal, attending to the Harbour Works contract that they had under the Government at Mossel Bay. This contract was subsequently taken over by the Government at their (plaintiffs) request. The primary cause of the delay in their work at Newlands was the lack of labour. It was not impossible to have completed the reservoir by December, 1902, if they had had a proper supply of labour. He had not heard that theirs was the lowest tender by thousands of pounds, and that others had tendered up to £180,000. He admitted receiving a letter from the engineer on the 18th March, 1902, complaining about the progress of the work. The engineer had also, he was aware, made complaints previously, even as early as January, 1902. In March, 1902, only portions of the excavations and embankment had been carried out, while the largest item, the laying of 12,000 yards of concrete had not been touched. It was on account of the want of means that they could not take the boys collected at Butterworth on the 12th May.

Mr. Schreiner: Of course, you hoped for the best. But you had no capital on which to carry on either of these contracts.

Witness made no reply.

Further cross-examined: The bill for the cement had not been entirely paid by his firm. They had paid nothing to Crux and Co., the firm from whom they bought the cement, at the time they asked the Board for an advance. He maintained that the cement was up to the specification. The Engineer insisted on carrying out the specification of the contract in its entirety; witness suggested that the specification should be modified in certain details, and these modifications would have made a better job as a matter of fact. He thought it was better that the work should be consolidated by the Kafirs' feet than by rollers; they were quite willing, however, to roll the work. In March, 1902, they were employing over 300 men on the works; this went on until the 4th April, and the number was then reduced to about 200 or 220. They had had instructions from the Engineer to keep the minimum supply at 300.

Mr. Schreiner (to witness): Now, tell the jury, Mr. Cherry, when you dropped the idea of a 10 per cent. profit and came to the conclusion that you were not going to make a penny of profit.

Witness: I dropped it when we came near the end of May, and found that we were not making the profit we had counted upon.

Further cross-examination: He could quite believe that the cost of the work had, under departmental management, exceeded the total of their contract already. He did not think the present management was what it should be. He thought Mr. Wright's management was profuse and lavish. The Board were not getting a proper amount of work from the number of men employed there. When the dispute arose he wrote a letter to the Board stating that there would have to be a full inquiry into the matter of the progress of the works and the action of the Board's engineer in turning them off the job. He knew that the contract gave certain powers to the engineer, but he did not consider that the engineer's views on this question of the rate of progress were final, because in one part of the contract it was set out that any disputes between the contractors and the engineer were to be referred to an independent engineer. He had been under the impression, therefore, that a question of this kind would be dealt with by an independent engineer. Only about six casks of cement were damaged; the rest were all right. The cost price of the plant was put in. The Harbour Board took over the plant at Mossel Bay. On the 10th June he had an interview with the Board, and he confirmed Cochran's contention that the delay was due to martial law and the plague regulations. The boys were stopped at East London owing to the plague regulations. After a year arbitration was asked for, and some steps would have been taken, only that the plaintiffs wanted to see how the Board got on with the work. Witness was confident that he could finish the contract in two and a half year's time. Time after time the engineer expressed his entire satisfaction at the progress made on the new works, but witness thought he went behind the plaintiffs' back to complain of the work. It was true that the engineer wrote a letter of warning on the 18th March, but witness could not understand it. The engineer was dead against them, and therefore they wrote that it was impossible to carry out the work.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: In March and April the amount of work went up immensely. Mr. Wright gave plaintiff the impression that he was anxious to take over the work himself. There was no correspondence about the damaged casks.

Robert Charters, Member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, stated there were great difficulties in obtaining labour on the mountain from October, 1901, to May, 1902. The boys preferred to work at the Docks owing to the increased wages. In comparison with the work at the Hely-Hutchinson Reservoir, it would be seen from a chart put in that when the labour dropped there it also dropped at Newlands Reservoir. When he was on the spot the men were being employed to the best advantage. He estimated that the contractors would have finished the work with the same number of men the defendants employed by the end of April, 1903.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: There were difficulties in obtaining labour between October, 1901, and May, 1902. He could see no reason why the natives should dislike the Newlands Reservoir in comparison with the Hely-Hutchinson Reservoir.

Robert Charteris, further cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner, stated that the contract could have been finished four months after the stipulated time at a profit of £3,000. He had worked out the actual cost of the work as £67,280, but he could not at the moment detail the total profit on each item.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: He formed the estimate as an engineer, not as a lawyer. The result of his figures was that the plaintiffs did more excavation work per man than the Municipality.

John Delbridge, contractor, Wynberg, said he had considerable difficulty in finding labour from October, 1901, up to February, 1902, and through that he was greatly hampered with one of his contracts at Wellington. About June last year the labour market began to improve. From his own experience the cement used on the reservoir was a good class article.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He did not test the cement that came out for the Newlands Reservoir, but he believed cement from the same makers had been used at the reservoir at Wynberg. There was a difficulty in getting coloured labour owing to martial law. Witness tendered £86,750, £15,750 over the tender of the plaintiffs.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: Of course, he would rather not say what profit he intended to make. At Wynberg he had as many spurs as he wanted.

Brandon Kirby, contractor, for the Cape Town Municipality, on the main drainage, said that between September, 1901, and May, 1902, there was a great scarcity of labour, and the Council could not proceed with some of their work. The boys would work a couple of days, and then go away. Witness did not finish his contract within the time, but the Town Council met him there. It was impossible to compete with the Docks, where the boys got a shilling an hour at night.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He sent boys to the top of Kloof-street to get labour from the reservoir. Witness tendered £77,245, and calculated he would have made about £15,000 profit.

By Maasdorp, J.: With the full knowledge of the circumstances now he estimated he would have made from £13,000 to £14,000 profit.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

John Mose Wright, engineer, stated that in 1901 he prepared the plans and specifications for the reservoir. The contractors were getting ready for the work before the 27th September. The whole of the area was covered with young fir trees, and a serious fire took place while wood was being removed, but that did not delay the contractors. Witness permitted two spurs on condition that they were consolidated by beating, and subsequently he had to complain that there was not ample consolidation. By having extra spurs the facility for rolling would be reduced. Witness offered to allow another spur, provided they rolled it. The plaintiffs never wrote to witness complaining of this. There was a congestion in the harbour, and plague was about being stamped out when the contract was signed. The principal delay was in the order for trucks and sleepers; the plaintiffs having to work with barrows until November. He had not the least desire to take over the contract departmentally. When the plaintiffs made progress with the work, witness expressed satisfaction; but time after time he had to express his disapproval. He considered there was not sufficient cause for the delay of the plaintiffs. Witness tried to aid them in every way in getting labour. The plaintiffs paid 3s. 6d., while others were paying 4s., 4s. 6d., and 5s. On one occasion the natives struck work for higher wages. Before May 16 he found the work done by the plaintiffs was not in proportion to the time in which the work was to be pushed. He never considered the work could be done by December 31, 1902, the time stated in the contract. Subsequently plaintiffs admitted that they could not finish by that time, and at their request, witness's committee agreed to extend the contract to the end of March, provided the plaintiffs showed an earnestness to bring the work to a conclusion. In point of labour and finance, he came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs could not have finished the contract. Since the department took over the work, there had been some additions in the plans. He could not see how the work could have been finished at the contract price. The highest, out of nineteen tenders, was £180,000. The department had to raise the rate of wages when they took the work over. The proportion of work per man when the contractors were at work should be greater than when the contract was taken over by the department, as work in the first stages was easier. As to the cement, the test was not satisfactory, none of the bricks standing a strain of 400 lb., the average being 333 lb. The contractor had set down the excavation in his tender at 1s. 5d. per yard. From his experience of this class of excavation, he should put the cost price at 2s. 3d. or 2s. 6d. In regard to the embankment, the plaintiffs' figure was 9d. per yard, while witness fixed 1s. 3d. as a fair figure. In regard to the concrete work, he thought that the figure of 41s. adopted by the contractors was low, and that a fair average price would be about 51s. or 52s. In the light of his experience of this kind of work, witness thought that the contractors would have made absolutely no profit on the prices at which they tendered. He regarded it as a losing contract.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He had not been engaged upon reservoir works in this country prior to this work at Newlands. He had had experience of excavation in connection with the investigations for the Steynsburg irrigation scheme; considerable excavations were made there to prove the foundations, but the dam was not proceeded with. His estimates of the cost of work were based upon his experience in this colony. He had been in the Public Works Department; he could not, however, give specific instances of works where he had gained his experience. Witness's terms of employment on the reservoir changed a little time before the contractors were ejected. Witness had not been anxious to find fault with the contractors. He thought that the time limit of the contract—fifteen months—was short. Witness did not say anything about this; he was away on the Oliphant's Hoek scheme when the contract was let. As to the burning of the pegs of the original survey, it would have been difficult for anybody else to have gone and picked up the pegs after the fire. Only charred remains were in the ground, and anybody unacquainted with the survey would have had great difficulty in finding the pegs. There was, however, a plan prepared of the survey. He objected to the construction of "spurs," because of there being a danger if they were not thoroughly consolidated, and also because the sections would be too small to roll by mules. It would be impossible to roll the sections properly by mule power. If the rollers were pulled by hand, it would not be economical.
